Re: Concerns of the Association of Corporate Counsel (ACC) on the erosion of attorney-client privilege and work product protections in the corporate legal context

Dear Attorney General Gonzales:

On behalf of the Association of Corporate Counsel ("ACC"), thank you for the opportunity to provide input from the business community's lawyers regarding the U.S. Department of Justice's policy regarding waiver of the attorney-client and work product protections in the corporate context. As you know, ACC is the in-house bar association, serving over 19,300 individual members who work as in-house counsel in over 8,000 public, private, and not-for-profit organizations. Our officers (who send their regrets that they could not join us today), board of directors, and general members from across the country (and increasingly from around the world) appreciate the invitation to air our concerns with you today.

Concerns of the Business Community Regarding Attorney-Client and Work Product Protections

As you know, attorney-client privilege and the work product doctrine are fundamental protections in the U.S. legal system that foster corporate compliance by encouraging employees and corporate leaders alike to communicate candidly with the company's counsel. Unfortunately, our members tell us of increasing concerns that their clients' rights to privileged meetings with counsel are under attack in a number of ways:

1. when prosecutors (at the federal and state level) begin investigations into allegations of wrongdoing and suggest (demand or infer) that privilege waiver is necessary to any company that wishes to engage in dialogue or influence settlement discussions, charging decisions, or the prosecutors' designation of the company as cooperative.

2. when regulators from the SEC, but also other federal and state level agencies, engage in similar kinds of co-opting behaviors in order to secure access to communications protected by the attorney-client privilege or lawyer work product.

3. when auditors, hearing the sharper scrutiny mandates present in the post-Andersen world, are no longer satisfied when any stone is left unturned, and refuse to certify a company's books or audit unless privilege has been waived and all attorney-client confidences divulged.

4. when third-party plaintiffs demand access to once-privileged records, which – because of these forced waivers – are now open to public scrutiny.

Summary of Key Revisions to the Thompson Memorandum

While ACC and a number of its partner associations in the business and legal community are assessing how to respond to these erosion concerns in all four contexts, we would like to offer you our input on how we would propose that the Department of Justice could help us reverse the trend of privilege erosion within their spheres of influence.

ACC would like to see revisions to key sections of the Thompson Memorandum. We feel that the time has come for us all to sit at the table as parties interested in ensuring that our justice system works well for all participants: we know that we both have constructive thoughts on concrete ways that the Justice Department could work with the business community to address these concerns in a mutually beneficial way. And we believe that your offices' outreach to the regional field offices is a part of that process and an important key to any solution we might craft.

Because we wish to encourage you to focus on the larger areas of common ground that we must find first, rather than starting with a re-draft of the specifics that we'd like to see changed (and that will likely engender a more argumentative response), we're only offering a summary of our general direction, below, to see if we can come to some general agreements in theory before we start looking at the technicalities and the words.

Indeed, ACC and the ABA's Task Force on Attorney-Client Privilege, along with all of the groups represented in that working group, have each developed specific language suggestions that we will all be pleased to present to you and your legal / policy team at the time and with the persons you designate as you deem appropriate. After you've had time to consider our general concerns, we would like to follow up with the appropriate leaders to arrange a meeting to further discuss our ideas in specific: perhaps in a few weeks (once Mr. McNulty is confirmed and seated?).

1. Delete the waiver requirement for corporate leniency. We believe that prosecutors should be barred from requesting any waiver of attorney-client or work product protections and from "consider[ing] whether a corporation has waived its attorney-client and work product protections in assessing that corporation's cooperation for any purpose, including in the course of conducting an investigation, determining whether to bring charges, or negotiating plea agreements." Consistent with this approach, we are suggesting that references to production of information subject to attorney-client or work product protections should be eliminated or limited to the production of information not subject to these protections. These proposed revisions directly address the policy issue of greatest concern to the business community.

2. Differentiate isolated cases from a broad pattern of misconduct. These proposed revisions acknowledge the reality that even law-abiding corporate citizens occasionally have rogue employees that engage in misconduct. Conclusions about the culture, compliance programs, or even supervision of employees should be based upon a corporation's general patterns and practices, and should not be extrapolated from an isolated incident.

3. Identify practical limitations on corporate cooperation regarding individual employees. Although the Department's expectation of assistance from a corporation in targeting culpable employees and agents is appropriate in general, there are practical limitations that corporations want the DOJ to acknowledge. These include provisions addressing the recognition that companies may be bound by state indemnification laws to pay the legal fees of certain employees until they have been proven guilty, and that employees have a variety of individual rights that company's must respect, as well.

We appreciate your consideration of our concerns regarding the Department's policy on waiver of attorney-client privilege and work product protections in the corporate context.

Please do not hesitate to contact me on this or any other matter. ACC thanks you for your time and your gracious invitation to join you in your offices to open the lines of communication between our constituencies.

Sincerely,

REVIEW & OUTLOOK

Corporate Injustice

Two big things happened last week in the federal prosecution of 16 former KPMG partners and two other alleged co-conspirators. The first, which got lots of media play, is that one of the defendants copped a plea. But the second received almost no attention, even though it may have much larger significance for future white-collar indictments.

How government is stripping business of the attorney-client privilege.

At a pre-trial hearing in the KPMG case in New York last week, federal Judge Lewis A. Kaplan suggested that a three-year-old Justice Department policy on corporate prosecutions might be unconstitutional. He was referring to the now famous Thompson memo, which in 2003 rewrote Justice guidelines on when to indict entire firms in criminal investigations.

"Too often," the memo states, "business organizations, while purporting to cooperate with a Department investigation, in fact take steps to impede the quick and effective exposure of the complete scope of wrongdoing under investigation." With that as a premise, then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson laid out what firms should do to avoid a corporate indictment, a la Arthur Andersen.

Those steps were extraordinary in their attempt to pressure corporate executives: They include waiving attorney-client privilege to give investigators access to internal documents and cutting off accused employees from legal and other forms of support. In short, the Thompson memo said that companies under investigation are expected to surrender any right against self-incrimination and cut their accused employees adrift.

In one sense, the memo's guidelines are just that—internal guidelines for prosecutors. But as a practical matter, only a rare CEO will risk the death sentence that a corporate indictment represents. So "cooperation" as defined by Justice is hardly optional. It was on this point that Judge Kaplan took Assistant U.S. Attorney Justin Weddle to task last week. When Judge Kaplan questioned the fairness of pressuring companies to throw their employees overboard, Mr. Weddle replied that companies are "free to say, 'We're not going to cooperate.'"

"That's lame," the judge retorted. He then asked Mr. Weddle "what legitimate purpose" was served by insisting that companies cut their former employees off from legal support. Companies under investigation, Judge Kaplan noted, ought to be free to decide whether to support their employees or former employees without Justice's "thumb on the scale."

Mr. Weddle replied that paying the legal fees of former employees charged with crimes amounted to protecting "wrongdoers." This prompted the judge to remind the young prosecutor that the accused are still innocent until proven guilty. He also reminded Mr. Weddle that the Constitution's Sixth Amendment guarantees the right to counsel. And for good measure, if the government is confident in its case, it shouldn't be afraid to allow "wrongdoers" access to an adequate defense.

On Tuesday of this week, Judge Kaplan dismissed a defense motion to throw out the entire case based on a charge of "prosecutorial misconduct," but he left the Sixth Amendment question open for possible further proceedings. That partial victory notwithstanding, Mr. Weddle's replies betrayed Justice's willingness to trample the due-process rights of companies and defendants in white-collar cases in the wake of the Enron uproar.

It's certainly possible for law breakers to shield incriminating material using attorney-client privilege, but taking down that wall also has serious unintended consequences. For one thing, executives are now on notice that even asking a legal question of an attorney could later be used against them in court—say, as proof that they were aware that what they were doing might not be proper. The likely result is a greater reluctance to seek legal advice in the first place.

The Thompson memo also notes that firms are "legal persons" that shouldn't be treated more or less leniently by law enforcement because of their "artificial status." But a company and a person are in reality very different. A firm cannot be put in jail or take the stand in its own defense. And bankruptcy nearly always follows a corporate indictment, whether the firm is later convicted or not. That fact alone gives the lie to Mr. Weddle's insouciant reply that companies are free to refuse to cooperate.

The Thompson memo was written at a time when corporate blood was in the political water, and Justice attorneys were angry in particular about Andersen's lack of cooperation. Well, they certainly nailed Andersen, only to have that conviction overturned later by the Supreme Court. The trouble is that in expanding the threat of corporate capital punishment, Justice has also damaged the attorney-client privilege for white-collar defendants and thus the right to a fair trial. And all of this was done with little or no public debate, much less a vote in Congress.

Justice could alter or eliminate the Thompson memo by the stroke of a pen, but it is unlikely to do so until its legitimacy is challenged in court. If Judge Kaplan's reaction in the KPMG case is indicative, that day may not be far off. And a good thing too.

U.S. Pressures Firms Not to Pay Staff Legal Fees

Wall Street Journal

Defense lawyers are closely watching an accounting-fraud case in New Hampshire that they see as the latest government effort to stop companies from paying the legal fees of indicted employees.

In the past three years, federal prosecutors in New York, Alabama and, now, Concord, N.H., have pursued a strategy that puts companies at risk of being branded as uncooperative if they don't cut off such payments. Lawyers say that could be tantamount to convicting defendants before they have even had a trial, since they can't properly defend themselves.

"If companies don't cooperate with the government, they can face a death penalty by being indicted," says Ellen Podgor, a professor at Stetson University College of Law. She adds that companies fear becoming the next Arthur Andersen LLP, which imploded shortly after its indictment in 2002 for allegedly obstructing the government's investigation of fraud at Enron Corp. (The accounting firm was later convicted of obstruction, but the Supreme Court overturned the verdict last year.) "Prosecutors can now force individuals to pay their own attorneys' fees," Prof. Podgor says, "and corporations have to go along."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse counters that "the government does not force corporations to do anything." If a company declines to advance fees, he adds, "that is a business decision made after weighing all of the costs and benefits of cooperation."

The cost of a trial is out of the financial reach of many white-collar defendants. "It is hard to defend a white-collar case for less than $100,000, and most cost much, much more than that," says John Hasnas, a professor at Georgetown University's McDonough School of Business.

In the New Hampshire case, five former executives of technology company Enterasys Networks Inc. charged with accounting fraud were set to stand trial in Concord this month but got a three-month reprieve after federal prosecutors were accused of misconduct. Government lawyers pressured the company to cut off legal fees to the defendants to weaken the employees' ability to fight the charges, defense lawyers allege in court filings.

New Hampshire U.S. Attorney William Morse, the lead prosecutor in the case and one of three accused of misconduct, denies wrongdoing. In pretrial testimony, when asked why he inquired about the company's payment of legal fees, he said, he simply wanted to inform Enterasys that the "payment of attorneys' fees for defendants was something that the Department of Justice had instructed its line prosecutors to consider" when assessing a company's cooperation with prosecutors. In an interview, he says, "Enterasys's decision to stop paying legal fees had nothing to do with government pressure." He says that he last spoke to Enterasys about the reimbursement of fees in the summer of 2004, and that the company didn't cut off funding until a year later.

Mr. Morse says he notified the Justice Department in 2004 that he had asked Enterasys about its payment of legal fees. He says he made the inquiry to determine whether the company was living up to its cooperation agreement. The Justice Department approved his actions, he says. A Justice Department spokeswoman declines to comment.

At a March 7 hearing, U.S. District Judge Paul Barbadoro, who is presiding over the trial, voiced concern that prosecutors had wrongly pressured Enterasys to cut off funding to the defendants. Nevertheless, he didn't sanction the prosecutors, and Enterasys reluctantly agreed to pay past-due legal bills and cover future costs.

The fee-payment issue has gained prominence in recent years, following a 2003 U.S. Justice Department memo that advised prosecutors to credit companies that cooperate with the government in an effort to avoid indictment. The memo, written by former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, advises that a company's willingness to advance legal fees to "culpable employees" may signal a lack of cooperation. A spokesman for PepsiCo Inc., where Mr. Thompson is now the general counsel, says he wouldn't discuss the memo.

Until now, the nonpayment of legal fees has been most heavily debated in the government's ongoing tax-shelter case against former executives of KPMG LLP, which is scheduled for trial in New York in September. Yielding to government pressure, the accounting firm hasn't reimbursed these executives since 2004 in what Stanley Arkin, an attorney for one of the defendants, calls "a way of unfairly breaking down the defendants' ability to resist the government." KPMG declines to comment.

In their investigation of accounting fraud at HealthSouth Corp., federal prosecutors informed the company that the payment of fees to indicted executives would be viewed as a sign of noncooperation, according to lawyers in the case. The company later withheld fees to former chief executive Richard Scrushy, the only indicted executive who pleaded not guilty to federal charges. A jury in Birmingham, Ala., acquitted him of fraud in 2005.

Federal prosecutors also encouraged Symbol Technologies Inc. to withhold fees from executives charged in an alleged accounting fraud at the New York maker of bar-code scanners, according to company counsel Andrew Levander. Last month, in Central Islip, N.Y., U.S. District Judge Leonard Wexler ended the trial of three former Symbol executives after jurors said they were deadlocked.

Symbol was able to pay the executives' fees after it convinced prosecutors that company bylaws required it to do so, Mr. Levander says. "The government is not sensitive to the fact that a failure to indemnify can harm a company's ability to attract talented officers and directors in the future," the lawyer says.

Enterasys, based in Andover, Mass., makes wireless products and computer hardware. It was spun off by Cabletron Systems in 2000 and co-founded by New Hampshire Gov. Craig Benson before he went into politics. Gov. Benson hasn't been charged with wrongdoing. The executives, whose trial is set for June, are accused of artificially inflating revenue in 2001. Four other top executives, including the company's chief executive, have pleaded guilty to charges relating to accounting fraud.

Enterasys has agreed to cooperate with the government's fraud investigation, according to company lawyer Harvey Wolkoff. In 2004, prosecutors encouraged Enterasys not to pay the defendants' legal bills, in order to comply with its cooperation agreement, according to Mr. Wolkoff.

The law in Delaware, where the company is incorporated, authorizes Enterasys to advance legal fees to the defendants. Still, prosecutors asked Enterasys to contest the law. It was an appropriate request, says Mr. Wolkoff: "If [the defendants] did something criminal, why should" their legal fees be reimbursed?

The Enterasys defendants asserted in court filings that they have been hampered from proving their innocence by a lack of funding. In a February filing, the defendants claimed Enterasys stopped paying their legal fees in the summer of 2005, hurting their ability to investigate the backgrounds of witnesses and to review "voluminous" documents. Prosecutors have pressured Enterasys to cut off fees in order to "gain a substantial advantage at trial," defendants asserted in the filing.

Whatever the outcome of the Enterasys trial, Robert Bonner, a defense lawyer with Gibson,

Dunn & Crutcher LLP in Los Angeles who isn't involved in the New Hampshire case, worries that in the future more companies will "throw [indicted] executives to the wolves." His rationale: "The consequences of an indictment are so cataclysmic that companies will do anything to avoid it."

Why lawyers need to keep corporate America's secrets

PATTI WALDMEIR
LEGAL COUNSEL

Everybody knows it is a bad idea to lie to the government. But, in America, it can also be a crime to lie to your corporate lawyer.

Prompted by the evils of Enron, the energy trader, and spurred on by the general public perception that corporate America and its lawyers are a bunch of crooks, federal prosecutors have spent years trying to conscript the legal profession to help them catch white-collar criminals. The federal government has privatised such a big chunk of corporate law enforcement that talking to your lawyer is seen, these days, as no different from talking to a government agent.

In one recent case, prosecutors managed to persuade former executives of Computer Associates, the software company, to plead guilty to obstructing justice not because they lied to government investigators, but because they lied to a law firm the company hired to investigate itself. The theory was that they ought to have known their untruths would end up in the government's hands and thus lying to a lawyer was the same as lying to a G-man.

So American executives are caught in a bind: if the government asks, they can keep quiet and invoke the constitutional right to avoid self-incrimination; but if the lawyers ask, they must answer or get fired. The prosecutors have found a way to do an end run around the constitution.

But now a range of interest groups across the political spectrum, from the US Chamber of Commerce to the American Civil Liberties Union, is fighting back. They say it is time for prosecutors to go back to catching criminals and for lawyers to revert to their time-honoured role of trying to keep the innocent (not to mention the guilty) out of jail.

Talk to any American corporate lawyer these days and he is likely to complain about this issue. The chamber, the Association of Corporate Counsel and the American Bar Association: all say it has become almost routine for federal prosecutors to compel companies to waive the ancient privilege that protects attorney-client communications, in exchange for promises of leniency. According to a recent survey by the National Association of Criminal Defence Lawyers, nearly half of all outside counsel surveyed reported that since Enron there had been an erosion of lawyer-client privilege, or in the lesser protections afforded to lawyer "work product" (materials prepared by a lawyer to prepare for litigation).

Companies have little choice but to trade secrecy for leniency: for most companies, a trial is tantamount to a death sentence even if, as in the case of Arthur Andersen, the conviction is eventually overturned by the US Supreme Court. And long before they can start defending themselves in a real court, companies lose in the court of shareholder opinion: any company that tries to assert privilege invites immediate public condemnation for secrecy, and a commensurate drop in their share price.

> Turning lawyers into snitches will not clean up corporate America – it will just stop businesses from seeking legal advice

Tom Donohue, president of the US Chamber of Commerce, says all this amounts to "stacking the deck against business", and that turning lawyers into snitches will not, in the end, clean up corporate America – it will just stop businesses seeking the legal advice that could keep them clean in the first place.

It is a hard argument to make to a big-business hating public; that lawyers need to be able to keep corporate America's secrets, in the interests of justice and American prosperity. Bill Mateja, a former senior justice department official who oversaw the prosecution of Computer Associates but has since turned his hand to defending corporate America, says all the fuss over privilege is overdone.

He says the problem is not that prosecutors are pressuring companies to waive privilege but that lawyers think they have to cave in to get a deal, so they do so without being asked. This seems a distinction without a difference: the Feds have made their point so well, they do not even need to threaten any more. But Mr Mateja counters that there are ways round this problem: lawyers can give the government the facts it needs about corporate wrongdoing, without breaching privilege. If they do that, prosecutors will leave them and their sacred protections untouched.

But prosecutors should ease up on the pressure: they have enough power as it is. They should stop short of the tyranny of interfering with a lawyer's duty to defend his client. The privilege between lawyers and their clients has been around since the Magna Carta: justice will not be served by dispensing with it now.

LAW AND LOBBYING IN THE NATION'S CAPITAL
OCTOBER 17, 2005

■ Justice League. They make unlikely bedfellows, but last Friday, legal groups on the left and right came together with a unified message: Attorney-client privilege is under attack. The setting was the headquarters of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which along with the Association of Corporate Counsel, the American Civil Liberties Union, and the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, is gearing up for a lobbying effort against the recently revised changes to the federal sentencing guidelines. They are concerned that investigators with the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission increasingly reward companies that agree to waive privileged communications with their lawyers. In so doing, the government is undermining a long-standing tenet of the U.S. justice system, the right to counsel. The practice, which became more common during the wave of corporate scandals that followed Enron's collapse, effectively forces companies to disclose confidential information they share with their attorneys, the groups maintain. That makes it more difficult for lawyers to learn facts and give sound advice. "A lack of candid communication between executives and their lawyers may lead to more corporate failure," says Fred Kerbs of the ACC. That outcome, says Caroline Fredrickson, legislative director of the ACLU, leaves a lingering "worry that precedents in the corporate arena could turn into problems when individuals are concerned." —EMMA SCHWARTZ

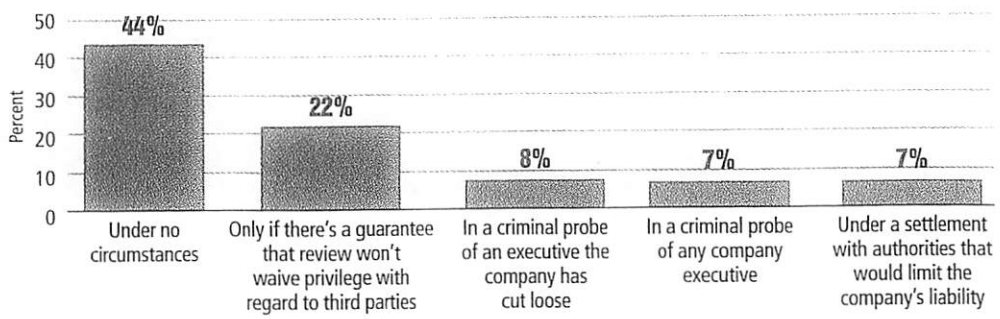
NEED PROOF THAT ATTORNEY-client privilege is under seige? Consider the preliminary results of a survey by the Association of Corporate Counsel. Roughly 30 percent of the 363 in-house attorneys who responded to the online poll say that they've personally experienced a privilege challenge since the wave of corporate fraud scandals started in 2001.



According to ACC, it's the first time that this issue has been quantified. ACC announced the initial results of its survey in April. It's keeping the poll open until August, when it will present its findings to an American Bar Association task force that's looking at the issue.

Lawyers fear a DOJ 'culture of waiver'

Corporate investigations rely too often on waiving privilege, attorneys say.

By Marcia Coyle
STAFF REPORTER

WASHINGTON—A survey of in-house and outside counsel by a coalition of business and legal organizations reports that a "culture of waiver" of the attorney-client privilege now exists in corporate investigations by the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) and other federal agencies.

The survey, conducted in response to a request for data on the issue by the U.S. Sentencing Commission and others, drew responses from 1,400 in-house and outside counsel and was designed to capture more information about government and auditor requests and implicit expectations for privilege and work-product waivers, according to Stephanie Martz of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers (NACDL), a member of the Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege.

"We asked the questions every possible way we could think to capture as much data as we could," said Martz, director of NACDL's white-collar crime project. "We asked whether a privilege waiver was requested directly and unambiguously or indirectly, or whether it was inferred from [government officials'] statements; whether counsel thought requests had increased; whether it was made a condition of cooperation, and which [government] offices were doing it."

The survey results, which were submitted on March 7 to the House Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on crime, terrorism and homeland security, included the following:

- Nearly 75% of both inside and outside counsel agree that a "culture of waiver" has evolved in which government agencies expect a company under investigation to waive legal privileges (1% of in-house counsel and 2.5% of outside counsel disagreed with the statement).
- Of the respondents who confirmed that they or their clients had been subject to investigation in the past five years, approximately 30% of in-house counsel and 51% of outside counsel said that the government expected waiver in order to engage in bargaining or be eligible for more lenient treatment.
- Of those who had been investigated, 55% of outside counsel said the privilege waiver was requested either directly or indirectly; 27% of in-house counsel confirmed that experience.

Eight percent of outside counsel and 3% of in-house counsel said they "inferred it was expected."

At the subcommittee hearing, Associate Attorney General Robert McCallum denied claims by business and legal groups that waiver of the privilege is the norm in Justice Department investigations. "We do not believe [waivers] are routinely requested," he said, adding that there are "many instances" where the department has gotten information without privilege waivers. "Waiver is but one factor in determining cooperation," he said.

Presenting the opposite view were former Attorney General Richard Thornburgh of the Pittsburgh office of Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham; Thomas J. Donohue, president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce; and William M. Sullivan Jr. of Chicago-based Winston & Strawn.

Thornburgh said his firm's partners report that waiver requests are standard practice.

"The trend is to demand waiver as a precondition for favorable treatment for cooperation," said Thornburgh. "This is not an issue that Washington lobbyists have orchestrated."

The survey results are inconsistent with a survey conducted in 2002 by then-U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan from the Pittsburgh U.S. attorney's office. She reported in a law review article:

"The survey results indicate that requests for waivers simply are not the norm," she wrote. "In contrast, those who argue that waivers are required frequently do so on the basis of anecdotes without any supporting data."

Waivers not the norm?

The Justice Department maintains today that waivers are not the norm.

But the Buchanan survey was conducted several years ago and its questions were asked in a very narrow way, said Susan Hackett, senior vice president and general counsel of the Association of Corporate Counsel, also a member of the Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege.

Hackett said that the coalition's more recent and detailed survey supports its contentions that the privilege and the work-product doctrine as applied in the corporate context are under attack.

The NACDL's Martz agreed, saying, "I think the only way DOJ can get its arms around the problem is to accept our survey as accurate or do their own that is every bit as detailed as ours of U.S. attorneys. DOJ should ask: How often have you received information pursuant to a waiver—and work back from there.

"There's really no thing such as a voluntary waiver at this point," Martz insisted. NLJ

INVESTIGATIONS

Ratted Out

That reassuring corporate attorney who asked you a few questions may turn out to be the long arm of the law | By Daniel Fisher and Peter Lattman

THE U.S. SUPREME COURT'S DECISION in May overturning the conviction of Arthur Andersen came too late to save the accounting firm, of course, but the legacy of Andersen and its collapse lives on among fearful corporate executives and tough-talking prosecutors. Accused of illegally shredding documents in the Enron accounting scandal, Andersen maintained its innocence—and got hit with a criminal indictment that drove away its image-conscious customers.

The lesson for corporations: If you play tough with us, we indict you—and then you're dead. So now companies are cooperating with government investigators at the mere threat of indictment, handing over internal documents, waiving the privilege that normally shields attorney-client communications and ratting out individual employees as targets for prosecution.

Shed no tears over corporate miscreants, of whom lately there have been many. "The notion that a company should sit and protect corporate employees who engaged in wrongdoing is patently absurd," says Robert Giuffra, a white-collar-criminal lawyer.

But is it possible that companies are ceding too much power to prosecutors in order to avoid indictments—and shortchanging employees' rights? "There was a time when companies would try to step up to the plate, even try to take a guilty plea to protect their individual employees," says N. Richard Janis, a former assistant U.S. Attorney in Washington, D.C. "Now it's just the opposite."

Time Warner, Merrill Lynch, Computer Associates and Monsanto are among the big companies that have cut so-called deferred prosecution agreements with prosecutors. Under these deals the corporation agrees to turn over to the government whatever it wants, often including communications between lawyers and the executives who hired them. In exchange the government agrees to delay, and ultimately drop, charges.

The talk-or-else rules were laid out in a January 2003 memo by Deputy U.S. Attorney General Larry D. Thompson: Prosecutors could go easy on companies—protecting the jobs of innocent employees—in exchange for cooperation. That cooperation includes "willingness to identify the culprits" and waiving the attorney-client privilege. Companies can do that because the attorney-client privilege is between the employer and the attorney.

convicted in September 2004 and sentenced to 18 months in jail.

Last year an internal investigator for Symbol Technologies was forced to turn against executives in an accounting fraud case. Andrew Levander, a former prosecutor hired by the board, says SEC officials insisted he waive attorney-client privilege covering the executives. "Either you do this investigation right or we'll be tearing this company apart for years," he says the SEC told him. He waited seven months before agreeing and says he now doesn't regret the decision. He uncovered information that led to guilty pleas by six executives; another six face trial in July.

There's a little problem here, says Hackett. By deputizing in-house lawyers as government snitches, prosecutors may be squelching the very type of internal communications companies need to make sure they're complying with the law.

Frank Quattrone found out at trial what was hiding in his employer's files; Hank Greenberg took the Fifth because he didn't know.

Thompson's policy set up a Hobson's choice for employees caught up in an internal investigation: Talk to in-house lawyers and risk that they will tell all to prosecutors (who will come after you later), or get fired for failing to cooperate." If you know the in-house lawyer is a mini-G-man, are you inviting him to important strategic meetings?" says Susan Hackett, senior vice president of the 17,500-member Association of Corporate Counsel.

At his 2003 trial for obstruction of justice, former Credit Suisse First Boston investment banker Frank Quattrone faced a tough adversary: David Brodsky, the general counsel for his former employer. Brodsky testified after CSFB agreed with prosecutors to waive the attorney-client privilege, including a key phone call Brodsky made to Quattrone. After a mistrial Quattrone was Stephen Saltzburg, a former Department of Justice official who now teaches white-collar criminal procedure at George Washington University Law School, says in-house lawyers will typically ask, "What's the worst-case scenario here? What are we facing?" Notes of such a conversation, Saltzburg says, could become a virtual admission of guilt if they indicate the employee recognized the potential illegality of his actions.

Gerald Lefcourt, a New York white-collar defense attorney, says he has a client who can't figure out how to negotiate with the government because his employer has waived attorney-client privilege and he has no idea what might be incriminating. Lefcourt also contends that companies that cooperate too readily with the government also might be able to steer an investigation away from higher-level executives. Corporations "fire people, stop paying their legal fees, do all sorts of things to curry favor with the government," he says.

One of the most devastating tactics is to cut off access to documents an employee needs to prepare a defense. White-collar criminal cases usually come down to whether the defendant knew he was breaking the law. Prosecutors can show this by trundling out e-mails and memos that contradict the defendant's previous statements, as they did in Quattrone's case. Even Maurice (Hank) Greenberg, the powerful former chairman of AIG, felt compelled to assert his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent after the company cut off access to documents he needed to prepare for an interview with SEC investigators.

The atmosphere of mutual suspicion is enough to make an executive think twice about staying in the business. Robert Merritt, the former chief financial officer of Outback Steakhouse, announced his resignation to surprised analysts in April, citing the "recent lunacy" over lease accounting that forced the company to restate earnings. Under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, Merritt notes, even a minor accounting miscue can become a criminal case if e-mails or testimony from an in-house lawyer look suspicious.

"I've made enough money to live on, and putting that at risk wasn't worth it," says Merritt, 53, who retired May 27 after 23 years of working in public companies. "It's extraordinarily easy to step across that line." F

Pressure to Waive Attorney-Client Privilege Is Out

By Lawrence Hurley and Anna Oberthur

Daily Journal Staff Writers

WASHINGTON - The U.S. Sentencing Commission has taken the unusual step of removing language from corporate sentencing guidelines that encouraged prosecutors to force corporations to waive attorney-client privilege.

Previously, judges could reduce sentences for corporations if the privilege was waived, as it was deemed a sign of cooperation with prosecutors.

But after coming under fire from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the American Bar Association and other legal groups, the commission quietly removed the provision last Wednesday.

"That's excellent," Berkeley-based white-collar crime defender Cristina Arguedas said Monday. "It looks like the tide is turning."

It is commonplace in corporate fraud investigations for federal prosecutors to ask company lawyers to turn over privileged information such as the reports stemming from internal audits.

Arguedas, a partner at Arguedas, Cassman &Headley, said the Department of Justice often uses its right to lean on corporations to waive attorney-client privilege "like a bludgeon" instead of exercising its discretion.

The coalition of groups that pushed for the change is now setting its sights on an internal Department of Justice policy that encourages prosecutors to seek privilege waivers when investigating corporations.

"It's going to be an uphill battle," admitted Susan Hackett, senior vice president and general counsel of the Association of Corporate Counsel.

Her group has a meeting at the agency later this week where the matter will be discussed, she revealed.

Hackett said the commission's decision "gives us the ammunition we need to convince the department" to change its policy.

The agency's procedures are listed in what is known as the "Thompson memo," named after its author, former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson.

The memo states that prosecutors should take into account how cooperative a corporation has been before even deciding whether to file charges.

Factors to take into account include "the corporation's timely and voluntary disclosure of wrongdoing and its willingness to cooperate in the investigation of its agents, including, if necessary, the waiver of corporate attorney–client and work product protection," the memo says.

The guidelines allow local departments flexibility in determining when to seek attorney–client privilege waivers.

In San Francisco, at least, "there was a productive exchange between the government and the defense so that waivers weren't necessary as a general rule," said white–collar defense attorney Nanci Clarence, of Clarence &Dyer in San Francisco.

On other hand, it can be harrowing for attorneys handling cases in other parts of the country where federal prosecutors are taking what Clarence called "an overly strict interpretation."

The Department of Justice did not respond by press time to a request for comment on the sentencing commission's decision.

Peter J. Henning, a law professor at Wayne State University Law School in Detroit, said the sentencing commission's decision will matter only if Justice follows its lead. This is because the sentencing commission's guidelines only come into play after a corporation has entered a guilty plea.

That leaves the Department of Justice plenty of opportunities to bargain with corporate players.

"I don't think it will change the way the department does things or the way corporations and their lawyers approach negotiating with the department," Henning said.

Peter Lawson, director of congressional and public affairs at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, also conceded that the commission's decision "won't technically affect ... the vast majority of cases."

But he said it would put pressure on the Department of Justice to change its policy, particularly because both Congress and the federal judges have begun to question it in recent months.

Members of the House Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on crime, terrorism and homeland security held a hearing on the issue in March at which both Democrats and Republicans expressed concern about the policy.

"The reason there's a problem with the Thompson memo is that companies don't have a choice but to settle if they want to stay in business," Lawson said.

He predicts that if the Department of Justice doesn't change its policy, Congress or the judiciary will take action, instead.

For Keith Paul Bishop, a corporate and securities attorney at Buchalter Nemer in Irvine, it reflects a growing concern among lawyers about the erosion of attorney–client privilege.

"It is a real important step in eliminating this overwhelming pressure of companies to waive attorney–client privilege," Bishop said. "It's a big deal."

Although, technically, waivers of attorney–client privilege are not required, in practice it has become almost inevitable that either the U.S. attorney's office or the Securities and Exchange Commission will ask for such a waiver directly or implicitly as an element of cooperation, Bishop said.

"The change itself is small, but the impact will be very large," Bishop said. "It will start to reshape the basic assumption about what cooperation really means, moving away from the assumption that cooperation means a waiver of attorney–client privilege.

American Bar Association President Michael S. Greco would appear to agree with that assessment.

He pointed to the coalition of groups that campaigned for the change, including the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Association of Manufacturers, as a sign of how much importance should be attached to attorney–client privilege.

"The range of viewpoints represented demonstrates how fundamental the attorney–client privilege is to our society, and the shared concern about the government's recent policies to diminish it," Greco added.

Eroding privilege hurts corporate compliance

Pressure to waive privilege dissuades open airing of problems.

By Leonard Post
STAFF REPORTER

FEAR THAT FEDERAL prosecutors will continue to pressure corporations under investigation to waive attorney-client privilege and work-product protections hampers corporate compliance efforts, say two surveys of corporate lawyers released this month.

Putting the squeeze on corporations to waive these rights in exchange for leniency has had unintended effects on corporations trying to comply with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act and other regulations, said Susan Hackett, senior vice president and general counsel of the Association of Corporate Counsel (ACC).

"Prosecutors' efforts are having the perverse opposite effect on our efforts to promote accountability and transparency," Hackett said. "The message they're sending is to shut up and go for deep cover. They're not going to seek out their lawyer anymore when their lawyer could well become Exhibit A for the prosecution."

The U.S. Department of Justice did not return calls seeking comment.

ACC found that 30% of the clients of the 363 in-house lawyers who responded to its survey had "personally experienced" an erosion in protections afforded by attorney-client privilege and the work-product doctrine, since Enron collapsed about four years ago.

That percentage leapt to 47.6% of the clients of the 356 outside counsel who responded to the White Collar Crime Project of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers (NACDL).

Fear of lawyers becoming 'Exhibit A.'

Project director Stephanie Martz asserted that the risk of losing the privilege makes for less candor, and a fear to put things in writing.

"Our efforts are made particularly difficult when lawyers have to begin interviews with employees with Miranda warnings," said Martz. "That's no way to seriously probe for problems and try to solve them."

Waive goodbye

Commentary to Federal Sentencing Guidelines that took effect last November say that failure to waive attorney-client privilege and work-product protections won't be held against an entity or official in scoring points for sentence reductions based on cooperation "unless such waiver is necessary in order to provide timely and thorough disclosure of all pertinent information known to the organization."

That's a giant "unless," said Andrew Good of Boston's Good & Cormier, who often represents corporate officers in criminal matters.

"The practical reality is that the [Department of Justice] policy is to penalize corporate defendants who do not waive attorney-client privilege," asserted Good. "You get a more lenient deal if you do and a less favorable deal if you don't. The exception swallows the rule."

Corporations can avoid being charged at all or can lessen their potential culpability by waiving their attorney-client privilege and work-product protections, according to a January 2003 memo written by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry D. Thompson to department heads.

Thompson, who is now senior vice president, government affairs; general counsel; and secretary of Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo, was not available for comment.

An issue of trust

The surveys, designed by ACC, reflect that in-house and outside counsel see pretty much the same landscape. About 96% of those surveyed agreed that the privilege improves a lawyer's ability to monitor, enforce and/or improve a company's compliance initiatives. The crux of any attorney-client relationship is trust, said Laura Stein, general counsel of Oakland, Calif.-based cleaning products maker The Clorox Co., and chairwoman of ACC's advocacy committee. And that's not diminished by the fact that a client is a corporation.

"It is crucial to encourage employees of the client to feel comfortable discussing even the most sensitive matters," said Stein. "Which will lead to greater compliance."

Ninety-three percent of in-house counsel believe that their senior-level corporate clients rely on the privilege. Barry Nagler, general counsel of Pawtucket, R.I.-based toy maker Hasbro Inc. and ACC's treasurer, explained why.

"In-house counsel are uniquely engaged in the front end of decision-making and can prevent bad things from happening," said Nagler. "But you can't stop what you don't know."

NACDL and ACC filed separate amicus briefs in the appeal by the Arthur Andersen accounting firm from its criminal conviction for obstruction of justice. That conviction—which was effectively a death sentence for the company—was based on advice the firm got from an in-house counsel. Andersen v. U.S., No. 04-368 (5th Cir.). Granting Corporate Attorney-Client Privilege Waiver Standard Operating Procedure, Survey of Lawyers Says

Three out of four lawyers in corporate practice believe that federal prosecutors and agencies routinely demand wholesale waivers of attorney-client and work-product privileges during corporate investigations as proof that the entity is cooperating in good faith, according to a new survey jointly released March 6 by the Association of Corporate Counsel and the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers.

Labeling the government approach a "culture of waiver," lawyers responding to the survey complained that the erosion of legal privileges undermines the confidence that corporate clients have in seeking advice from counsel and opens the company up to liability to third parties.

"This survey refutes the arguments made by the Justice Department that requests for these waivers are not common, that they are appropriately requested, that they are rare, and that they are vital to the department's work," Susan Hackett, counsel for the Association of Corporate Counsel in Washington, D.C., said in a March 7 news conference.

Coalition Report

The survey report, titled "The Decline of the Attorney-Client Privilege in the Corporate Context," focuses on answers provided by 676 in-house lawyers and 538 outside counsel who responded to an online questionnaire. The survey featured 23 questions, most of them of the yes/no variety or multiple choice. Four of the queries were open-ended and solicited written details.

The survey was sponsored by the Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege, an alliance of business and legal groups that includes the ACC, NACDL, the American Chemistry Council, the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Association of Manufacturers, and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The results were submitted to the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism, and Homeland Security, which held a hearing March 7 on whether government demands are undermining the organizations' attorney-client privilege.

"This survey refutes the arguments made by the Justice Department that requests for these waivers are not common."

SUSAN HACKETT,
COUNSEL FOR THE ASSOCIATION OF CORPORATE COUNSEL,
WASHINGTON, D.C.

Round Two

In April 2005, the ACC and NACDL published separate surveys indicating corporate attorneys' belief that the attorney-client privilege is eroding due to increased government and law enforcement demands that organizations prove cooperation by waiving the privilege (20 CCW 123, 4/20/05).

The sponsors of last year's surveys presented their results to the U.S. Sentencing Commission, which was in the process of re-examining commentary language in its guidelines for organizational sentencing. Some corporate counsel have said that this language forces corporations to waive the attorney-client and work product privileges in order to receive mitigation for cooperating with the government.

Application Note 12 to Section 8C2.5 of the sentencing guidelines provides that, to qualify for a reduction in sentence, the corporation's cooperation must be timely and thorough, and that "thorough" cooperation should include "the disclosure of all pertinent information known by the organization."

According to this year's ACC/NACDL report, the Sentencing Commission responded by requesting additional information on the frequency with which the government has been asking companies to waive attorney-client and work-product protections. The commission has set March 28 as the deadline for receiving additional comment.

'Culture of Waiver'

The report identified several recurring themes in the responses it received:

- No Secrets. Nearly 75 percent of the responding lawyers agreed that the government has developed a "culture of waiver" in which it is routinely expected that a company under investigation will broadly waive legal privileges to demonstrate that the entity is cooperating with investigators. According to one survey respondent, "Whether to waive the privilege has not been subject to discussion; the only question is how far the waiver will go."
- Quid Pro Quo. More than half the respondents reported that the government has increasingly required waiver of legal privileges as a condition of favorable treatment. Approximately 30 percent of in-house counsel and 51 percent of outside counsel confirmed that in the past five years the government expected waiver in order for a company to engage in bargaining or become eligible for more lenient treatment. "Federal prosecutors in particular have begun to treat waiver as almost synonymous with cooperation," one lawyer wrote.
- Do Ask, Do Tell. Nearly three-quarters of outside counsel and about two-thirds of in-house respondents said that waiver expectations were communicated through direct or indirect statements by prosecutors or enforcement officials. One lawyer complained that an assistant U.S. attorney "stated that asserting the attorney-client privilege was inconsistent with cooperation."

■ Collateral Damage. Attorneys reported that 15 percent of the companies that underwent a government investigation within the past five years indicated that the investigation triggered third-party civil lawsuits.

Widespread Problem

According to the report, less than 1 percent of in-house counsel who responded to the survey worked for Fortune 1000 clients or employers, and only 12 percent of the outside counsel worked for publicly traded companies with more than $1 billion in annual revenue.

This demographic, the report says, "be[lies] the conclusion that waiver requests, demands, and expectations are a problem only for large, publicly-traded companies who are at the center of 'headline' scandals."

CORPORATE CRIME REPORTER

Corporate Lawyers Launch Attack on "Culture of Waiver"
20 Corporate Crime Reporter 11(1), March 6, 2006

Corporate lawyers will launch an attack tomorrow on what they are calling the "culture of waiver" they believe is weakening the corporate attorney-client privilege.

The attack is being spearheaded by a number of major big business groups – including the American Chemistry Council, the Business Roundtable, the Financial Services Roundtable, the National Defense Industrial Association and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

And it's being coordinated by the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers (NACDL) and the Association of Corporate Counsel (ACC).

Tomorrow, the House Judiciary Committee Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism and Homeland Security will hold a hearing on the matter.

Three of the four witness – Dick Thornburgh of Kirkpatrick & Lockhart, William Sullivan of Winston & Strawn, and Thomas Donahue, the CEO of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce -- will present the corporate side of the issue.

Associate Attorney General Robert McCallum will present the government's side – which is, in a nutshell – we don't demand waivers of corporate attorney/client privilege.

The centerpiece of the corporate attack is a survey of NACDL's 13,000 members and ACC's 4,700 members.

The survey was put together by Stephanie Martz of the NACDL and Susan Hackett of ACCA.

Martz said that the Crime Subcommittee hearing grew out of a conference held in November 2005 by the NACDL and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

At the conference, Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner (R-Wisconsin) expressed interest in a hearing on the subject of waiver of corporate attorney-client privilege.

When asked whether legislation was in the offing, Martz said – "not so far."

"But oversight by House and Senate Judiciary Committees will certainly have some effect," Martz said. "I don't know whether they would ask for more reporting, or request better guidelines. Our preliminary conversations with members of the Crime Subcommittee indicate that more hearings are probably in the offing."

The survey found that almost 75 percent of both inside and outside counsel agreed that a "'culture of waiver' has evolved in which governmental agencies believe it is reasonable and appropriate for them to expect a company under investigation to broadly waive attorney-client privilege or work product protections.

The survey also found that:

* Fifty-two percent of in-house respondents and 59 percent of outside respondents said they believe that there has been a marked increase in waiver requests as a condition of cooperation.

* Of the respondents who confirmed that they or their clients had been subject to investigation in the last five years, approximately 30 percent of in-house respondents and 51 percent of outside respondents said that the government expected waiver in order to engage in bargaining or to be eligible to receive more favorable treatment.

* Of those who have been investigated, 55% of outside counsel responded that waiver of the attorney-client privilege was requested by enforcement officials either directly or indirectly. Twenty-seven percent of in-house counsel confirmed this to be true.

The survey results directly contradict a 2002 survey conducted by Mary Beth Buchanan, the U.S. Attorney in Pittsburgh, of all 94 U.S. Attorney's offices.

That survey found that waivers were requested in only a handful of cases.

"The survey results indicate that requests for waivers simply are not the norm," Buchanan wrote in 2004. "In contrast, those who argue that waivers are required frequently do so on the basis of anecdotes without any supporting data."

How can the results of both surveys be true?

"It could be that the truth is somewhere in between," Martz said. "Inside and outside lawyers feel such pressure to waive that they waive whenever there is a problem and before waiver is requested."

"But I would still lay the blame at the door of the government," Martz said. "In its survey, the government asked the U.S. Attorneys – do you formally request privilege waivers on a routine basis?"

"Well, they could all say no and still be asking on a periodic basis," Martz said. "Or they could say to themselves – I didn't ask, but I did emphasis the Thompson factors. Or, I didn't ask, but I did explain that they might get more favorable treatment if they waived."

Re: Follow up pursuant to the testimony of the Coalition to Preserve the Attorney Client Privilege: Request for changes to the commentary language of Section 8C2.5 regarding waiver of the attorney-client privilege.

Dear Commissioners and Staff:

On behalf of the Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege,[1] please accept our thanks for allowing us time to present our views to you on March 15, 2006, during Panel Three of your hearings schedule.

You have our testimony – both oral and written, as well as the document providing the results of our privilege survey of in-house and outside lawyers. On March 28, we are filing under separate cover a formal comment letter on behalf of this Coalition, as well. And of course, you have our previous testimonies and submissions.

I only wish to offer one follow-up from our testimony based on the back-and-forth discussion with the Commissioners. Ex-Officio Commissioner Michael Elston of the Department of Justice challenged our testimony regarding the statement of Associate Attorney General Robert McCallum before Members of Congress at the March 7, 2006, House Judiciary Committee Subcommittee hearings on the erosion of the attorney client privilege. The Coalition noted it its testimony to you that Mr. McCallum suggested at the Congressional hearing that the Department of Justice would not challenge the removal of the privilege waiver language; Mr. Elston suggested that our report of that hearing was incorrect, and that our statement that Mr. McCallum was retracting what he told Congress when he testified before the Sentencing Commission earlier in the morning on March 15 was inappropriate.

While we did not wish to argue the issue further at the hearing and while we certainly do not dispute what Mr. McCallum told the Commission on March 15 during its first panel of speakers (namely, that the Department would object to any changes in the language), we think it important for the Commission to know what it is that Mr. McCallum actually did say to the Congress on March 7, since the Members who were pressing him on waiver issues eased off their questioning on the Sentencing Guidelines language after he made the following statement. (And Representative Lundgren was not the only Member who mentioned concern about the Sentencing Guidelines' privilege waiver language – see our March 28 submission for more quotes from other Members of the House.) Members of Congress who were present at this hearing and who oversee the work of this Commission may have reason to believe that the privilege waiver language will not be a continuing issue of contention as a result of Mr. McCallum's statements.

We have produced the relevant text of the preliminary transcript for your reference below. (The final transcript of this session is not available to us to submit with this letter.)

Beginning at line 1295 and ending at line 1325 of the preliminary transcript of the Office of the Clerk of the U.S. House [White Collar Enforcement (Part I): Attorney-Client Privilege and Corporate Waivers, Tuesday, March, 7, 2006, House of Representatives, Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism, and Homeland Security, Committee on the Judiciary, Washington, DC]:

> Mr. Lundgren: ... And here you have a situation where you want a corporation to follow the law, I presume. And you would want the corporation to listen to good counsel, I would think. And here we have got a rule that seems to me to work in the opposite direction.
> And I think that that weighs heavy on me and other members here on this panel. And so I would ask, don't you see the creeping intrusion here? I mean, first you have the first memorandum. Now we have the second memorandum, which is a little tighter and a little tougher. And then, following that, you have the Sentencing Commission saying, well, that is a bad idea. As a matter of fact, we are going to have that as evidence of cooperation, and the lack of it as evidence of lack of cooperation.
> What is a corporate counsel to do under those circumstances?

Chairman Coble, members of the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism and Homeland Security, we appreciate the opportunity to submit the following statement for the record of today's hearing to examine the erosion of the attorney-client privilege in the corporate context.

It is our firm belief that the attorney-client privilege in the corporate context has been significantly weakened in recent years due largely to current Justice Department investigative policies and practices and recent amendments to the U.S. Sentencing Guidelines that put companies in the position of having to waive their attorney-client privilege during federal investigations in order to receive credit, during charging and sentencing decisions, for having fully cooperated with the authorities. This statement explains our concerns, and provides the Subcommittee with historical context for the importance of the attorney-client privilege.

Background and Importance of the Attorney-Client Privilege

Attorney-client confidentiality is the foundation of the relationship between a lawyer and client. The attorney-client privilege is essentially an evidentiary or procedural right recognized by the courts when one party to litigation or other adversarial matter wishes to exclude documents or communications from the other party's requested production of the first party's files, when those files include attorney-client confidences. But increasingly, demands to waive the attorney-client privilege are being made outside the authority and oversight of the courts; increasingly, privilege waiver demands are unilaterally made by prosecutors, enforcement officials, and third-party plaintiffs. Those demanding such waivers of the privilege believe they are entitled to everything and anything that may assist them in investigating potential misconduct at the company, even if the information is privileged. Even corporate auditors are demanding to see privileged information as the price of a "clean" audit letter.

While lawyers are generally bound by rules of professional ethics [1] to preserve their clients' confidences, it is the attorney-client privilege that allows a client to assert the right to the confidentiality of its conversations with counsel. While the workings of the privilege are more familiar in the context of an individual who, confronted with a threat of prosecution or suit, consults a lawyer and expects that the content of their conversations will be confidential, the U.S. Supreme Court confirmed that corporations are similarly entitled to the protections of the privilege in the landmark case of Upjohn Co. v. United States.[2]

The main general exceptions to the clients' rights to maintain the privileged status of conversations with their attorneys are:

• the crime-fraud exception (the privilege cannot apply to conversations in which the lawyer's advice or services will be used in furtherance of a crime or fraud); and

• the exception for discovery of communications that the client previously waived through disclosure to any non-privileged party; such a disclosure can invalidate the client's right to invoke the privilege's protections against other third parties who demand production of the communications in the future.[3]

Privilege In The Post Sarbanes-Oxley Environment

While nothing has technically changed in the laws governing the application of the privilege in the corporate context in recent years, past corporate accounting scandals have raised concerns about the need for corporations to operate in a more transparent and accountable fashion. However, we believe that weakening the attorney-client privilege is counterproductive to the ultimate twin goals of promoting corporate compliance and rewarding corporate self-reporting.

Since lawyers employed or retained by a corporation represent the entity (rather than individual employees, officers or directors), they are particularly aware of the need to protect the privilege. Corporate counsel find that privilege is essential to successfully counseling those officers and employees on compliance and ethics in the daily conduct of business. In order to perform their functions optimally, corporate lawyers must be included in executive corporate decision-making. Success requires that they encourage clients to take a moment, and seek legal advice in an increasingly fast paced, competitive, complex and regulated business environment.

The privilege allows corporate counsel to advise against poor choices and help clients understand the adverse legal implications of suggested activities without fear that their sensitive conversations will be made public in the future. Furthermore, it provides an important incentive to those with relevant information or concerns about possible wrongdoing to share what they know with their counsel, who can then advise them and the company to pursue remedial actions and proactively prevent similar problems in the future.

[3] We have provided a more detailed explanation of the privilege and its application as Attachment A.

If employees believe that the attorney-client privilege will not protect the confidentiality of those conversations, conversations that are in the company's best interests and continued legal health will likely not occur. As the Supreme Court declared in the Upjohn case – "An uncertain privilege . . . is little better than no privilege at all.[4]

Privilege Waiver Requests Are on the Rise

Demands for waiver of privilege fall into four main categories:

1. the prosecutorial context (involving the Department of Justice, U.S. attorneys or state attorneys general);
2. the regulatory context (most commonly with the SEC);
3. the adversarial civil litigation context (in which the other side is demanding access to privileged or work-product material as a matter of right); and
4. the corporate audits context (as the company's external auditors seek to comply with the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board's excessive interpretation of Sarbanes-Oxley internal controls requirements).

Unfortunately, waiver of privilege to any one of these groups opens these same files to the potential future discovery demands of any third party seeking the same or even related information stemming from the same matter for most any other purpose. Attempts to craft a limited waiver agreement (through the execution of a confidentiality agreement) with government investigators or prosecutors would not be enforceable in most jurisdictions when subsequent document production demands were made.

The Government is Contributing to Privilege Erosion

In recent years[5], particularly on the federal level, criminal law enforcement and regulatory authorities have adopted policies and employed practices and procedures that suggest that if corporations disclose documents and information that are protected by the corporate attorney-client privilege and work-product doctrine, they will receive credit for "cooperation." While this sounds like an option that a company can choose to exercise or not, the reality is that corporations have no practical choice but to comply with this waiver demand. In federal criminal cases against companies, prosecutors' ability to assert a need for waiver is reinforced by both the Justice Department's internal policies on charging decisions (the Thompson Memorandum[6]), as well as a provision of the Federal Sentencing Guidelines

[5] Former leaders of the Department of Justice have testified in alignment with our coalition that the aggressive waiver policies in play today were not the norm during their tenures, and are not only unnecessary to accomplishing the Department's goals, but deplorable and inappropriate. See, e.g., the testimony of former Attorney General Dick Thornburgh before the US Sentencing Commission at http://www.ussc.gov/corp/11_15_05/Thornburgh.pdf; and the submitted statement of nine former senior DOJ officials, including former Attorneys General, Deputy Attorneys General and Solicitors General, attached to this filing because the Commission did not post it to its website.

[6] Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson issued a 2003 memorandum that addressed the principles of federal prosecution of business organizations. (Memorandum from Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson to Heads of Department Components and U.S. Attorneys, "Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations" (Jan. 20, 2003) (available at http://www.usdoj.gov/dag/cftf/corporate_guidelines.htm). The which suggests that prosecutors can demand waiver of privilege if they feel that it is important to making their case.[7] In the case of the SEC, the precedent of the "Seaboard Report" and the SEC's Enforcement Division's focus on lawyers as needed "gatekeepers" are emphasized.[8] Furthermore, the SEC's strategies are being imitated by other agencies, such as the IRS, the DOL, the EPA, the FEC and others.

Even prosecutors who traditionally recognized that criminal charges ought to be rarely applied against corporate entities now often employ the threat of criminal prosecution of the entity to secure the company's assistance in their criminal investigations and prosecutions of individuals who are actually responsible for malfeasance and the target of the government's probe. Because recent cases of corporate failures are complex, the size and sophistication of the government's investigations into complex frauds has increased correspondingly. This build-up has placed tremendous public pressure on prosecutors to obtain convictions of bad actors, which has lead many prosecutors to look for ways to coerce the "assistance" of companies under investigation.

Formerly, a company could show cooperation by providing access to both relevant documents and information and to the company's workplace and employees. The definition of a company's "cooperation" did not entail production of legally privileged communications and attorneys' litigation work product. Under current practices, in order to convince the prosecutor or regulator that the company is cooperating with the investigation, and indeed

Thompson Memorandum (which updates the "Holder Memorandum," originated by one of his predecessors, Eric Holder) lists nine factors that federal prosecutors should consider when charging companies. One of the nine factors is the corporation's "timely and voluntary disclosure of wrongdoing and its willingness to cooperate in the investigation of its agents, including, if necessary, the waiver of corporate attorney-client and work product protections." This provision in practice is interpreted to require that companies routinely identify and hand over damaging documents, disclose the results of internal investigations, furnish the text and results of interviews with company officers and employees, and agree to waive attorney-client and work product protections in the course of their cooperation.

[7] Amendments made to the US Sentencing Guidelines, which became effective in November of 2004, state that in order to qualify for a reduction in sentence for providing assistance to a government investigation, a corporation is required to waive confidentiality protections if "such waiver is necessary in order to provide timely and thorough disclosure of all pertinent information known to the organization." (U.S. Sentencing Guidelines Manual § 8C2.5 (2004) (emphasis added) (available at http://www.ussc.gov/2004guid/8c2_5.htm.)

[8] Federal regulators, and particularly the SEC, have begun to adopt policies and practices mirroring those of the Department of Justice, which while discussing "cooperation credit," mention disclosures of protected confidential information. See, e.g., the Seaboard Report, ["Report of Investigation Pursuant to Section 21(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and Commission Statement on the Relationship of Cooperation to Agency Enforcement Decisions," Exch. Act Rel. No. 44969 (Oct. 23, 2001)]; in the Seaboard Report, the SEC outlined some of the criteria that it considers when assessing the extent to which a company's self-policing and cooperation efforts will influence its decision to bring an enforcement action against a company for federal securities law violations. The concern that waiver of the attorney-client privilege and work-product protections are now viewed as necessary elements evidencing a company's cooperation is bolstered by public remarks made by former SEC enforcement chief Stephen Cutler, in his remarks made during a program discussing the changing role of lawyers in remedying corporate wrongdoing during a presentation at UCLA's Law School in the Fall of 2004 ("The Themes of Sarbanes-Oxley as reflected in the Commission's Enforcement Program," (September 20, 2004) (transcript available at http://www.sec.gov/news/speech/spch092004smc.htm.)

to avoid being accused of engaging in obstructionist behavior, companies are told directly or indirectly to waive their privileges.

While the DOJ repeatedly states that cooperation and waiver of the privilege is only one of the nine criteria they examine under the Thompson Memorandum, and is rarely determinative, our surveys suggest otherwise. Furthermore, we do not believe the DOJ has done enough to promote reliable and enforceable internal guidelines interpreting the purpose of this policy, when it is to be applied, and what safeguards should be in place to prevent abuse. Coalition constituents tell us that privilege waiver is inevitably the pivotal consideration that determines whether a company will be able survive prosecution in a manner that will allow it to return to its business at the conclusion of the investigation, even if the government finds that no further prosecution is warranted.

Waiver of the Privilege has had a Negative Impact

The Department of Justice has maintained that the privilege is not in danger, primarily because DOJ very rarely seeks waivers.[9] Confident that this contention is incorrect, the Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege, which includes organizations that have signed this statement, decided to collect empirical data on the prevalence of waiver requests, as well as other indicators of the current health of the attorney-client privilege.

To accomplish our goal, we conducted several surveys to collect information about privilege erosion in 2005. In the first survey, over 700 corporate lawyers gave their perspectives on the privilege and its application in the corporate context. Over 350 responses came from corporate counsel, many of them general counsel and the remainder came from outside counsel who specialize primarily in white collar criminal defense. We were struck by the strong response rate, and the unanimity of the message sent by respondents from different disciplines. The following are the results from our survey:[10]

- Reliance on privilege: In-house lawyers confirmed that their clients are aware of and rely on privilege when consulting them (93% affirmed this statement for senior-level employees; 68% for mid and lower-tier employees).

- Absent privilege, clients will be less candid: If the privilege does not offer protection, in-house lawyers believe there will be a "chill" in the flow or candor of information from clients (95%); indeed, in-house respondents stated that clients are far more sensitive as to whether the privilege and its protections apply when the issue is highly sensitive (236 of 363), and when the issue might impact the employee personally (189 of 363).

[10] An executive summary of this survey and its results is online at http://www.acca.com/Surveys/attyclient.pdf.

- Privilege facilitates delivery of legal services: 96% of in-house counsel respondents said that the privilege and work-product doctrines serve an important purpose in facilitating their work as company counsel.

- Privilege enhances the likelihood that clients will proactively seek advice: 94% of in-house counsel respondents believe that the existence of the attorney-client privilege enhances the likelihood that company employees will come forward to discuss sensitive/difficult issues regarding the company's compliance with law.

- Privilege improves the lawyer's ability to guarantee effective compliance initiatives: 97% of corporate counsel surveyed believe that the mere existence of the privilege improves the lawyer's ability to monitor, enforce, and/or improve company compliance initiatives.

Struck by the responses to our survey, the United States Sentencing Commission, which is reviewing its 2004 decision to include new privilege waiver language in its organizational sentencing guidelines, asked us to conduct further research in several areas of particular interest. We offer you today the results of this new survey, which are being unveiled for these hearings; they are attached and at the end of this document.

In brief, this second survey[11], found:

- A Government Culture of Waiver Exists: Almost 75% of both inside and outside counsel who responded to this question expressed agreement (almost 40% agreeing strongly) with a statement that a "'culture of waiver' has evolved in which governmental agencies believe it is reasonable and appropriate for them to expect a company under investigation to broadly waive attorney-client privilege or work product protections." (Only 1% of inside counsel and 2.5 % of outside counsel disagreed with the statement.)
- 'Government Expectation'[12] of Waiver of Attorney-Client Privilege Confirmed: Of the respondents who confirmed that they or their clients had been subject to investigation in the last five years, approximately 30% of in-house respondents and 51% of outside respondents said that the government expected waiver in order to engage in bargaining or to be eligible to receive more favorable treatment.
- Prosecutors Typically Request Privilege Waiver – It Is Rarely "Inferred" by Counsel: Of those who have been investigated, 55% of outside counsel responded that waiver of the attorney-client privilege was requested by enforcement officials either directly or indirectly. Twenty-seven percent of in-house counsel confirmed this to be true (60% of in-house counsel responded that they were not directly involved with waiver requests). Only 8% percent of outside counsel and 3% of in-house counsel said that they "inferred it was expected."

[11] The second survey's results are online at http://www.acca.com/Surveys/attyclient2.pdf.

[12] The survey defined 'government expectation' of waiver as a demand, suggestion, inquiry or other showing of expectation by the government that the company should waive the attorney-client privilege.

- DOJ Policies Rank First, Sentencing Guidelines Second Among Reasons Given For Waiver Demands: Outside counsel indicated that the Thompson/Holder/McCallum Memoranda are cited most frequently when a reason for waiver is provided by an enforcement official, and the Sentencing Guidelines are cited second. In-house counsel placed the Guidelines third, behind "a quick and efficient resolution of the matter" (1) and DOJ policies (2).
- Third Party Civil Suits Among Top Consequences of Government Investigations: Fifteen percent of companies that experienced a governmental investigation within the past 5 years indicated that the investigation generated related third-party civil suits (such as private antitrust suits or derivative securities law suits). Of the eight response options that asked respondents to list the ultimate consequences of their clients' investigations, related third-party civil suits rated third for in-house lawyers. The first and second most common outcomes for in-house counsel were that the government decided not to pursue the matter further (24%), or that the company engaged in a civil settlement with the government to avoid further prosecution (18%). For outside counsel, the most cited outcome was criminal charges against individual leaders/employees of the company (18%), and a decision by the government not to prosecute (14%). "Related third party civil litigation" finished fifth (for outside counsel respondents) with 12%.

Faced with this evidence of privilege erosion and increasingly successful (coerced) unilateral government waiver demands, we conclude that the government believes it has a right to determine when clients can and cannot exert their Constitutional privilege rights.

Privilege erosions are almost inevitable in situations where prosecutors have immense leverage and companies very little; a company's failure to "cooperate" could have severe impact on its reputation, its financial well-being and even its very existence. While companies have a good reason to complain about forced or coerced waiver of their privileges, lawyers who advise their clients to take a stand and fight against privilege erosions are potentially subjecting the company to a long, costly, and hostile prosecution, at the end of which the client will have paid dearly even if it is ultimately acquitted.

Faced with such situations, many corporations will conclude that the protection of their privileged communications and files is not worth risking the negative publicity that could follow the company's stark refusal to divulge its "secret" conversations with its lawyers in asserting privilege.[13] Though a difficult decision, companies must consider the affect of asserting privilege in these situations on the company's shareholders or investors, customers and suppliers, and its standing in the marketplace.

The Role of Congress in Protecting the Attorney-Client Privilege

In the Subcommittee's continued oversight, we ask you to join us in sending a message to the Department of Justice that the Thompson Memorandum is inconsistent with the [13] Unfortunately, a decision to waive for the short-term gain of "getting along" with a current prosecution could also be later questioned if the results of waiver are even more devastating further down the road in an unrelated third party action. Boards and executives know that civil suits ensuing after the "successful" completion of a settlement with the government can have more damaging effects on the company's long-term viability than the instant matter.

foundational role of the attorney-client privilege in our system of justice, and that the prosecutorial powers regarding privilege exercised thereunder are inappropriate. The attorney-client privilege is a client's right under our legal system, and its application serves the purposes of corporate compliance, self-reporting, and corporate responsibility. Privilege waiver should not be coerced or even considered when assessing whether a corporation is cooperating in an investigation or can qualify for leniency. We believe that Congress should send a clear message to the federal prosecutors at the Department of Justice and other regulatory agencies that companies and their employees should not be punished for preserving their rights to exercise their attorney-client privileges. Further, we believe Congress should hold further hearings to request that the Department of Justice provide more meaningful information on privilege waiver requests by prosecutors and its progress in policing the practices of US attorneys in the field.

Similarly, we urge Congress to request similar changes to similar procedural enforcement powers exercised at the SEC. We agree that aggressive enforcement of wrongdoing and harsh penalties for wrongdoers is appropriate, but stripping clients of their privilege rights – especially when it is clear that even when provided under a confidentiality agreement, privilege waiver may be irreversible in many jurisdictions – is not a necessary or appropriate tactic for an agency to employ in the course of an investigation, even before any finding of entity complicity or culpability for a failure is made.

Finally, we urge the Subcommittee to communicate these concerns to the United States Sentencing Commission as it engages in its current process of reconsidering the 2004 amendment to the Guidelines' commentary language, which the Justice Department views as codifying its policy of requesting privilege waiver routinely as an emblem of cooperation. The waiver of the right to effective and meaningful legal counsel is not an appropriate demand to make of a defendant, and should not be the standard by which the courts determine whether an entity has properly facilitated the government's investigation of charges against individuals or the entity.

ATTACHMENT A

The Attorney-Client Privilege and its Operation in the Corporate Legal Setting

Following is a working definition of the attorney-client privilege and how it applies in the corporate context. Before the privilege can attach to a client's communication with its attorney, the following requirements must be satisfied:

- The entity that wishes to hold the privilege must be the lawyer's client.
- The person to whom the client's communication is made must be a member of the bar of a court or a subordinate of such a person.
- The lawyer to whom the communication is made must be acting as a lawyer (and not, for instance, as a business person).
- The communication must be made without non-client and non-essential third parties present (it could be made, for instance, at a crowded restaurant, but not at a table with other non-client folks around to overhear; it could be conducted as an email exchange, but not if non-client, "unnecessary" parties are cc'ed or are forwarded the email later).
- The communication must be made for the purpose of securing legal services or assistance, and not for the purpose of committing a crime or fraud.
- The client must claim and not waive the privilege.[14]

While the privilege will attach to almost all communications that satisfy these requirements, what it protects is actually very narrow in scope. The privilege does not protect the client from the discovery through other means and sources of any relevant facts. It just protects the "consult." Indeed, one of the best arguments in favor of privilege protection is precisely that it doesn't prevent anyone from discovering all the facts necessary to make their case, whatever that may be: it simply requires the government or a civil litigant to do their own work to prove their case, so as not to deprive the client's ability to communicate openly with its attorney.

If the application of the privilege to a conversation, documents or a written communication between lawyer and client is challenged, the party claiming the benefit of the privilege has the burden of proving its applicability.[15]

The related "work product doctrine" offers qualified protection for materials prepared by or for an attorney when litigation is anticipated (even if the litigation never arises or ends up taking on a different form). Attorney work product material can enjoy the same level of protection as attorney-client privileged materials, but if the work product does not disclose

[14] These criteria were laid down by the court in United States v. United States Mach. Corp., 89 F. Supp. 357, 358-59 (D. Mass. 1950), and have set the standard for privilege qualification ever since.

[15] Federal Trade Commission v. Lukens Steel Co., 444 F.Supp. 803 (D.D.C. 1977).

the mental impressions of the attorney, a court may order its production if good cause for the documents' production is established (such as it would be unreasonable or impossible for the other side to replicate the work on their own).

One of the most contentious and difficult issues for companies concerned about privilege issues is the production of the internal investigation notes of the company's lawyers (and their agents). Many companies self-investigate and self-report problems and the number of self-reports are increasing as a result of Sarbanes-Oxley and related legislation and regulation at the federal, state and agency levels. But self-reporting a problem, by its very nature, confirms to an adversary or prosecutor that the ideal place to begin their evaluation of the company's problems would be a thorough review of the company's internal investigation and any communications made between lawyers and the company regarding the failure. Producing these investigation summaries and reports entails the disgorgement of the attorney's work product and attorney-client confidences, and the U.S. Supreme Court set forth the standard for protecting such work from discovery in Hickman v. Taylor.[16]

The attorney work product doctrine suggests that it is unfair for the other side to have access to another party's attorney's thought process, her impressions and thoughts, and even her strategies in unlocking and mapping her potential case by the selection of which employees to interview (and which to skip); which files she reviews, and so on.

House Judiciary Committee
Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism, and Homeland Security
Oral testimony on Attorney-Client privilege
By Thomas J. Donohue
President & CEO, U.S. Chamber of Commerce

Rayburn House Office Building
March 7, 2006

- Good afternoon, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. My name is Tom Donohue. I am president and CEO of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the world's largest business federation, representing some 3 million businesses.

- I am also here today on behalf of the Coalition to Preserve the Attorney Client Privilege, which includes most of the major legal and business associations in the country, including:

  - The American Chemistry Council
  - The American Civil Liberties Union
  - The Association of Corporate Counsel
  - Business Civil Liberties, Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0141664

- The Business Roundtable
- The Financial Services Roundtable
- Frontiers of Freedom
- The National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers
- The National Association of Manufacturers
- The National Defense Industrial Association
- Retail Industry Leaders Association
- The U.S. Chamber of Commerce; and
- The Washington Legal Foundation

- I should add that the coalition is working closely with the American Bar Association, which has separately submitted written testimony here today detailing its concerns about the erosion of attorney-client privilege. ABA policy prevents the organization from being listed as a member of broader coalitions.

- The privilege to consult with an attorney freely, candidly, and confidentially is a fundamental Constitutional right that is under attack.

- Recent policy changes at the Department of Justice and the SEC have permitted and encouraged the government to demand or expect companies to waive their attorney-client privilege or work-product protections during an investigation.

- A company is required to waive its privilege in order to be seen as cooperating with federal investigators.

- A company that refuses to waive its privilege risks being labeled as uncooperative, which all but guarantees that it will not get a settlement or receive leniency in their sentencing or fine.

- But it goes far beyond that. The "uncooperative" label can severely damage a company's brand, shareholder value, their relationships with suppliers and customers, and their very ability to survive.

- The enforcement agencies argue that waiver of attorney-client privilege is necessary for improving compliance and conducting effective and thorough investigations.

- The opposite is true. An uncertain or unprotected attorney-client privilege actually diminishes compliance with the law.

- If company employees responsible for compliance with complicated statutes and regulations know that their conversations with attorneys are not protected, they will simply choose not to seek legal guidance.

- The result is that the company may fall out of compliance – not intentionally – but because of a lack of communication and trust between the company's employees and its attorneys.

- Similarly, during an investigation, if employees suspect that anything they say to their attorneys can be used against them, they won't say anything at all.

- That means that both the company and the government will be unable to find out what went wrong, punish the wrongdoers, and correct the company's compliance system.

- And there's one other major consequence – once the privilege is waived, third party private plaintiffs' lawyers can gain access to attorney-client conversations and use them to sue the company or obtain massive settlements.

- How pervasive has the waiving of attorney-client privilege become?

- Last November, we presented findings to the U.S. Sentencing Commission showing that approximately one-third of inside counsel respondents – and as much as 48% of outside counsel respondents – said they had personally experienced erosion of attorney-client privilege or work-product protections.

- This was according to a survey by the Association of Corporate Counsel and the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers.

- After that presentation, the Sentencing Commission asked us for even more information about the frequency of waivers and their impact.

- So our coalition commissioned a second, more detailed survey and got an even greater response rate from the members of our coalition partners.

- We publicly released the results of this second survey just yesterday. They have been provided to the Committee, along with a more detailed coalition written statement. Here are a few highlights:

    - Almost 75% of both inside and outside counsel agree with the statement that a "culture of waiver" has evolved to the point that governmental agencies believe it is reasonable and appropriate to expect a company under investigation to broadly waive attorney-client privilege or waiver protections.

    - Of the respondents who confirmed that they or their clients had been subject to investigation in the last five years, approximately 30% of in-house respondents and 51% of outside respondents said that the government expected wavier in order to engage in bargaining or to be eligible to receive more favorable treatment.

- Of those who have been investigated, 55% of outside counsel responded that waiver of the attorney-client privilege was requested by enforcement officials either directly or indirectly. Twenty-seven percent of in-house counsel confirmed this to be true – 60% responded that they were not directly involved with waiver requests. Only 8% percent of outside counsel and 3% of in-house counsel said that they "inferred waiver was expected."

- Our coalition is aggressively seeking to reverse this erosion of confidential attorney-client conversations.

- We are pleased that the U.S. Sentencing Commission has decided to revisit recently amended commentary to the guidelines that allows waiver to be a cooperation factor in sentencing formulas, and we have submitted detailed comments on the ramifications of this policy.

- We would encourage the Committee to weigh in with its support of the attorney-client privilege to the United States Sentencing Commission as it reconsiders the 2004 amendments to the Guidelines' commentary language.

- It is important to note that the Department of Justice and other regulatory agencies have created this erosion of the privilege without seeking input, oversight, or approval from Congress or the judiciary.

- We seek your input and strongly urge you to exercise your oversight of DOJ and the SEC to ensure protection of the attorney-client privilege.

- Let me be very clear: our efforts are not about trying to protect corrupt companies or businesspeople. Nobody wants corporate wrongdoers caught and punished more than legitimate and honest businesspeople.

- Rather, this is about protecting a well established and vital Constitutional right. Thank you very much. I look forward to your questions.

Testimony of Dick Thornburgh
Former Attorney General of the United States before the Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism & Homeland Security of the House Committee on the Judiciary regarding
"White Collar Enforcement (Part I): Attorney-Client Privilege and Corporate Waivers."
Tuesday, March 7, 2006

Good morning, Chairman Coble and members of the Subcommittee, and thank you for the invitation to speak to you today about the grave dangers posed to the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine by current governmental policies and practices. At the outset, let me commend you for being the first Congressional body to convene a hearing on this very worrisome situation. The attorney-client privilege is a fundamental element of the American system of justice, and I fear that we have all been too slow in recognizing how seriously the privilege has been undermined in the past several years by government actions. Your focus on this issue today is vitally needed and much appreciated.

The attorney-client privilege is the oldest of the "evidentiary privileges," originating in the common law of England in the 1500s.[1] Although the privilege shields from disclosure evidence that might otherwise be admissible, courts have found that this potential loss of evidence is outweighed by the benefits to the immediate client, who receives better advice, and society as a whole, which obtains the benefits of voluntary legal compliance. These ideas have been embraced time and time again by the courts -- in the words of the Supreme Court, the privilege encourages "full and frank communication between attorneys and their clients and thereby promote[s] broader public interest in the observance of law and administration of justice."[2] The attorney-client privilege is thus a core element in a law-abiding society and a well-ordered commercial world.

And yet the previously solid protection that attorney-client communications have enjoyed has been profoundly shaken by a trend in law enforcement for the government to demand a waiver of a corporation's privilege as a precondition for granting the benefits of "cooperation" that might prevent indictment, or diminish punishment. These pressures emanate chiefly from the Department of Justice ("DOJ") and the Securities and Exchange Commission ("SEC"). Beginning with the 1999 "Holder Memorandum," and as more forcefully stated in the 2003 "Thompson Memorandum," DOJ has made clear its policy that waiver of the attorney-client (and work product) protections is an important element in determining whether a corporation may get favorable treatment for cooperation.[3] The SEC, in a public "report" issued at the conclusion of an investigation, outlined a similar policy.[4] Finally, the U.S. Sentencing Commission in 2004 amended the commentary to its Sentencing Guidelines so that waiver of privilege became a significant factor in determining whether an organization has engaged in the timely and thorough "cooperation" necessary for obtaining leniency.[5] Following the federal lead, state law enforcement officials are beginning to demand broad privilege waivers, as are self-regulatory organizations and the auditing profession.[6]

While the tone of these documents may be moderate, and officials representing these entities stress their intent to implement them in reasonable ways, it has by now become abundantly clear that, in actual practice, these policies pose overwhelming temptations to prosecutors seeking to save time and resources and to target organizations desperate to save their very existence. And each waiver has a "ripple effect" that creates more demands for greater disclosures, both in individual cases, and as a matter of practice. Once a corporation discloses a certain amount of information, then the bar is raised for the next situation, and each subsequent corporation will need to provide more information to be deemed cooperative.

The result is documented in a survey released just this week to which over 1,400 in-house and outside counsel responded, in which almost 75% of both groups agreed – almost 40% agreeing strongly -- that a "'culture of waiver' has evolved in which governmental agencies believe it is reasonable and appropriate for them to expect a company under investigation to broadly waive attorney-client privilege or work product protections." I practice law at a major firm with a significant white collar criminal defense practice. My partners generally report that they now encounter waiver requests in virtually every organizational criminal investigation in which they are involved. In their experience, waiver has become a standard expectation of federal prosecutors. Others with whom I've spoken in the white collar defense bar tell me the same thing.

I am prepared to concede that the significance of these developments took some time to penetrate beyond the Beltway and the relatively small community of white collar defense lawyers. It is clear, however, that as the legal profession has become aware of the problem, it has resulted in a strong and impassioned defense of the attorney-client privilege and work product protection. This issue was the hottest topic of last summer's Annual Meeting of the American Bar Association ("ABA"), and at its conclusion, the ABA House of Delegates unanimously passed a resolution that "strongly supports the preservation of the attorney-client privilege" and "opposes policies, practices and procedures of government bodies that have the effect of eroding the attorney-client privilege. . . ."[7]

I was one of nine former Attorneys General, Deputy Attorneys General and Solicitors General, from both Republican and Democratic administrations, who signed a letter to the Sentencing Commission last summer urging it to reconsider its recent amendment regarding waiver. It is never a simple matter to enlist such endorsements, particularly in the summer and on short notice. And yet it was not difficult at all to secure those nine signatures, because we all feel so strongly about the fundamental role the attorney-client privilege and work product protections play in our system of justice.

We feel just as strongly that the other governmental policies and practices outlined above seriously undermine those protections. As you know, I served as a federal prosecutor for many

[7] This resolution was initially drafted by an ABA Task Force on the Attorney-Client Privilege, which held public hearings on the issues raised by recent government practices. A report detailing the Task Force's work is available at http://www.abanet.org/buslaw/attorneyclient/materials/hod/report.pdf. years, and I supervised other federal prosecutors in my capacities as U.S. Attorney, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division and Attorney General. Throughout those years, requests to organizations we were investigating to hand over privileged information never came to my attention. Clearly, in order to be deemed cooperative, an organization under investigation must provide the government with all relevant factual information and documents in its possession, and it should assist the government by explaining the relevant facts and identifying individuals with knowledge of them. But in doing so, it should not have to reveal privileged communications or attorney work product. That limitation is necessary to maintain the primacy of these protections in our system of justice. It is a fair limitation on prosecutors, who have extraordinary powers to gather information for themselves. This balance is one I found workable in my years of federal service, and it should be restored.

I was pleased to see the Sentencing Commission earlier this year request comment on whether it should delete or amend the commentary sentence regarding waiver. In testimony last fall I urged it to provide affirmatively that waiver should not a factor in assessing cooperation. I understand that the ABA will shortly approach DOJ with a request that the Thompson memorandum be revised in similar fashion. These are promising developments.

Mr. Chairman, I thank you again for beginning the much-needed process of Congressional oversight of the privilege waiver crisis. This is not an issue that Washington lobby groups have orchestrated, but it is one that likely will take Congressional attention to resolve.

Thank you, and I look forward to your questions.

BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIME, TERRORISM, AND HOMELAND SECURITY

MARCH 7, 2006

Introduction

Good Morning Chairman Coble and members of the Subcomittee. Thank you for your kind invitation to address you today concerning the Department of Justices' policies and practices with regard to seeking attorney-client privilege and work product protection waivers from corporations, and whether the waiver of such privilege and protection should be relevant to assessing the corporation's "cooperation" within the meaning of the Organizational Guidelines.

I am currently a partner at the law firm of Winston & Strawn, LLP where I specialize in white-collar criminal defense and corporate internal investigations. From 1991-2001, I served as an Assistant United States Attorney for the District of Columbia. In these capacities, I have been involved in virtually all facets of white-collar investigations and corporate defense: I have overseen both criminal investigations and internal corporate investigations, and I have represented both corporations and individuals in internal investigations, and before federal law enforcement authorities and regulators, as well as in class action, derivative, and ERISA litigation. My perspective on corporate cooperation and the waiver of attorney-client and attorney work product privileges has therefore been forged not only by my experiences on both sides of the criminal justice system, but by my participation in the civil arena as well.

The Real Issue Is Not The Waiver, But What Is Being Waived, And How It Was Assembled

For business organizations today, the traditional protections afforded by the attorney-client privilege and the attorney work-product doctrine are under siege. Prosecutors and regulators now routinely demand that, in return for the mere prospect of leniency, corporations engage in intensive internal investigations of alleged wrongdoing and submit detailed written reports documenting both the depth and breadth of their inquiry, as well as the basis for their conclusions.

When pressed on this practice, many prosecutors and regulators will publicly insist that they are only seeking a "road map"—the identity of the individuals involved, the crucial acts, and the supporting documentation. However, this has not been my experience. Just last week, I was asked by a government regulator in our very first meeting to broadly waive attorney-client privilege and work product protection and to provide copies of interview notes, even before I had completed my client's internal investigation, and accordingly even before I determined as corporate counsel that cooperation would be in my client's best interest.

Most importantly, however, such "road map" requests fail to relieve the valid concerns of corporations related to privilege and work product waivers. A less than carefully drawn road map risks a broad subject-matter waiver of attorney-client privilege and attorney work-product protection. Under current authority applicable in most jurisdictions, the waiver of attorney-client communications arising in connection with a factual road map subsequently disclosed to law enforcement would extend beyond the disclosure itself and encompass all communications on that subject matter. The consequences of this result can be extreme in that even a rudimentary road map is the product of information obtained through thousands of hours legal work spent conducting interviews, parsing statements from hundreds of pages of interview notes, and analyzing thousands (perhaps millions) of pages of both privileged and non-privileged corporate documents. Furthermore, the waiver would be applicable not only to the law enforcement officials receiving the information, but would include all future third-parties, including other government agencies and opportunistic plaintiffs' attorneys seeking fodder for class action and derivative strike suits.

In addressing the practice of conditioning leniency for disclosure of otherwise privileged reports, I believe that a balance must be struck between the legitimate interests of law enforcement in pursuing and punishing illegal conduct, the benefits to be obtained by corporations which determine to assist in this process and to take remedial action, and the rights of individual employees. It is imperative that we do not sacrifice accuracy, fundamental fairness and due process for expediency and convenience. An equilibrium must be achieved between the aforementioned competing concerns, and I am prepared today to share my views regarding how that might be accomplished.

An Old Debate
Revitalized By A Harsh New Reality

The discussion regarding the attorney-client privilege in the corporate context is not a novel phenomenon. Commentators have long discussed and disputed the scope of the privilege and its application to corporations and other legal entities. The dialogue has largely revolved around efforts to adapt the attorney-client privilege to the practical realities of business entities: corporations act only through employees (with whom they share limited legal privity) and the conduct of those employees—at all levels of the company—have legal consequences for the entity.[1] Consequently, corporate privilege serves an important purpose in protecting

[1] Indeed, the harsh consequences of cooperation with law enforcement and the waiver of attorney-client privilege, have also been recognized for several decades. The decision in Diversified Industries v. Meredith, the only circuit court decision recognizing selective waiver of attorney-client privilege, was rendered in 1978.

communications between attorneys and their corporate clients so as to facilitate the candid exchange of ideas and information to enable the enterprise to comply with applicable law and regulation. But while the organization itself is recognized as the client, it is incapable of communicating with counsel. This anomaly has been crystallized in the "Upjohn Warning," which is premised upon on a 1981 Supreme Court decision and is routinely given to corporate employees by company counsel. This warning seeks to explain that discussions with corporate counsel are privileged, but that the privilege belongs solely to the company and may be waived at any time by the company. Ironically, this explanation inevitably undercuts the privilege's effectiveness by chilling communications. Employees are left with the accurate understanding that anything they say may be disclosed to third parties, including law enforcement, government regulators, and plaintiffs' counsel.

Today, what is driving the renewed concern regarding the waiver of attorney-client privilege is the premium being placed by law enforcement on internal investigative reports and related work product. In the wake of the Holder and Thompson Memoranda, and the Seaboard Report, the corporate defense bar has witnessed an unprecedented surge in government demands for access to privileged communications and work product. It is often said that perception is reality, and on this issue the two easily merge. Whether or not admitted by prosecutors and regulators, cooperation has become synonymous with waiver.

Regardless of this perceived equivalence, corporate counsel must always understand at the outset that choices exist, and that counsel's obligation to the client is to make the best choice based upon an informed understanding of the law and facts. The presumption of innocence should never be forgotten or ignored, and counsel's first responsibility should be to inquire as to whether misconduct in fact took place, and if so, whether there might exist a credible defense.

Common but misunderstood industry practices, newly revised and complex regulatory frameworks, and well-intentioned but ineffectual internal controls are all examples of factors which might negate criminal intent, and all should be fully explored and developed. Nevertheless, in other instances, counsel might be confronted with strong evidence of impropriety, and the best interests of the corporation are only served through cooperation with the government. Having made such a determination in today's environment, however, corporations can sometimes pursue compliance with the waiver demands of law enforcement, only to find themselves rewarded with an indictment. Moreover, because such waivers cannot be recalled or even truly limited under current legal doctrine, the compliant corporation has thereby also imperiled itself to parallel and intractable civil litigation, consuming vast amounts of corporate financial resources and posing a constant distraction to management. In such situations, the only real winners are the lawyers.

Further, there is widespread concern that government demands for waiver in this context blur traditional criminal procedure constraints. Employees interviewed are often compelled to provide statements and to potentially waive their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination under threat of losing their employment. Ironically, the Supreme Court in Garrity v. New Jersey[2] held almost thirty years ago that evidence obtained through such coercive pressure was inadmissible against government employees, yet the government currently demands that corporations routinely deploy such duress against their own. Moreover, through corporate counsel, the government can gain direct access to witness statements without negotiating a proffer, immunity or cooperation agreement with counsel for individuals, and without having to specify whether the person interviewed is a witness, subject, or target of its investigation. Of course, all such information gathered by corporate counsel is obtained free from constitutional protections, especially that of the Fifth Amendment, and can immediately serve as the basis for charging decisions against either the corporation itself or individual employees.

By necessity, therefore, corporate counsel is often placed in a precarious position, one which the Fourth Circuit has described as a "minefield." In re Grand Jury Subpoena Under Seal, 415 F.3d. 333 (4th Cir. 2005). Accordingly, the careful and thoughtful corporate counsel understands and fulfills the obligations imposed by the Rules of Professional Conduct applicable to internal investigations, specifically the responsibility to explain client identity, disclose conflicts of interest, deal fairly with unrepresented persons, and to never employ methods of obtaining evidence that would violate a client's interest or operate in disregard of the rights of third persons.

Nevertheless, we have seen some internal inquiries proceed in a pre-determined way, commissioned by those who have an interest in absolution. In such instances, employees (especially mid-level and lower-level employees) were neither afforded counsel, nor apprised of their right to have counsel present during the interviews at their own expense. In addition, employees were not provided any opportunity to review documents or refresh their memories before or during interviews, even when the events at issue occurred years earlier and were largely indistinguishable from the employee's routine activities. Moreover, even in a well intentioned investigation there are often no assurances that the team of investigators employed to ferret out the truth is thoroughly knowledgeable about the corporation's business and the subject matter under investigation. This is especially true in cases involving complex financial transactions and accounting issues, which are often beyond the expertise of most investigating attorneys. In such circumstances, there is a heightened risk that inaccuracies and misperceptions will be held by investigators, which in turn can lead to incorrect findings, misplaced blame, and, in some cases, the frustration of the search for truth.

Such observations should never be understood to be a denunciation of the internal investigation process, but rather a call for its continued refinement as an indispensable corporate compliance and governance tool. Today, there are many fine lawyers who are diligently conducting thorough, accurate investigations and, as is their professional responsibility, maintaining fidelity to individual rights, and in particular the rights of unrepresented persons. Nor do I wish to suggest that there should be a single, inflexible approach to conducting an internal investigation. Every scenario is different, and the endless variety of business enterprise precludes drawing conclusions as to a single "correct" way to perform an internal investigation. Yet, as we review the policies related to the waiver of attorney-client privilege and the disclosure of the products of internal investigations, we must be cognizant of the weaknesses of the process and the risks of inaccuracy and injustice, particularly in instances where the fundamental fairness obligations of counsel have gone unrecognized. Once an investigation has been concluded and the attorney-client privilege and work product protection waived, investigative conclusions and findings invariably shape the contours of all the actions that follow—law enforcement and regulatory actions, civil litigation, and public reports and perceptions. The findings become, in essence, the law of the case, and while individual aspects of the report or findings may be questioned or discredited, it is almost impossible to undo the damage of a wholly inaccurate, incomplete or biased report.

Striking The Proper Balance

The attorney-client and work product privileges reflect the public priorities of facilitating the observance of law through the uninhibited communication with counsel and the resultant effective assistance of counsel. The recent efforts of law enforcement to condition cooperation on the disclosure of detailed written reports and underlying attorney work product implicate society's interest in identifying and punishing crime, the corporation's interest in identifying misconduct and adopting remedial measures, as well as protecting itself from exasperating civil litigation, and the rights of individuals. There is obviously friction in seeking to satisfy all these objectives, but there are a number of possible measures which, if developed, would maximize the benefit to society, while protecting the rights of employees as well.

(i) Consensus on the Type of Information the Government Expects

There is a lack of consensus regarding what the government is actually seeking from corporations. At least some prosecutors have publicly stated that they are merely desirous a "road map" of internal investigations -- the identities of the individuals, the key events, and the supporting documents. In practice, however, many law enforcement authorities require far more, including detailed written reports, interview notes, attorney opinion work product, and other sensitive materials. Discussions of waiver need to be informed by a consensus of what the government will and should accept from corporate cooperators, in exchange for leniency. As developed above, conditioning credit for cooperation on the waiver of privilege and the disclosure of detailed reports and work product chills candor within the corporation and implicates individual rights otherwise left intact by other forms of cooperation. In my view, offering to provide the factual findings of an internal investigation conducted in a manner consistent with the precepts of fundamental fairness should satisfy government representatives while simultaneously preserving privileged communications and work product. Indeed, once in receipt of a factual proffer, the government should be encouraged, and should itself insist, that it perform its own legal analysis.

(ii) Selective Waiver

To the extent law enforcement authorities and regulators continue to insist on the disclosure of internal investigative reports and attorney work product, I believe we must consider implementing a limited version of selective waiver, restricted to specifically negotiated materials, which would permit corporations to make disclosures to the government without sacrificing the privilege with respect to all other third-parties and without effectuating a broad subject-matter waiver. To date, most of the Circuit Courts of Appeals have refused to recognize the idea of selective waiver on the basis that such a practice is fundamentally inconsistent with the traditional application of the waiver and could encourage the use of the waiver as both a "sword and a shield." As a result, a corporation faces a veritable Hobson's choice. The corporation can waive its privilege and thereby receive consideration and credit from the government for its cooperation, but then must face the prospect of enormously expensive civil litigation brought by plaintiffs' counsel seeking to exploit the corporation's own repentant efforts. Alternatively, the corporation may refuse to waive the privilege, but then runs the risk of being perceived by the government as uncooperative, and therefore undeserving of consideration or leniency. Selective waiver cuts through this Gordian Knot by recognizing the benefit to society of the corporation's full and complete cooperation, while at the same time preserving corporate defenses and the interests of innocent shareholders and employees from vexatious litigation.

Far from denigrating the attorney-client privilege as a mere tactical tool as some critics have alleged, the doctrine of selective waiver restores the delicate balance of protecting confidential legal communications from outside parties while still allowing those adverse parties access to the underlying factual material. Perhaps most importantly, however, selective waiver allows the government access to relevant information, without the broadcasting of untested conclusions about the corporation or its employees to the public in a manner in which no meaningful response is possible, and without unnecessarily encouraging burdensome litigation.

(iii) Standards to Guide Internal Investigations

Under the status quo, the most vulnerable group is that of individual employees. Through internal investigations, employees are routinely compelled to participate in interviews under the threat of losing their jobs. These interviews are not necessarily subject to basic notions of fairness and due process. Nevertheless, they can have profound implications for the individual employee, including loss of livelihood, diminution of reputation, compelled waiver of the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, and, ultimately, civil sanctions and/or criminal prosecution. The significance placed on these interviews, and the potential for adverse consequences for the individual, increases dramatically if otherwise privileged records of the interviews are demanded by law enforcement as the price of corporate cooperation.

Should this trend continue, corporate counsel and the legal profession as a whole need to establish compelling guidelines for interacting with individual employees during internal investigations. While the Rules of Professional Responsibility governing the legal profession apply to how internal investigations should be conducted, greater clarity is needed. For, example American Bar Association Model Rule 4.4 provides that "[i]n representing a client, a lawyer shall not . . . use methods of obtaining evidence that violate the legal rights of [third persons]." Such general pronouncements, however, do little to articulate when individuals should be apprised of their right to have individual counsel, what access (if any) the employee should have to corporate records and documents, and whether the employee should be given an opportunity to review and correct interview notes. Not only do such fundamental questions remain unanswered, but there currently exists no effective mechanism for redressing even clear violations of professional responsibility on the part of corporate investigators.

The call for uniform standards for internal investigations is not merely a prescription for the corporate bar. I believe that law enforcement authorities have an affirmative obligation to be sophisticated consumers of internal investigative reports and to ensure that the search for truth is conducted in a fair and impartial manner consistent with the rules of professional conduct and traditional understandings of fundamental fairness. This proposed procedural review would assist in insuring that conflicting interests within a corporation do not result in an unreliable report and would further refocus internal investigations on what they have always purported to be about -- helping the corporation as an entity to resolve internal problems, and not what they have too frequently become -- an exercise in protecting one constituency of the corporation at the expense of another.

Conclusion

The issues being addressed today in this committee meeting are not simply a part of an academic debate. Across the country there are dozens of corporations scrutinized in internal investigations at any one time, with real consequences for real people. These investigations directly impact the lives of thousands of workers, and millions of shareholders. In conditioning leniency upon the disclosure of otherwise privileged information, we need to accommodate the competing interests of effective law enforcement, the benefits to redound to deserving corporations, and the fundamental rights of individual employees. Reaching a consensus on the information sought by the government, the adoption of a selective waiver for cooperating corporations, and lucid, comprehensive standards to guide internal investigations, are each important first steps.

Thank you. I look forward to your questions.

WHITE COLLAR ENFORCEMENT (PART 1):
ATTORNEY-CLIENT PRIVILEGE AND CORPORATE WAIVERS
Tuesday, March 7, 2006
House of Representatives,
Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism, and Homeland Security, Committee on the Judiciary,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 12:00 p.m., in Room 2141, Rayburn House Office Building, Hon. Howard Coble [chairman of the subcommittee] presiding.

Mr. COBLE. Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. We welcome you to this important oversight hearing on white collar crime and the issue of the attorney-client privilege and waivers by corporations in criminal investigations.

At first blush, some may say that this topic is an arcane legal issue with little relevance to the general public. In fact, the attorney-client privilege is deeply rooted in our values and the legal profession. It encourages openness and honesty between clients and their attorneys so that clients hopefully can receive effective advice and counsel.

But this privilege is not inviolate. When it comes to corporate crime, there is and probably always will be an institutional tension between preserving corporate attorney-client and work product privileges and a prosecutor's quest to unearth the truth about criminal acts.

I know that one of the most important engines in our criminal justice system is cooperation. By encouraging and rewarding cooperation, prosecutors are able to unearth sophisticated fraud schemes which cause devastating harm to investors and employees and undermine our faith in the markets.

But the possible benefits of cooperation cannot be used to support a prosecutor's laundry list of demands for a cooperating corporation. Prosecutors must be zealous and vigorous in their efforts to bring corporate actors to justice. However, zeal does not in my opinion equate with coercion in fair enforcement of these laws.

To me, the important question is whether prosecutors seeking to investigate corporate crimes can gain access to the information without requiring a waiver of the attorney-client privilege. There is no excuse for prosecutors to require privilege waivers as a routine matter, it seems to me.

The subcommittee will examine the important issue with a keen eye to determine whether Federal prosecutors are routinely requiring cooperating corporations to waive such privilege. Then-Acting Deputy Attorney General McCallum issued a memorandum on October 21, 2005 which mandated a change in Justice Department policy to try to establish a more uniform review procedure for any such requirement imposed by a prosecutor.

This is a welcome development, and the subcommittee is interested in determining how that policy has been implemented. I am also aware of the fact that the Sentencing Commission is examining its current policy of encouraging such waivers when determining the nature and extent of cooperation.

While the guidelines do not explicitly mandate a waiver of privileges for the full benefit of cooperation, in practical terms we have to make sure that they do not operate to impose such a requirement. Our subcommittee needs to examine this issue, work closely with the Sentencing Commission, the defense bar, and the Justice Department to make sure that a fair balance is struck.

I look forward to hearing from our distinguished panel of witnesses today, and I am now pleased to recognize the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, the Ranking Member of the subcommittee, Mr. Bobby Scott.

[The statement of Mr. Coble follows:]

* SUBCOMMITTEE INSERT **********

Mr. SCOTT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I want to thank you for holding this hearing on attorney-client privilege and corporate waivers of that privilege.

Attorney-client privilege is more usually associated with the context of protecting an individual from having to disclose communications with his or her lawyer for the purpose of criminal or civil prosecution, corporations or persons, for the sake of legal processes that are also entitled to attorney-client privilege.

As noted by the United States Supreme Court in Upjohn vs. U.S., the attorney-client privilege is the oldest of privileges for confidential communications known to common law. Its purpose is to encourage full and frank communications between attorneys and their clients so that sound legal advice and advocacy can be given by counsel. Such advice or activity depends upon the lawyer being fully informed by the client.

As noted in other cases, the lawyer-client privilege rests on the need for the advocate and counselor to know all that relates to the client's reasons for seeking representation if the professional mission is to be carried out. This purpose can only be effectively carried out when the client is free from consequences or apprehensions regarding the possibility of disclosure of the information.

Exceptions to protections of the attorney--excuse me.

Exceptions to the protections of the privilege do exist, but they have generally been limited to the crime-fraud exception, which holds that the privilege does not apply to an attorney-client communication in furtherance of a crime, or other cases where the client has already waived the privilege through disclosure to a non-privileged third party.

Now it appears that the Department of Justice has determined that there may be another exception, that is, when it wishes the corporation to waive the privilege in the context of a criminal investigation. For some time now I have been concerned about reports that the Department of Justice is coercing corporations to waive their attorney-client privilege during criminal investigations of the corporation and its employees by making waiver a prerequisite for consideration by the Department and its recommendation for not challenging leniency should criminal conduct be established.

Now, this is particularly significant because under mandatory minimums and sentencing guidelines, prosecutorial motions for leniency may be the only way to get a sentence under the mandatory minimum. So in this case, a prosecutor often has more control over sentencing than the judge.

While the attorney-client privilege doctrine does apply to corporations, complications arise when the client is a corporation since the corporate privilege has to be asserted by persons who may themselves be the target of a criminal investigation or subject to criminal charges based on the disclosed attorney-client information. Disclosed information can be used either in criminal prosecutions or civil prosecutions. Whatever fiduciary duty an official may have to the corporation and its shareholders, it is probably superseded by the official's own self-interest in the criminal investigation.

And there is no protection for employees of the corporation against waivers of the attorney-client privilege by officials who may have their own self-interest at heart. This includes information provided by employees to corporate counsel to assist internal investigations by the corporation, even if the information was under threat of an employee being fired and even if the information constituted self-incrimination by the employee.

It is one thing for officials of a corporation to break the attorney-client privilege in their own self-interest by their own volition. It is another thing for the Department to require or coerce it by making leniency considerations contingent upon it, even when it is merely on a fishing expedition on the part of the Department. Complaints have indicated that the practice of requiring a waiver of the corporate attorney-client privilege has become routine. And, of course, why wouldn't it be the case? What is the advantage to the Department of not requiring a waiver in the corporate investigation?

Now, because of the exclusionary rule, when a confession is coerced or a search is conducted illegally, anything that is found of that becomes fruit of a poisonous tree and can't be used in a criminal prosecution. So police and prosecutors who jeopardize the case by such tainted evidence are generally disparaged by their colleagues, and thus there is a disincentive for them to pursue and collect such evidence in the first place. There is no incentive to collect evidence if it is going to ruin the case.

Although coerced confessions and illegal searches are always improper, before the exclusionary rule there was an incentive for police to coerce confessions and illegally obtain information because they could make a case based on it, and there was no penalty.

Here we have the same incentives with respect to the waiver of corporate privilege. So, not surprisingly, reports are the demand for waivers are rising, not only by the Department but by other entities as well, such as auditors as a prerequisite of issuing a clean audit.

Now, coercing corporate attorney-client privileges has not been--has not long been the practice in the Department. It has really been the last two administrations that have practiced this, and it has been growing by leaps and bounds.

Corporate attorney-client privilege has not always been the prerequisite for leniency. Providing non-privileged documents and information and providing broad access to corporate premises and employees have been traditional ways to receive benefits of corporate cooperation.

Some nine U.S. Attorneys General, Deputy Attorneys General, and Solicitors General have expressed their concerns about the current Departmental waiver policy. We will hear from witnesses today who have prosecuted corporate cases without requiring such waiver. And so, Mr. Chairman, we look forward to the testimony by witnesses and to working with you to address the concerns regarding the Department's corporate attorney-client waiver policy.

* SUBCOMMITTEE INSERT **********

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Scott. And gentlemen, we have been joined by the distinguished gentleman from California, Mr. Lungren, the distinguished gentleman from Florida, Mr. Feeney, and distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Delahunt.

Gentlemen, what I am about to do I am very awkward in doing it. It is customary for the subcommittee to administer the oath to the panelists. I know you all. I know you don't need to be sworn in to tell the truth. But if you don't mind, would each of you please stand and raise your hands.

Mr. COBLE. Let the record show each witness answered in the affirmative. And I have had the fear if I depart with you all, then the next panel is going to wonder why I don't depart from them. But you all, I am not worried about what you all say violating the truth in any way.

As I said before, we have four distinguished witnesses with us today. Our first witness is Mr. Robert McCallum, Jr., Associate Attorney General of the Department of Justice. In this capacity, Mr. McCallum advises and assists the Attorney General and the Deputy Attorney General in formulating policies pertaining to a broad range of civil justice, Federal and local law enforcement, and public safety matters. Prior to this appointment, he served as Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Division. Mr. McCallum received his undergraduate and law degrees from Yale University, and was a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford University.

Our second witness is returning to the Hill after some extended absence, the Honorable Dick Thornburgh of Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham. Mr. Thornburgh's distinguished public career extends over a quarter of a century. He previously served as Governor of Pennsylvania, Attorney General under Presidents Reagan and Bush, and Undersecretary General of the United Nations.

Mr. Thornburgh has been awarded honorary degrees by 31 colleges and universities, and previously served as Director of the Institute of Politics at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government. Mr. Thornburgh earned his undergraduate degree at Yale and his law degree at the University of Pittsburgh School of Law.

Our third witness is Mr. Thomas Donohue, President and CEO of the United States Chamber of Commerce. In his current capacity, Mr. Donohue has expanded the influence of the Chamber across the globe. He engaged the Chamber Institute for Legal Reform and revitalized the National Chamber Foundation. Previously, Mr. Donohue served for 13 years as President and CEO of the American Trucking Association, and was awarded his bachelors degree from St. Johns University and a masters degree from Adelphi University.

Our fourth and final witness today is Mr. William Sullivan, Jr., litigation partner at Winston & Strawn. In this capacity, Mr. Sullivan concentrates on corporate internal investigations, trial practice, white collar criminal defense, and complex securities litigation.

Previously, he served for over 10 years as an Assistant United States Attorney for the District of Columbia, and has worked in private practice as a litigator. Additionally, Mr. Sullivan has addressed the World Trade Organization on Sarbanes-Oxley issues. He received his bachelors and masters degrees from Tufts University and his law degree from Cornell University.

Gentlemen, it is good to have you all with us. And as we have previously told you, without hamstringing you too severely, we try to apply the 5-minute rule here. And when you all see that amber light on your panel appear, that tells you that the ice on which you are skating is becoming thin. You have about a minute to go. And we're not going to keelhaul anybody for violating it, but if you can wrap up in as close to 5 minutes as you can.

Mr. McCallum, why don't you kick us off.

TESTIMONY OF ROBERT D. McCALLUM, JR., ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE; HON. DICK THORNBURGH, KIRKPATRICK & LOCKHART NICHOLSON GRAHAM LLP; THOMAS J. DONOHUE, PRESIDENT AND CEO, U.S. CHAMBER OF COMMERCE; AND WILLIAM M. SULLIVAN, JR., LITIGATION PARTNER, WINSTON & STRAWN

TESTIMONY OF ROBERT D. McCALLUM, JR.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Scott, and members of the committee. We appreciate at the Department of Justice this opportunity to appear before you today.

Now, President Bush, this Congress, and the American people have all embraced a zero tolerance policy when it comes to corporate fraud. In passing the landmark Sarbanes-Oxley legislation in 2002, Congress gave the Department of Justice clear marching orders: prosecute fully those who would use their positions of power and influence in corporate America to enrich themselves unlawfully, and thereby restore confidence in our financial markets.

And we have done exactly that, Mr. Chairman. From July 2002 through December 2005, the Department has secured more than 900 corporate fraud convictions, including 85 presidents, 82 chief executive officers, 40 chief financial officers, 14 chief operating officers, 17 corporate counsel or attorneys, and 98 vice presidents, as well as millions of dollars in damages for victims of fraud.

Much of our success depends on our ability to secure cooperation. As Chairman Sensenbrenner noted recently, and I quote, ''By encouraging and rewarding corporate cooperation, our laws serve the public interest in promoting corporate compliance, minimizing use of our enforcement resources, and leading to the prosecution and punishment of the most culpable actors.''

The Department's approach to corporate fraud is set forth in the so-called Thompson Memorandum, issued by Larry D. Thompson as Deputy Attorney General. Pursuant to that memorandum, the degree to which a corporation cooperates with a criminal investigation may be a factor to be considered by prosecutors when determining whether or not to charge the corporation with criminal misconduct.

Cooperation in turn depends on--and here I quote the Thompson Memorandum--''the corporation's willingness to identify the culprits within the corporation, including senior executives; to make witnesses available; to disclose the complete results of its internal investigation; and to waive attorney-client and work product protections.''

Some critics have suggested that the Department is contemptuous of legal privileges. Nothing could be further from the truth. We recognize the ability to communicate freely with counsel can serve legitimate and important functions and encourage responsible corporate stewardship and corporate governance.

But at the same time, we all must recognize that corporate fraud is often highly difficult to detect. Indeed, in recent years we have witnessed a series of highly complex corporate scandals which would have been difficult to prosecute in a timely and efficient manner without corporate cooperation, including in some instances the waiver of privileges.

The Thompson Memorandum carefully balances the legitimate interests furthered by the privilege, and the societal benefits of rigorous enforcement of the laws supporting ethical standards of conduct.

There is also a so-called McCallum Memorandum, issued during my tenure as Acting Deputy Attorney General last year, which adds to this balancing of the competing interests. The McCallum memorandum first ensures that no Federal prosecutor may request a waiver without supervisory review. And second, it requires each United States Office to institute a written waiver review policy governing such requests.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize that despite these limitations and restrictions, there are some critics of the Department's approach. While I look forward to addressing specific concerns of the members of this subcommittee that may occur during the questioning, let me make a few preliminary observations.

First, voluntary disclosure is but one factor in assessing cooperation, and cooperation in turn is but one factor among many considered in any charging decisions. Disclosures thus is not required to obtain credit for cooperation in all cases; cooperation may be had by corporations most readily without waiving anything, simply by identifying the employees best situated to provide the Government with relevant information.

Nor can the Government compel corporations to give waivers. Corporations are generally represented by sophisticated and accomplished counsel who are fully capable of calculating the benefits or harms of disclosures. Sometimes they agree; sometimes they do not agree. Whether to disclose information voluntarily always remains within the corporation's choice. And in fact, voluntary disclosures are frequently initiated by the corporate counsel and not by the Government.

Second, under our process, waivers of privileges should not be routinely sought, and we believe are not routinely sought. Indeed, they should be sought based upon a need for three things: timely, complete, and accurate information. And they should be requested pursuant to the established guidelines, and only with supervisory approval.

Third, our approach does not diminish a corporation's willingness to undertake investigations, in our view. Wholly apart from the Government's criminal investigations, corporate management owes to its shareholders, not to itself or to its employees, but to its shareholders, a fiduciary duty to investigate potential wrongdoing and to take corrective action. To the extent that shareholders are best served by timely internal investigations, responsible management will always do so.

And finally, in some jurisdictions, voluntary disclosure to the Government waives privileges in civil litigation seeking monetary damages, thus, it is said, compounding the corporation's litigation risk. Addressing this concern, the committee should be aware that the Evidence Committee of the Advisory Rules of the Judicial Conference is currently considering a rule that would limit use by others of privileged material voluntarily provided by a corporation in its cooperation with a Government investigation. We at the Department of Justice will be involved in the Federal Rules Advisory Committee on Evidence considering that, and we will watch that debate with interest.

In sum, Mr. Chairman, we believe that the Department has struck an appropriate balance between traditional privileges and the American people's legitimate law enforcement needs and the necessity of establishing standards.

Thank you for the opportunity to testify.

[The statement of Mr. McCallum follows:]

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. McCallum.

Mr. Thornburgh.

TESTIMONY OF HON. DICK THORNBURGH

Mr. THORNBURGH. Chairman Coble, Ranking Member Scott, members of the subcommittee, I want to thank you for the invitation to speak to you today about the grave dangers posed to the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine by current governmental policies and practices.

At the outset, let me commend you for being the first Congressional body to convene a hearing on this very worrisome situation. The attorney-client privilege, as we all know, is a fundamental element of the American system of justice, and I fear that we have all been too slow in recognizing how seriously the privilege has been undermined in the past several years by Government action. Your focus on this issue today is vitally needed and much appreciated.

The attorney-client privilege is the oldest of the evidentiary privileges originating in the common law of England in the 1500s. Although the privilege shields from disclosure evidence that might otherwise be admissible, courts have found that this potential loss of evidence is outweighed by the benefits to the immediate client, who receives better advice, and to society as a whole, which obtains the benefits of voluntary legal compliance.

These ideas have been embraced time and time again by our courts. In the words of the Supreme Court, the privilege encourages ''full and frank communication between attorneys and their clients, and thereby promotes broader public interest in the observance of law and the administration of justice.'' The attorney-client privilege is thus a core element in a law-abiding society and a well-ordered commercial world.

And yet the previously solid protection that attorney-client communications have enjoyed has been profoundly shaken by a trend in law enforcement for the Government to, in effect, demand a waiver of a corporation's privilege as a precondition for granting the benefits of cooperation that might prevent indictment or diminish punishment. These pressures emanate chiefly from the Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Beginning with the 1999 Holder Memorandum, and as more forcefully stated in the 2003 Thompson Memorandum, the Department of Justice has made clear its policy that waiver of the attorney-client and work product protections is an important element in determining whether a corporation may get favorable treatment for cooperation. The SEC, in a public report issued at the conclusion of an investigation, outlined a similar policy.

Finally, the U.S. Sentencing Commission in 2004 amended the commentary to its sentencing guidelines so that waiver of privilege becomes a significant factor in determining whether an organization has engaged in timely and thorough cooperation necessary for obtaining leniency. Following the Federal lead, State law enforcement officials are beginning to demand broad privilege waivers, as are self-regulatory organizations and the auditing profession.

While the tone of these documents may be moderate, and officials representing these entities stress their intent to implement them in reasonable ways, it has now become abundantly clear that in actual practice, these policies pose overwhelming temptations to prosecutors seeking to save time and resources and to target organizations desperate to save their very existence. And each waiver has a ripple effect that creates more demands for greater disclosures, both in individual cases and as a matter of practice. Once a corporation discloses a certain amount of information, then the bar is raised for the next situation, and each subsequent corporation will need to provide more information to be deemed cooperative.

The result is documented in a survey released just this week to which over 1400 in-house and outside counsel responded, in which almost 75 percent of both groups agreed--almost 40 percent agreeing strongly--that a culture of waiver has evolved in which Government agencies believe it is reasonable and appropriate for them to expect a company under investigation to broadly waive attorney-client privilege or work product protections.

I practice law at a major firm with a significant white collar criminal defense practice. My partners generally report that they now encounter waiver requests in virtually every organizational criminal investigation in which they are involved. In their experience, waiver has become a standard expectation of Federal prosecutors. Others with whom I have spoken in the white collar defense bar tell me the same thing.

I am prepared to concede that the significance of these developments took some time to penetrate beyond the Beltway and the relatively small community of white collar defense lawyers. It is clear, however, that as the legal profession has become aware of the problem, it has resulted in a strong and impassioned defense of the attorney-client privilege and the work product protection.

This issue was the hottest topic at last summer's annual meeting of the American Bar Association, and at its conclusion, the ABA House of Delegates unanimously passed a resolution that strongly supports the preservation of the attorney-client privilege and opposes policies, practices, and procedures of Government bodies that have the effect of eroding the attorney-client privilege.

I was one of those nine former Department of Justice officials from both Republican and Democratic administrations who, as the Chairman noted, signed a letter to the Sentencing Commission last summer urging it to reconsider its recent amendment regarding waiver.

It is never a simple matter to enlist such endorsements, particularly in the summertime and on short notice. And yet it was not difficult at all to secure those nine signatures because all feel so strongly about the fundamental role the attorney-client privilege and work product protections play in our system of justice.

We feel just as strongly that the other governmental policies and practices outlined above seriously undermine those protections. As you know, I served as a Federal prosecutor for many years, and I supervised other Federal prosecutors in my capacities as U.S. Attorney, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division, and Attorney General of the United States. Throughout those years, requests to organizations we were investigating to hand over privileged information never came to my attention. One wonders what has changed in the past decade to warrant such a dramatic encroachment on the attorney-client privilege.

Clearly, in order to be deemed cooperative, an organization under investigation must provide to the Government all relevant factual information and documents in its possession, and it should assist the Government by explaining the relevant facts and identifying individuals with knowledge of them. But in doing so, it should not have to reveal privileged communications or attorney work product.

That limitation is necessary to maintain the primacy of those protections in our system of justice. It is a fair limitation on prosecutors, who have extraordinary powers to gather information for themselves. This balance is one I found workable in my years of Federal service, and it should be restored.

I was pleased to see the Sentencing Commission earlier this year request comment on whether it should delete or amend the commentary sentence regarding waiver. In testimony last fall, I urged it to provide affirmatively that waiver should not be a factor in assessing cooperation. I understand that the American Bar Association will shortly approach the Department of Justice with a request that the Thompson Memorandum be revised in similar fashion. These are promising developments.

Mr. Chairman, I thank you again for beginning a much-needed process of Congressional oversight of the privilege waiver crisis. This is not an issue that Washington lobby groups have orchestrated, but it is one that likely will take Congressional attention to resolve.

Thank you. I look forward to your questions.

[The statement of Mr. Thornburgh follows:]

* INSERT **********

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Thornburgh.

And Mr. Donohue, in a sense of equity and fairness, since I permitted Mr. McCallum and Mr. Thornburgh to exceed the red light, I will not crack the hammer on you once that red light illuminates.

You are now recognized.

TESTIMONY OF THOMAS J. DONOHUE

Mr. DONOHUE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Scott, members of the committee.

I am here today representing the Chamber and on behalf of a coalition to preserve the attorney-client privilege, which includes many of the major legal and business associations in our country, including the American Chemistry Council, the American Civil Liberties Union, the Association of Corporate Counsel, the Business Civil Liberties, Inc., the Business Roundtable, the Financial Services Roundtable, Frontiers of Freedom, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Defense Industrial Association, the Retail Industry Leaders Association, and the Washington Legal Foundation.

I should add that the coalition is working closely with the American Bar Association, which has separately submitted written testimony here today detailing its concerns about the erosion of the attorney-client privilege. ABA policy prevents the organization from being listed as a member of broader coalitions.

The privilege to consult with an attorney freely, candidly, and confidentially is a fundamental constitutional right that in our opinion is under attack. Recent policy changes at the Department of Justice and, very importantly, at the SEC have permitted and encouraged the Government to demand or expect companies to waive their attorney-client privilege or work product protections during an investigation.

A company is required to waive its privilege in order to be seen as cooperating with Federal investigators. A company that refuses to waive its privilege risks being labeled as uncooperative, which all but guarantees that it will not get a chance to come to a settlement or receive, if it needs to, leniency in sentencing or fines.

But it goes far beyond that, Mr. Chairman. The uncooperative label can severely damage a company's brand, its shareholder value, their relationship with suppliers and customers, and their very ability to survive.

The enforcement agencies argue that waiver of attorney-client privilege is necessary for improving compliance and conducting effective and thorough investigation. The opposite, in my opinion, is true. An uncertain and unprotected attorney-client privilege actually diminishes compliance with the law.

If company employees responsible for compliance with complicated statutes and regulations know that their conversations with attorneys are not protected, they will simply choose not to seek appropriate legal guidance. The result is that companies may fall out of compliance, often not intentionally, but because of a lack of communication and trust between a company's employees and its attorneys.

Similarly, during an investigation, if employees suspect that anything they say to their attorneys can be used against them, they won't say anything at all. That means that both the company and the Government will be unable to find out what went wrong, to punish wrongdoers, and to correct the company's compliance system.

And there is one other major consequence. Once the privilege is waived, third party private plaintiffs' lawyers can gain access to attorney-client conversations and use them to sue the company or other massive settlements. By the way, right now there are some arguments in the court about partial protection in waiving, and the question has been raised that perhaps the Government cannot even guarantee that.

How pervasive has this waiving of the attorney-client privilege become? Well, last November we presented findings to the U.S. Sentencing Commission showing that approximately a third of inside counsel respondents, and as many as 48 percent of outside counsel respondents, say they had personally experienced erosion of attorney-client privilege or work product protections.

After that presentation, the Sentencing Commission asked us for even more information about the frequency of waivers and their impact. So our coalition commissioned a second, more detailed survey and got an even greater response rate from the members of our coalition partners. We publicly released the results of this second survey just this morning. They have been provided to the committee, along with more detailed coalition written statements on the subject.

Here are a couple of highlights, and I am going to skip them because General Thornburgh mentioned them, but 75 percent of both inside and outside counsel agreed with the statement that a culture of waiver has evolved to the point the Government agencies believe it is responsible and appropriate to expect a company under investigation to broadly waive attorney-client privilege or waiver protections. Of those who have been investigated, 55 percent of outside counsel say that that is the experience that they had.

Now, our coalition is aggressively seeking to reverse this erosion of confidence in the attorney-client provision and the conversations covered there. We are pleased that the U.S. Sentencing Committee has decided to revisit recently amended commentary to the guidelines that allow the waiver to be a cooperation factor in sentencing, and we have submitted more detailed materials to them.

We would encourage this committee to weigh in with its support of the attorney-client privilege to the Sentencing Commission as it reconsiders its guidelines. It is important to note that the Department of Justice and other regulatory agencies have created this erosion of the privilege without seeking input, oversight, or approval from the Congress or the judiciary. And the plan, Mr. Chairman, that is on the table now, would allow all 92 jurisdictions of the Department of Justice across the country to have their own plan, their own determination, of what is covered and what is protected. That is going to be a circus.

We seek your input and strongly urge you to exercise your oversight of the Department of Justice and the SEC to ensure the protection of attorney-client privilege. Now, let me be very clear as I close: Our efforts are not about trying to protect corrupt companies or businesspeople. Nobody wants corporate wrongdoers caught and punished more than I do and the legitimate and honest businesspeople that I represent. Rather, this is about protecting a well-established and vital constitutional right.

Mr. Chairman, I thank you and the members of the committee, and I look forward to your questions.

[The statement of Mr. Donohue follows:]

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Donohue.

Mr. Sullivan.

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM M. SULLIVAN, JR.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Thank you. Good afternoon, Chairman Coble, Ranking Member Scott, and members of the subcommittee. Thank you for your kind invitation to address you today concerning the Department of Justice policies and practices with regard to seeking attorney-client privilege and work product protection waivers from corporations, and whether the waiver of such privilege and protection should be relevant to assessing the corporations' cooperation efforts within the meaning of the organizational guidelines.

I am currently a partner at the law firm of Winston & Strawn, where I specialize in white collar criminal defense and corporate internal investigations. For 10 years, from 1991 to 2001, I served as an assistant U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia. In these capacities, I have been involved in virtually all aspects of white collar investigations and corporate defense.

I have overseen both criminal investigations as a prosecutor and internal corporate investigations as a defense attorney. And I have represented both corporations and individuals in internal investigations and before Federal law enforcement authorities and regulators as well as in class action, derivative, and ERISA litigation.

My perspective on corporate cooperation and the waiver of attorney-client and attorney work product privileges has therefore been forged not only by my experiences on both sides of the criminal justice system, but by my participation in the civil arena as well. This afternoon, I am eager to give you a view from the arena.

The real issue is not the waiver but what is being waived and how it was assembled. For business organizations today, the traditional protections afforded by the attorney-client privilege and the work product doctrine are under siege. The privilege reflects the public priority of facilitating the observance of law through candor with counsel.

Prosecutors and regulators now routinely demand that in return for the mere prospect of leniency, corporations engage in intensive internal investigations of alleged wrongdoing and submit detailed written reports documenting both the depth and breadth of their inquiry as well as the basis for their conclusions. Attorney impressions, opinions, and evaluations are necessarily included.

When pressed on this practice, many prosecutors and regulators will publicly insist that they are only seeking a roadmap--the identity of the individuals involved, the crucial acts, and the supporting documentation. However, this has not been my personal experience.

Just last week I was asked by a Government regulator in our very first meeting to broadly waive attorney-client private and work product protection and to provide copies of interview notes, even before I had completed my client's internal investigation myself, and accordingly, even before I had determined as corporate counsel that cooperation would be in my client's best interest.

Incredibly, I was further asked whether or not I was appearing as an advocate for my client the corporation or whether I was an independent third party. Presumably, the regulators had hoped that I would undertake their investigation for them, despite the fact that I would be paid by my client to do so.

Most importantly, however, such roadmap requests fail to relieve the valid concerns of corporations related to privilege and work product waivers. A less than carefully drawn roadmap risks a broad subject matter waiver of attorney-client privilege and attorney work product protection under a current authority applicable in just about every jurisdiction.

The waiver of attorney-client communications arriving in connection with a factual roadmap subsequently disclosed to law enforcement extends beyond the disclosure itself and encompasses all communications on that subject matter. The consequences of this result can be extreme, in that even a rudimentary roadmap is the product of information obtained through thousands of hours of legal work spent conducting interviews, parsing statements from hundreds of pages of interview notes, and analyzing thousands and perhaps millions of pages of both privileged and nonprivileged corporate documents.

Furthermore, the waiver would be applicable not only to the law enforcement officials receiving the information, but would also embrace future third parties, including other Government agencies and opportunistic plaintiffs' counsel seeking fodder for class action and derivative strike suits.

In addressing the practice of conditioning leniency for disclosure of otherwise privileged reports, I believe that a balance must be struck between the legitimate interests of law enforcement in pursuing and punishing the legal conduct, the benefits to be retained by corporations which assist this process and determine to take remedial action, and the rights of individual employees.

It is imperative that we do not sacrifice accuracy and fundamental fairness for expedience and convenience now routinely requested by the Government. An equilibrium much achieved between the aforementioned competing concerns.

The issues being addressed today in this committee meeting are not simply part of an academic debate. Across the country, there are dozens of corporations scrutinized in internal investigations at any one time, with real consequences for real people. These investigations directly impact the lives of thousands of workers and millions of shareholders.

In conditioning leniency upon the disclosure of otherwise privileged information, we need to accommodate the competing interests of effective law enforcement, the benefits down to deserving corporations, the corporation's own interests and its ability to observe law through consultation with counsel, and the fundamental rights of individual employees.

Reaching a consensus on the information sought by the Government, limiting that information to non-opinion factual work product or perhaps the adoption of a selective waiver for cooperating corporations, and lucid, comprehensive standards to guide internal investigations, are each important first steps.

Thank you, and I look forward to your questions.

[The statement of Mr. Sullivan follows:]

* SUBCOMMITTEE INSERT **********

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Sullivan.

Mr. McCallum, I think--by the way, we apply the 5-minute rule to ourselves as well, so we will try to move along here.

Mr. McCallum, I think Mr. Donohue may have touched on this. And where I am coming from is: Does the policy require uniform review? That is to say, a United States Attorney in the Middle District of North Carolina, would it be likely or unlikely that he or she would be operating under a policy that would be identical to the Eastern District of Virginia?

Your mike is not on, Mr. McCallum.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Mr. Chairman, in response to that question, the memorandum that I issued does allow for the different United States Attorneys to institute a review policy in accordance with the peculiar circumstance of their particular district.

For instance, the Southern District of New York may be very different than the District of Montana in terms of the number of sophisticated corporate cases that involve allegations of corporate fraud, and therefore the number of people that are in the Southern District of New York, the number of Assistant United States Attorneys that are available for the review process, may be very different than the number of attorneys that are in a different district.

So it is not identical, but it affords the type of prosecutorial discretion in the United States Attorney to determine what it will be, and that is coordinated through the Executive Office of United States Attorneys in the Department of Justice as well.

Mr. COBLE. I thank you, sir. Now, you indicated, Mr. McCallum, that in some instances, the corporate defendant may well be the one to initiate the waiver. Do you have any figures as to, comparatively speaking, Government initiated or defendant initiated?

Mr. MCCALLUM. Mr. Chairman, we do not have statistical figures like that. And most of the surveys, including, we believe, the survey that we have not yet seen that the Chamber of Commerce just issued this morning, are based more on perception and anecdotal evidence than they are on very, very specific identification of particular cases.

We have been involved in a dialogue with various business representatives, including the task force of the American Bar Association that is dealing with this issue, with its chairman. And we invited him and Jamie Conrad, who is here today, to come out and talk with the United States Attorneys last year at their annual conference to make sure that the United States Attorneys were aware of exactly the concerns and the issues that the business community was seeing in this.

And we were told at that time that a very detailed study of particular cases would be prepared and would be provided to us. And just last week, Mr. Ide, the ABA chairman, indicated to me that that was forthcoming. That will allow us to dig down into the specifics because each case is really unique, Mr. Chairman. And it is that sort of detailed analysis that will be necessary to determine or refute the ''routineness'' with which these waivers are requested. We do not believe that they are ''routinely'' requested.

Mr. COBLE. I thank you, Mr. McCallum.

Mr. Thornburgh, during your many years of public service, were you ever aware of any criminal case in which the Justice Department sought or required an attorney-client privilege waiver from a cooperating corporation, A; and if so, what was and is your position on that issue?

Mr. THORNBURGH. I am not aware of any such request, Mr. Chairman, although I can't absolutely verify that such a request was not made at any time during the 25 years that I have been affiliated one way or another with the Department of Justice. It is a development of the last decade or so.

I would just like to add a footnote to Mr. McCallum's response. It seems to me that the Department is giving up too much by permitting each United States Attorney to frame his own set of policies on this kind of question. Uniformity and internal Department of Justice review has been adopted in any number of areas that are sensitive, such as issuing a subpoena to an attorney or to a reporter, or using undercover sting operations. Those are not within the discretion of the U.S. Attorney. And when we are dealing with such a sensitive and venerable privilege as the attorney-client privilege, it seems to me that ought to be the kind of rule that is applied.

Secondly, I think that there is a controversy, at least, with regard to statistics about whether or not frequent use is made of this waiver request. And the easiest way to do that is to promulgate a review process within the Department so that you have readily available at your fingertips the absolute number of times it has been carried out.

If, as the Department claims, these are limited and infrequent, it would not impose any undue burden. If, on the other hand, they are as the perceptions indicate from this report, it would provide a solid base for evaluating whether or not this process is going forward in the right manner.

Mr. COBLE. I thank you, Mr. Thornburgh. I see my time has expired. Gentlemen, we probably will have a second round of questioning because I have questions for Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Donohue. This is significant enough, I think, to do that.

The gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SCOTT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, we have a public policy on the attorney-client privilege which we are trying to protect. There are other kind of public policies that can't be--where you can't use certain things as evidence when you are trying to investigate and fix a problem. You can't--the fact that you fixed a product subsequently can't be used to show negligence of the former product because that would obviously discourage fixing. Evidence that you tried to settle a case can't be used as an admission because that would discourage settlements.

Is there a public policy that we want to protect in trying to protect, to the extent possible, the attorney-client privilege, Mr. McCallum?

Mr. MCCALLUM. Ranking Member Scott, there is unquestionably recognized within the Department of Justice the societal benefits that attend to the attorney-client privilege and work product privilege and various other privileges. And it is certainly something that the United States Attorneys are--and the other Federal prosecutors are mindful of.

And I think that one of the things that you are alluding to is something that all three of my distinguished panelists have touched on, and that is the providing of information to the Government, whether to a regulator or to a prosecutor, and the consequences of that disclosure in the civil litigation area.

Now, that, I mentioned previously, is an area that the Federal Rules Advisory Committee on Evidence is looking at. It is also an area that there have been bills introduced and the Congress to address that issue. So I think that there is certainly recognition.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, I think Mr. Donohue kind of alluded to civil litigation because if somebody blurts something out in a criminal investigation totally unrelated to what may be said affecting civil litigation, you could open yourself up to all kinds of problems including massive punitive damages if all that information got out. Is that right?

Mr. MCCALLUM. There is a consequence of a waiver of attorney-client privilege, and one context being a waiver in other contexts. That is correct, Mr. Scott.

Mr. SCOTT. Okay. Well, have you ever asked for waivers in individual cases?

Mr. MCCALLUM. I am sure that, like former Attorney General Thornburgh, I can't tell you that that has never happened. I am--it has never happened in any case that I am involved in. And I think there is one issue that needs to be focused on here, is that there is an issue of attorney-client waivers, privilege waivers, by the corporation. That is, the lawyers who represent the corporation. In my opening statement, I made the point that they do not represent the management. They do not represent employees.

And I am sure that Mr. Sullivan, every time he does an internal investigation and interviews a witness, he explains to them exactly who he represents, i.e., that it is the corporation, and that that individual who is being interviewed is not his client and there is no attorney-client privilege between him and that individual.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, I mean, in an individual criminal case where an individual is the defendant, have you ever asked for a waiver of attorney-client privilege?

Mr. MCCALLUM. I never have, Mr. Scott. But my experience over my 35-year career has been predominately in the civil litigation area. So I would not be someone who would be able to respond to that effectively.

Mr. SCOTT. Have you ever had cases that the defendant, the corporate defendant, got leniency for cooperation when they had not waived attorney-client privilege?

Mr. MCCALLUM. I cannot personally testify to that. I can tell you that within the Department, I am informed by those that have extensive experience in the criminal area that that is indeed the case, that cooperation is but one factor in the Thompson Memorandum in determining whether to indict someone. And it is a factor, of course, in the Sentencing Commission current matters.

Mr. SCOTT. Can you get the cooperation benefit without waiving attorney-client privilege?

Mr. MCCALLUM. There are--there are any number of instances, I am informed, in which that is indeed the case, yes, and that the circumstances of a corporation providing information may not require the waiver of attorney-client privileged information of work product information.

Mr. SCOTT. Let me ask one further question. Mr. Sullivan, you represent corporations, many of whom have multi-jurisdictional activities. Would there be a problem in having 92 different processes in terms of what the attorney-client privilege may be?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Ranking Member Scott, yes. I think that would be a very difficult road to navigate. It is difficult enough working with prosecutors and regulators who are insistent that you do their work for them. And in fact, if I am in a situation where I am evaluating a cooperative mode for purposes of obtaining favorable treatment by the Government in exchange for a new compliance program, ferreting out wrongdoing--which would be my obligation in any event--to the extent that I would have to, in a multi-district context, deal with a variety of competing considerations along the same lines would make my job much more difficult and would also cause intractable problems on the part of the corporation in terms of negotiating a resolution.

Let me also add that I know the context here is cooperation, but I don't think the presumption of innocence should be forgotten. And when I addressed the committee a few minutes ago and mentioned that at the very first meeting I was asked to waive the privilege, I also mentioned that I had not even conducted an internal investigation and therefore had not made up my mind as to whether I have defensible conduct or not. So I think that also illuminates the mindset that corporate counsel are dealing with today.

Mr. COBLE. I thank the gentleman.

We have been joined by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Chabot.

And in order of appearance, the Chair recognizes the distinguished gentleman from Florida, Mr. Feeney.

Mr. FEENEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I am grateful for the testimony from all our distinguished panel.

You know, I had an observation I thought perhaps you could talk a little bit about because I think you have gone into some details about the importance historically of the attorney-client privilege.

By the way, I would point out that most of us who, you know, practiced law at one point think of this more in the context of criminal--of violent crime as opposed to corporate crime, exactly for the reasons that former Attorney General Thornburgh laid out. This really hasn't been used until the last 8 or 10 years, this waiver requirement.

But the average violent criminal doesn't have deep pockets. And other than the fact that if he fails to comply and waive privilege, for example, there is very little incentive. He is not subject to fines because he has got the empty pocket defense. He is not worried about civil litigants. But for a lot of the reasons that Mr. Donohue laid out, the pressure on corporate clients and business clients is immense to find favor as they cooperate, and there is an enormous pressure on them.

I do understand the necessity at times to try in a corporate context, especially with respect to fraud, to find out what everybody knew, and that would include corporate counsel. What I am worried about, and I guess I want to put it in this respect--Mr. Sullivan might be the best person to answer this--we live in a very new climate on Wall Street. I mean, investors appropriately expect a lot more transparency. We had things like Enron and WorldCom.

But in some ways, we may have overreacted. Post-Sarbanes-Oxley, directors have some real problems. Number one, we don't have a standard set of accounting principles, so that a major international corporate firm may be responsible, and the directors individually liable, to know where every box of pencils or paper clips are. And we don't have standards to protect people based on de minimis standards.

When directors or executives with corporations go and they hire an independent auditor nowadays, they are not allowed to seek the guidance of their auditor. They can't get help from one of the top four accounting firms that they have to pay. That firm is not allowed to tell them how to comply with Sarbanes-Oxley.

Now we are in a position where if we are going to have what amounts to blanket waivers or, in some jurisdictions, anyway, what amounts to blanket waivers, where corporate executives and corporate directors, who are going to be held personally responsible even if they didn't necessarily know about mis-actions that somebody else in the corporation took over, can't be candid with their lawyer and cannot count on candid advice back.

That type of chilling effect makes it almost impossible for anybody with any sense to agree to be a member of the board of directors today, and I thought maybe Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Donohue could talk about this in the totality of the circumstances today in corporate law. I mean, this is just one more burden that makes it almost impossible to try to do your job in an honest way as a member of a board or an executive at a major corporation.

Mr. Sullivan, go ahead.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Thank you, Mr. Feeney. Well, in fact, you are absolutely correct. Corporations have noticed a dearth of willing applicants in terms of individuals who are willing to serve on boards. What is attempted these days is to maintain a level of independence, both with outside counsel as well as special audit committees, special litigation committees, and as you mentioned, even accountants.

But it also goes right back to what Mr. McCallum said, and he is absolutely correct. I am well aware of the Upjohn warnings, and when I am pursuing an internal investigation, I am obligated and I do advise the individuals whom I am interviewing that I do not represent them.

But in fact, if we move forward and they are led to believe that not only do I not represent them but I am also going to turn over everything they say to the Government at a moment's notice, upon caprice or whim because I am interested in maintaining the best possible position of the corporation, we are in a situation where, as Mr. Donohue mentioned, I won't get any information at all.

The corporate entity is an artificial entity, true. It has legal responsibilities, true. But it also is run and managed by people. The acts of the employees are imputed to the corporation. So you must deal with the people because they are the ones who bind the corporation.

And for my--from my perspective as well as the perspective of independent directors or board members or auditors or management, we need to be able to access facts. We need to be able to do it freely, without any concerns about where those facts may ultimately go. And we need to be able to manage the information we have so that we can evaluate properly how to respond to Government inquiries.

As I mentioned before, all too often the first mode that a corporation will pursue is cooperation. They will find or seek to find responsible employees and throw them under the bus. That is not necessarily the best policy. In a free-flowing exchange of information environment where the lawyer can carefully evaluate the information he has, he can make the best decision for that corporation in how to deal with regulators and ultimately save everybody a lot of money, shareholders and individual investors.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Donohue?

Mr. DONOHUE. I serve on three public company boards of directors. And I will say in response to your inquiry that, first of all, it is getting harder and harder to attract competent directors, not only because of the fear of liability, which is getting greater, but because of the extraordinary amount of time and process that has to be followed following the Sarbanes-Oxley rules and their implementation.

What directors most worry about, other than running the company, leading the company and having good management that operates in an honorable way, are two things, and that is dealing with regulators of every type and shape and dealing with the Justice Department. And by the way, when you get people like Mr. McCallum here, if he were to come out and deal with the issues that individual companies have to deal with, we would do fine.

But they have the greatest collection of young, soon-to-make-it, want-to-be-famous kinds of lawyers all around the country who, by the way, don't have the same amount of judgment and experience, and many have little or no idea what corporations do and how they are supposed to work.

So when 92 different groups--by the way, and when there is an approval, it will be approval by the U.S. Attorney for one of his underlings--they are going to have 92 different approaches to do this, it is going to get a little more complicated for most of the companies on whose boards I serve.

And I am not--we are not talking about huge criminal issues; there are always questions with the SEC and others. And it gets very, very complicated when everybody has got a different rule. Everybody has got a different way of approaching it. And standing behind them like vultures on a fence are the class action and the mass action lawyers that are sucking the vitality out of American industry. And they are doing it, maybe unintended, but they are doing it with the help of our Government, who is putting us in that kind of a position that it shouldn't happen.

Mr. COBLE. The gentleman's time has expired.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Delahunt, recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DELAHUNT. I would think, Mr. Sullivan, that you must find yourself in a position where not only do you have to inform the employee that you are not his lawyer, but there is going to be a likelihood that what he tells you will become--you will at some point in time be compelled to reveal to the Government exactly what he says.

Have you run into that situation?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, Mr. Delahunt. As part of the Upjohn warnings, I am required to advise the employee that I represent the company, that the privilege resides with the company, and that the privilege can be waived by the company at any time--

Mr. DELAHUNT. And that--

Mr. SULLIVAN. --and in any manner.

Mr. DELAHUNT. --in a significant number of cases, the privilege is waived.

You know what I can't understand, Mr. McCallum, is what happened in the past 10 years? You know, for 20 years of my own professional life, I was a--I was a prosecutor. Did a number of sophisticated white collar crime investigations.

And, I mean, there are grand juries. There is the use of informants. You know, we knew how to squeeze people without sacrificing or eroding the attorney-client privilege.

You know, I just have this very uneasy feeling that it is the easy way to do it, you know. There is a certain level of, you know, why should I--why should I have to really exercise myself to secure the truth?

You know, from what I understand, there has been no review in terms of the frequency of the waiver. There is no data. There is nothing empirical. But, you know, Mr. Thornburgh and Mr. Sullivan, you know, I am sure they have had extensive practices. At least anecdotally, you know, they are here. They are concerned.

Is there something that I am missing that the traditional law enforcement investigatory techniques were insufficient?

Mr. MCCALLUM. Mr. Delahunt--

Mr. DELAHUNT. I got to tell you something. I am a little annoyed with the Sentencing Commission, too, making this a factor. You know, where did that come from? Go ahead.

Mr. MCCALLUM. I believe it came from the defense bar, who wanted to pin down for certain that if there was a waiver--to answer the second question first--

Mr. DELAHUNT. Sure. Thanks.

Mr. MCCALLUM. --if there was a waiver, that it would necessarily be deemed cooperation for purposes of a downward departure. But let me--

Mr. DELAHUNT. Well, I would just dwell on that for a minute because we will get a second round.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Okay.

Mr. DELAHUNT. I would want to--I would want to hear that coming from, you know, some criminal defense lawyer, saying that that is the import of it. Because that tells me that if they are looking for that kind of certainty, that this is being used frequently. This is--this is becoming the rule rather than the exception. But go ahead and take a shot at my--

Mr. MCCALLUM. Let me respond to the first question, Mr. Delahunt, and that is what has happened recently over the years? I think we only have to look back to the 1997 through 2006 era to see a spate of very complicated, very complex, very arcane, very difficult to determine corporate frauds of immense proportions in terms of the dollar amounts involved which also--

Mr. DELAHUNT. With all due respect, Mr. McCallum, I got to tell you something. That just doesn't--that doesn't hold water. You know, I am sure immense complex fraud has been being perpetrated, you know, since the days of the robber barons. If we don't have the resources in the Department of Justice to conduct the necessary investigations to deal with it, then let's assess it on a resource basis. Let's not do it the easy way that erodes, I believe, a fundamental principal of American jurisprudence.

I mean, if that is what you are telling me, I won't accept it because of my own experience. You know, fraud is nothing new. Uncovering it maybe is, but, I mean, there is--you have--you know, you can use immunity. There are informants. There are grand juries. There are all kinds of ways to do it.

And I am sure Mr. Thornburgh, being a former Attorney General and a former, I think, Attorney General in a State, I am sure he supervised or conducted a series of heavy investigations that are as complex as anything that, you know, occurred from 1997 to date, and did it in a way that didn't erode significant legal principles that are embedded in our jurisprudence.

I will be back, and you can think about the question.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Thank you.

Mr. COBLE. The gentleman's time has expired.

The distinguished gentleman from California.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Chairman, it is always fun being with my friend from Massachusetts. I was trying to figure out what he said when he said ''partay,'' and then I thought he was talking about getting a drink and going out someplace.

[Laughter.]

Mr. DELAHUNT. I can't understand what you are talking about.

Mr. LUNGREN. But I understand. You weren't talking about a party, you were talking about a part A. I got that. Okay.

And Mr. Sullivan, I have been informed by counsel here that the two of you used to work together, so that you used to be one of those fellows that resembled the remarks of Mr. Donohue.

[Laughter.]

Mr. LUNGREN. But now you have made it.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Volkoff was a fine mentor.

Mr. LUNGREN. And I wondered if you had to deal with 92 different jurisdictions. It would certainly improve your billables.

[Laughter.]

Mr. SULLIVAN. I try to get involved in--

Mr. LUNGREN. But those Italian suits could be kept up, as it was.

Just to put it on the record, I have submitted a letter last August to the Sentencing Commission regarding my concerns about the Sentencing Commission's commentary with respect to the rule. It looks to me like that amendment authorizes and encourages the Government to require entities to waive the attorney-client privilege and work product protections as a condition of showing cooperation. And that is the huge concern I have here.

Let me ask you this, Mr. McCallum: Should we in the Congress believe that any time the administration refuses to waive executive privilege, that the administration is not cooperating with the Congress?

Mr. MCCALLUM. Absolutely not, Mr. Lungren. I would--I would hesitate to make that argument. There are benefits, and I think that in my opening statement I described that there are definitely benefits, societal benefits, from attorney-client privilege.

Mr. LUNGREN. But, see, that--I understand. See, that is my problem. If we in the Congress were to every time the President says that there is a reason to protect executive privilege, not only for his administration but for future administrations, that every time he did that he was violating the sense of cooperation that should prevail between two equal branches of government, I think we would be wrong.

And I see the Justice Department taking a position that if a corporate defendant or potential defendant refuses to waive that privilege, that is a priori evidence of the fact that they are not cooperating. And that is the problem I really have here.

See, the President makes the arguments--and I think that you should--and the Department makes the arguments that there is a reason for those privileges that at the executive branch has. And the reason is part institutional, but part to have that ability to speak within yourselves, that is, that institution of the administration, which is more than the President but is personified by the President. He can talk to his advisors without believing that we are going to hear everything he says.

And here you have a situation where you want a corporation to follow the law, I presume. And you would want the corporation to listen to good counsel, I would think. And here we have got a rule that seems to me to work in the opposite direction.

And I think that that weighs heavy on me and other members here on this panel. And so I would ask, don't you see the creeping intrusion here? I mean, first you have the first memorandum. Now we have the second memorandum, which is a little tighter and a little tougher. And then, following that, you have the Sentencing Commission saying, well, that is a bad idea. As a matter of fact, we are going to have that as evidence of cooperation, and the lack of it as evidence of lack of cooperation.

What is a corporate counsel to do under those circumstances?

Mr. MCCALLUM. Well, there are a series of questions

there, Mr. Lungren. Number one, with respect to the Sentencing Commission, the Department's position has been we would be comfortable with the Sentencing Commission going back to where it was before that amendment.

Mr. LUNGREN. Well, is that your position? Is that the administration's position?

Mr. MCCALLUM. I believe that that is the Department of Justice's review--

Mr. LUNGREN. That is what I mean.

Mr. MCCALLUM. --underway at this particular time. I do not know whether that has been absolutely finalized. But my review of that is that there would not necessarily be an objection to going back to the way it was before, where it was not addressed.

Number two, let me talk about the issue of cooperation. Attorney-client privilege waivers are only one factor with respect to cooperation. There are many other ways for a corporation under the Thompson Memorandum to indicate and to provide a degree of cooperation that will impact both the decisions on the charging of the corporation and on the determination of recommendations to be made to any sentencing commission about--or to any sentencing body about a downward deviation. So I don't--I don't think that it is accurate to assert that privilege waivers are the sine qua non or the absolute requirement in order to achieve a status of cooperation with prosecutors.

With respect to the diversity of jurisdictions, the 92 different districts, as I indicated previously, this is not a situation in which one size fits all. And what the McCallum Memorandum really did was to recognize a best practices that was, in my view, attendant to United States Attorneys across the United States in which privilege waiver requests, formal ones from the Government, as opposed to privilege waiver offers voluntarily from corporations, would go through some sort of supervisory review that would preserve for the peculiar circumstances of that particular district and the United States Attorney there a degree of flexibility.

But all of that would be done in coordination through the Executive Office of United States Attorneys. So I don't think it is an accurate picture to paint, 92 different definitions of what is attorney-client privileged and what is not attorney-client privileged. It is a second set of eyes to reassure that there is a deliberate and considered process before attorney-client privilege waivers are requested by the Department of Justice.

Mr. LUNGREN. Thank you.

Mr. COBLE. The gentleman's time is expired.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Chabot.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Donohue, if I could begin with you. Can you give the subcommittee any examples from your members of instances where a request for a Department of Justice--for an attorney-client waiver resulted in unnecessary consequences for the corporation, perhaps a third party suit, for example, and arguably the information could have been gathered without a waiver?

Mr. DONOHUE. Well, sir, you have just put your finger on why this is a very difficult matter to challenge, either here in the Congress or in the courts, because most companies that have been painted into this box are not going to come forward and give you an example. I know many examples. I would suggest it is probably in our mutual best interests not to lay out the names of a bunch of companies.

I could tell you a couple of interesting points. In one matter that I am aware of, the prosecutor in a jurisdiction gave a public speech and said, in our jurisdiction, anybody failing to waive the privilege will be considered guilty. I passed that material on to the Justice Department; I don't know how it was used.

But if you were to go--and by the way, it is very, very important to understand that the SEC and the Justice Department have hundreds and thousands of investigations going on. And the great amount of these have nothing to do with fraud. They have arguments about proper accounting and all kinds of other issues.

Where there is fraud, there should be a vigorous investigation. But, you know, I was trying to think of a good example that I might use. You know, the Inquisition supposedly had the blessing of the Church, but their means weren't very appropriate. And when Mr. McCallum began today, he laid out a rationale of why they should be able to do these things because of the assignment they were given to respond to Sarbanes-Oxley.

My understanding is that the privilege is a constitutional protection, and that the end does not justify the means, and that the serious nature of this--and I think the point made about resources did not--should not put the companies in the position of conducting investigations, which I am aware of many, to supplement the work and actually do to the work of the prosecutors.

And I ended my statement by saying if people maliciously, directly, and intentionally go out and violate the law and they are in the American business community, lock them up. But you try and go out, as Mr. Sullivan indicated, and deal with these prosecutors--and you have got two sets of them; you got the SEC and you got the Justice Department, and they are playing off each other, and they are sitting in the same rooms, you know, when you have a civil issue and you have a criminal issue. And I would just say, you know, if you and I want to walk down a hall one day, I will give you four or five examples. But with the Chairman's permission and protection, I am not going to do that here.

[Laughter.]

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much.

Mr. Sullivan, if I could ask you the next question. What alternative techniques are available to prosecutors to obtain the needed information from a corporation without requiring a waiver of the attorney-client privilege?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Delahunt alluded to many, drawing upon his hears as a prosecutor. There are all types of investigative techniques. There is cooperation undertaken by individuals within the corporation. There is the grand jury process, with subpoenas. There are wires.

What also is available, and which I suggested, for purposes of a corporation who is--which is interested in cooperating is the factual recitation, which is actually quite common: a factual review of what the outside counsel's investigation has yielded, with a view toward working in concert with the Government, ferreting out the criminal activity as it is perhaps determined to be a rogue element or an independent group working without knowledge of management. We see that in export control cases, for example, where shipments are made abroad by individuals who have an incentive for sales commissions without the knowledge of management or at least without management understanding that ineffective internal controls were in place.

All of this suggests that the corporate entity itself and outside counsel, certainly responsible management, as Mr. Donohue has mentioned, has an interest in abiding by the law. And to the extent that it becomes aware of problems with the law, either through its own inquiry or through an external source, a subpoena or whatnot, outside counsel working with in-house counsel wants to ferret that out and find it out.

And we will assist the Government to the extent that it is in our best interests to provide them with the roadmap, with the factual outline, who you should talk to, what this document means. But we shouldn't have to and we don't want to provide them with our mental impressions, our specific interview notes, our opinion work product, and our sensitive discussions with employees because we want to preserve the ability to talk to them again about another problem so that we can continue to observe the law.

And the factual recitation is not something that is ultimately going to be a problem. Factual recitations are found in indictments every day in every public context. If you want to learn what happened in a particular case, what went wrong, read the Government's indictment. And we will help you with that factual outline to preserve our ability to interact with you and to get credit for cooperation. But you should be encouraged, Mr. Prosecutor, and you should insist on doing your own legal analysis.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you.

Mr. COBLE. The gentleman's time is expired. I thank the gentleman.

Gentlemen, as I said earlier, I think this issue warrants a second round, so we will commence that now.

Mr. Donohue, I may be repetitive, but I want to be sure this is in the record. In your testimony, you mentioned that erosion of the attorney-client privilege will frustrate corporate efforts to comply with regulations and statutes. Elaborate a little bit more in detail about that.

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Chairman, what happens in a company is when issues of significance--it happens with me every day--come up that we are dealing with some Federal regulation, some political regulation, whatever it is, the first thing we do is call the general counsel. When we are sued, as people are on a regular basis, the first thing we do is call the general counsel. And these are all civil matters.

But I want to have a feeling that when I sit down and talk to Steve Bokat, who is the general counsel of the United States Chamber of Commerce, that what I am talking about is going to stay there. And if I had a feeling that in matters where there may be differences with the Government, there may be differences with regulars, if I talk to him, if anybody wanted to bring an action against us, he is going to be up sitting--talking about what we discussed, I am not too sure I am going to talk to him. Nor am I going to go and get my regulatory counsel, nor am I going to go down and get my outside counsel.

At least--you know, the term ''counsel'' is used up here a great deal. And if you look to your right, you have your counsel, and you sure want to make sure that what you are talking to him about is not blabbed all over this place.

Mr. COBLE. Yes. Well, that is what I thought you--

Mr. DONOHUE. And I think we have a constitutional right to do that.

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Donohue.

Mr. Sullivan, in your testimony, you noted that you represented a client before a regulator who requested a waiver prior to your client's declining to cooperate or deciding to cooperate.

What impact would such a waiver have on your ability to represent a client corporation, given--under those facts?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Of course, I declined that request immediately. And in fact, as Mr. Donohue so perceptively referenced only upon hearing my anecdote, there were more than one law enforcement agency representative in there. There was the tag team, as he referenced a few moments ago.

As I said before, this was a very early meeting, a meet and greet, if you will, where I was attempting to outline to them what my preliminary view of the evidence I had gathered after only a couple weeks would suggest as a function of how to address their concerns.

I had not made up my mind as to what I would do in terms of seeking cooperation or defending. As I said before, we should never forget about the presumption of innocence as a corporate representative, as a corporate lawyer, and we should always ferret out the facts and then have a good understanding of the law on those facts to understand whether or not there was a crime committed and whether or not there was a credible defense.

But to go directly to answer your question, if I had undertaken to waive the privilege, how would I walk into that company's office the following day? We had not determined that a crime had been committed or that there were regulatory problems. I needed to find out what went on, and in the best way possible, so that I could represent that client in an informed way.

Who would speak to me, Mr. Chairman? What type of evidence would I be able to gain? I would be nothing more than an arm of the Government. I would in fact have been deputized. My role would be completely eliminated. It makes no sense, particularly when, if I found there was wrongdoing and I needed to work with the Government, I would be most pleased to do so by rendering factual, non-opinion work product.

Mr. COBLE. I thank the gentleman.

The gentleman from Virginia. The distinguished gentleman from Virginia.

[Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Sullivan, why would a corporation do an in-depth investigation of suspected employee misconduct if the report of that investigation has to be turned over to the prosecutors?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, frequently reports are turned over to prosecutors. In fact, we see public reports very frequently. We just saw a very public Fannie Mae report. Shell has got a report. Baker Botts has got Freddie Mac's report on its website.

The difference is, again, reports outlining factual undertakings and understandings as opposed to attorney work product and attorney-client communications. And--

Mr. SCOTT. Well, let me ask it another way. If you are writing such a report, would you be writing it to be read by the president of the corporation or by the prosecutor? I mean, you know, you would say things differently depending on who the audience is.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Sure. And it depends who I represent and what my charge might be. The individuals who, for example, are writing the Fannie Mae report may have been reporting to an independent board, an independent accounting board or an independent board of directors, coming in after the fact to outline what facts happened. I think they would be very cautious in outlining any opinion work product in that report.

And to be fair to the Justice Department, I have not seen requests for waiver of attorney-client communications. It is all work product. And I am not saying that in any way to suggest that it is any less nefarious. It is the opinion attorney work product, which is perhaps the most dangerous.

But to the extent that I would undertake to write a report, a report for the general counsel or for the board of directors, I would insist that it be a privileged document, that it would include my mental impressions and opinions, thereby covering it as work product, perhaps made in anticipation of litigation as well. It would certainly be an attorney-client communication because I would be proffering it to the general counsel. But I would never want that to go elsewhere. A parsed, very narrowly drawn factual recitation I might be persuaded to part company with.

One thing I would like to also mention, Ranking Member Scott. You earlier in the hearing talked about public policies regarding inadmissible information and material. I think that was a very important point. I would like to bring out that I have represented Federal prosecutors in internal DOJ investigations, OPR investigations, Office of Professional Responsibility.

There is no compelled waiver of the Fifth Amendment. There is no compelled self-incrimination under pain of losing your job in the Justice Department. There is a Supreme Court case on that, Garrity. Nevertheless, I am literally asked by Justice Department officials to bring my employees in and to tell them they either tell me everything or they walk.

And I have no problem doing that because there is no specific type of due process in a corporation. But the next step is, and by the way, once you get something from that employee and if it is an incriminatory Fifth Amendment waiver, I did it, I want it, Mr. Sullivan. And that is where I draw the line.

They don't extract from their own employees. Why should they ask that kind of duress of mine, or of my clients?

Mr. SCOTT. Thank you. Exactly who can waive the privilege?

Mr. SULLIVAN. The corporation, to the extent that the corporation has the privilege when we are dealing with corporations and employees.

Mr. SCOTT. Who? Who? The CEO?

Mr. SULLIVAN. We would have to get that consent of representative management, whoever is running the program, the board, in consultation with counsel.

Mr. SCOTT. Can the CEO waive the privilege?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Not as an individual. He has got to only do it on behalf of the corporation as a function of his role as a corporate representative.

Mr. SCOTT. Is that right, Mr. Donohue?

Mr. DONOHUE. I believe procedurally the CEO could move, with probably advice of his lawyer, to waive the privilege. But in these kinds of instances, this would be so sensitive that it would already be up to the board, and the board would be informed of that change in circumstance.

Mr. SULLIVAN. and that is what I meant by--

Mr. DONOHUE. That probably wouldn't have been done four or five years ago, but it would sure be done today.

Mr. SCOTT. Are you aware of--the Department indicated that they don't--you can get full cooperation without a waiver. Are you aware of cases where full cooperation credit on sentencing was given without a waiver of attorney-client privilege?

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Scott, I am sure it has. I cannot give you a definitive case. The more difficult the case, the more visible the Justice Department and the SEC has been in announcing the case and how they are going to be successful and all these terrible things that have happened before they have had their full investigation, the more aggressive the SEC and Justice Department lawyers are going to be to try and make sure that they are successful.

And when they are having problems in finding what they thought they were going to find, then they want the company to investigate it for them, and they want people to break the privilege. We are not trying to protect criminals. We are trying to protect a constitutional protection that is given to individuals and corporate individuals, and we believe it is being eroded.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, could I ask one other question?

In terms of corporate organization, which attorney--do all attorneys in the corporation have the privilege, or is it just corporate counsel we are talking about? And let me follow up on that by saying, I mean, there is some--if you are trying to discuss certain activities, trying to come up with a process that may be kind of borderline legal, would you help yourself by having the person in that position you are talking to be an attorney where you wouldn't get that privilege if it was not an attorney? And do you find people hiring lawyers in kind of non-lawyer positions to try to get a privilege?

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Scott, I am going to respond and then ask Mr. Sullivan if he would make sure I am correct. But I am not sending him a fee.

[Laughter.]

Mr. DONOHUE. You know, generally, when one is dealing with broad corporate matters, the general counsel of the corporation, who is an officer of the court by his own professional standing, would be the person that would have this role with the CEO or other executives.

There are, however, issues, for example, on SEC questions or environmental questions or other matters where there are senior lawyers within the institution, probably but not necessarily working for the general counsel, who on those matters would be seen as the more senior person with whom discussions and therefore protected discussions could have been held.

Mr. Sullivan, you have had a minute to think about that.

Mr. SULLIVAN. You are absolutely right. My experience has been working with the general counsel and other lawyers in the company who hold particular expertise in various areas as questions may arise. But no privilege determinations are made without the assent and consent of the board or a special committee who is operating in a joint way--a special committee on accounting, a special litigation committee--so that there is usually a board approval at the highest levels for such--

Mr. SCOTT. Board approval to determine who has a privilege and who doesn't?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, board approval relating to waiver of the privilege.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, I mean, if you have in a certain department--for example, sometimes a person may be hired as a lawyer; sometimes they may have expertise and are not a lawyer. Would the lawyer have--would there be a privilege when the person happens to be a lawyer and a privilege when the person does not happen to be a lawyer, and would there be an advantage in hiring somebody for that position who is a lawyer?

Mr. SULLIVAN. The privilege is held by the corporation. And to the extent that, for example, outside counsel is acting at the behest of the corporation for purposes of pursing an internal investigation, individual employees who are interviewed by that counsel does not hold a privilege relationship with that investigating counsel. The privilege is held by the corporate entity, and it can be waived only through the exercise of a determination by management in consultation with the board.

Mr. DONOHUE. But Mr. Scott--

Mr. SCOTT. That is if you have a lawyer. If you have a non-lawyer in that position, he wouldn't have a privilege. Is that right?

Mr. DONOHUE. Yes. But even the lawyer--for example, as you can imagine in this town, the Chamber is full of lawyers. So if we looked at it as if it were a public company and I walked in the door and talked to any of the lot of lawyers, there is no implied privilege there.

The privilege is when you seek legal guidance from those people who are in a corporate position to give it and protect it. And so walking down to the cafeteria with any number of the lawyers that work for us in some other--and I think Mr. Sullivan--again, I am not paying him a fee--I think he would suggest that there would be no implied privilege there.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I would agree.

Mr. COBLE. The gentleman's time is expired.

The distinguished gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FEENEY. Thank you.

General Thornburgh, you said you don't recall using this required waiver in prosecutions during your tenure as AG. You can think of, you know, briefly a hypothetical where it would be appropriate in order for a corporation to have considered to have cooperated where the attorney-client privilege would be waived, can you not?

Mr. THORNBURGH. I think there are certainly going to be situations where the corporation itself may take the initiative to waive the privilege in order to make available to the Government--

Mr. FEENEY. But off the top of your head, you can't think of where it would be appropriate for the Justice Department to waive--to require a waiver in order for the corporation to have considered cooperating?

Mr. THORNBURGH. I can't, but I wouldn't want to rule it out. I mean, there might be--

Mr. FEENEY. Okay. I think that is very telling.

And with that, you know, Mr. McCallum, I have to tell you, I am, you know, typically a huge supporter of giving the Justice Department the tools that it needs because these are very dangerous times, and we want to clean up Wall Street, Enron, and WorldCom. We're a disaster for investors.

But I would ask you: Have there been any successful prosecutions that you know of of major Wall Street fraud that would not have been successful in the absence of a required waiver?

Mr. MCCALLUM. I can't speak to that because I was not personally involved to a degree to be able to assess the strength or weaknesses of any of those cases.

I would, in response to the previous question, indicate to you, Mr. Feeney, that with respect to circumstances in which it would be clear that a waiver of attorney-client privilege might be necessary would be when the investigation implicates or creates suspicion regarding the general counsel's activity and whether that person is complicit within the fraud. That would be one, you know, prime example that is obvious.

But I can't talk to you with regard to the second question. I can't address the issue of would the prosecution of X have succeeded without a--

Mr. FEENEY. If you would be willing to give us a list, I think I would like to know that, Mr. Chairman, with unanimous consent of the committee, if you would be willing to go back and get us that information.

General Thornburgh?

Mr. THORNBURGH. Yeah. I want to amplify a bit my response. Under the crime-fraud exception, there is no privilege. So it's not a waiver of a privilege; it is that the privilege doesn't arise in the first place.

I want to say one thing, if I might. Having been one of those young, zealous prosecutors that Tom Donohue so eloquently described earlier on, I want to come to their defense. We want our prosecutors to use every single tool that is legally available to them. On the other hand, I don't want to castigate those prosecutors for the faults that we are speaking about today.

This, unfortunately, is a matter of Department policy. And they are empowered to pursue these waivers by the policy of the Department of Justice. And it is that level upon which this requires some redress.

Mr. FEENEY. I thank you, General Thornburgh. And on that one, I wanted to go back to Mr. McCallum.

Mr. McCallum, as I said, I tend to be a huge supporter of the tools the Justice Department needs. But I am not persuaded by the position of the Justice Department in this case--in this case yet. I mean, you start out your remarks by talking about the number of prosecutions.

My goal would be investor confidence and investor security. Prosecuting successfully lots of directors, CFOs, CEOs, and COOs is not necessarily the type of successful, clean Wall Street that I want to see.

And towards that end, you know, Mr. Donohue suggested that a lot of directors nowadays and top level management are spending a good portion, if not the majority of their time, not only building a better, cheaper, quality mousetrap, but on compliance with regulatory burdens and legal burdens. It doesn't seem like that helps investors, and it doesn't seem like that helps a solid corporate governance strategy.

You know, one of the concerns that I have is that if I am a director--let's assume hypothetically I am a director trying to do the right thing, which is to make profits for the shareholders and succeed in business. And let's assume for purposes of my hypothetical that even though I am a Congressman, I am an ethical guy. And let's assume, since it is my hypothetical, that I am trying to do the right thing.

If I have an accounting question, I want to go to my independent auditor. I am not allowed to do that under Sarbanes-Oxley. If there is a close call on a legal or ethical issue, I want to go to the corporation's general counsel. I am terrified to do that for the same reason that if I were a Catholic and there was no protection for things I said to my priest, I would be afraid to confess some of my sins and I would not be able to get the absolution that I were seeking.

So can you see that some of the things that we want to accomplish with solid corporate governance, with people focused on doing the right thing but making a profit for their shareholders, providing a better widget for the marketplace, can you see how some of these concerns--I am not worried about the Enron fraud case. I am worried about the guy trying to do the right thing and how he is afraid to talk to, in the one case, his accountants, and in this case, his lawyers.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Mr. Feeney, we certainly hear the arguments that are made by the business community on that side relating to the chilling effect. I would submit to you that our view of the compliance environment is indeed that corporations are spending more time on compliance. There is more regulatory supervision and oversight that has been imposed as a result of the corporate frauds. And I think that corporate governance is better off for it.

Rather than being deterred from seeking counsel from the general counsel, we believe that management is--in fact has been encouraged to seek advice and counsel, and there are any number of institutional investors who assess the legal risks and who try to determine whether there are compliance programs in place that are vigorously followed and that are effective. That has become part of the investment decision that institutional investors make these days because of the frauds that--corporate frauds that have been experienced in the financial community over the--over the past 6, 7, 8 years.

Mr. FEENEY. Well, just one brief follow-up. If that is part of the investor decision-making process, does that account for the enormous flight into international investments and the fact that since Sarbanes-Oxley, for example, at that time 90 percent of foreign firms that went public raised 90 percent of their capital in the U.S. Today it's the reverse. Foreign corporations, not just because of Sarbanes-Oxley but because of the legal burden, are fleeing, and capital markets are moving overseas where there is no requirement for some of these things and these burdens.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Well, I think that doesn't speak to the issue of the improvements in corporate governance, corporate standards, and corporate citizenship within the United States. And there has been, I would submit, a restoration of confidence in the American corporate culture and in the American financial markets as a result of many of the regulatory oversight matters that have been instituted by the Congress and enforced by the Department of Justice.

Mr. COBLE. The gentleman's time is expired.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DELAHUNT. Mr. McCallum, let me give you a chance to respond to part A. You know, what happened in the past decade since I left, you know, my previous career as a prosecutor? You know, what information do you receive now from waiver of the attorney-client privilege that absolutely cannot be developed from other mechanisms, other tools that have existed, you know, for the past 30, 40 years?

Mr. MCCALLUM. Well, Mr. Delahunt, there are three standards that are articulated in the Thompson Memorandum.

Mr. DELAHUNT. I am not interested in the standards. What I am interested in, you know, is in the course of an investigation, there are--there is a litany of investigative methods, mechanisms, and tools--we could repeat them--that are insufficient that have increased the reliance on the waiver.

Mr. MCCALLUM. All right. There are issues regarding the timeliness of the information and whether or not a particular criminal activity and the consequences of it can be addressed regardless of the investment of significant resources in an adequately--in a timely manner to respond to both the public need, the financial market needs.

Number two, the completeness of the information. I would submit to you that even in the investigations that you diligently pursued, you were not always confident that despite all of the efforts that you had used and all of the tools that you had used, that the information that you found was, in fact, complete. the whole story, all the facts, with all of the documents. And then--

Mr. DELAHUNT. I--go ahead. I am.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Excuse me. And then thirdly is the accuracy of that information. That is, there are subjective judgments that are necessarily made regarding the credibility of witnesses, the credibility of documentation, and all of that is--

Mr. DELAHUNT. Right. But documentation and witness credibility, they can all be tested via grand jury testimony. I mean, everything that you say I can envision occurring without the need to secure the waiver.

What I am concerned about, even--I think that, you know, there has been a restoration of confidence. I think that that in fact has happened as a result of legislative policy. I think it has happened probably because of aggressive enforcement. And I think that is good for our financial markets, and over time, I think it would attract capital as opposed to encourage its flight.

But I am concerned about the attorney-client privilege because I can see slippage in that privilege. You know, today it's, you know, the corporation. You know, tomorrow it's that priest, you know, that I might have gone to confession to. All right? I mean, it makes me very, very uncomfortable, and I really do think that this is a shortcut method to secure evidence that can be developed by alternative means.

You know, I thought Mr. Thornburgh made a good suggestion in terms of the review that alluded to. I would like to see you, the Department on its own, conduct a review. Get us some information. You know, get us some data. I mean, who is doing this and who is initiating it? Because it is a concern.

And, you know, I think that you can probably sense by the questions that have been posed, as well as observations by individual members, that there is a real concern here. And you don't want someone like Lungren from California, you know a far right conservative Republican, and Delahunt, this Northeast liberal, filing legislation on this because I think that is the order of magnitude that is being expressed here.

So respectfully, that is a message that I think you can bring back to Justice, is that there is concern about the Thompson/McCallum Memorandum. Okay?

Mr. MCCALLUM. I will certainly take that message back, Mr. Delahunt.

Mr. COBLE. And for the record, let me say that far left-winger and that far right-winger are both pretty good guys.

Gentlemen, before I forget it, I want to introduce into the record, without objection, coalition letters to preserve the attorney-client privilege.

[The coalition letters follow:]

* INSERT **********

Mr. COBLE. Gentleman, we thank you all very much for being here. In order to ensure a full record and adequate consideration of this issue, the record will be left open for additional submissions for 7 days. Any written questions that a member of the subcommittee wants to submit should also be submitted within the same 7-day period.

This concludes the oversight hearing on white collar enforcement, part 1, attorney-client privilege and corporate waivers. Thank you again, gentlemen. And the subcommittee stands adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 1:50 p.m., the subcommittee was adjourned.]

Memorandum To: Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules
From: Dan Capra, Reporter and Ken Broun, Consultant
Re: Consideration of Rule Concerning Waiver of Attorney-Client Privilege and Work Product
Date: March 22, 2006

At its last meeting, the Committee reviewed two versions of a rule that would govern waiver of privileges and work product. The Committee agreed to continue its consideration of a possible rule on this subject. The Committee resolved that the questions of waiver of privilege and work product were of the utmost importance, and that disuniformity in these waiver rules imposed unnecessary cost and inefficiency in litigation.

In the interim, the Chair of the House Committee on the Judiciary, Congressman Sensenbrenner, issued a letter requesting that the Judicial Conference "initiate a rule-making on forfeiture of privileges." Of course, a rule of privilege cannot become law under the ordinary rulemaking process. Privilege rules must be enacted directly by Congress. Congressman Sensenbrenner's letter recognizes this fact. He requests the rulemaking process to proceed in the ordinary fashion, however, with the idea that whatever comes out of that process will be reviewed by Congress and directly enacted if acceptable.

In light of these developments, the Reporter and Consultant drafted a Rule 502, and a Committee Note. That Rule and Note are included in the hearing materials behind Tab 1 of the agenda book, and they are also attached as an appendix to this memorandum.

Rule 502 and the accompanying note are intended to capture the discussion at the previous Committee meeting, at which there appeared to be substantial agreement on the following fundamental principles:

1. Uniform rules on waiver are required, so that parties are able to predict in advance the consequences of litigation conduct.

2. The waiver rules must be uniform at both the federal and the state level. If, for example, conduct does not constitute a waiver in federal practice but does so in a state court, parties would have no assurance that information protected by privilege or work product will remain protected.

3. Subject matter waiver should be limited to situations where fairness requires such an extreme result.

4. Parties should be able to, and encouraged to, cooperate with government investigations by turning over protected material without risking a finding that the cooperation constitutes a waiver in private litigation.

5. When disclosure is by mistake, a waiver should be found only if the disclosing party was negligent in production and in failing to seek return of the protected material.

6. In addition to the protection provided by a default rule, litigants should be able further to reduce the costs of pre-privilege review by additional terms contained in court-entered confidentiality orders; for such orders to be protective, they must preclude a finding of waiver in any court.

This memorandum is in five parts. Part One is Ken Broun's memo on the case law concerning waiver (with a few Reporter's comments interspersed). Part Two is Ken's memo concerning the authority necessary for implementing a waiver rule that will bind state courts. Part Three is Ken Broun's memo on the justification for a fairness–based subject matter waiver test for work product. Part Four provides a discussion of comments received on the Rule so far. Part Five discusses and explains two important drafting choices made in preparing the draft rule for the Committee's consideration.

I. Ken Broun's Memo on Case Law on Waiver of Privilege

Waiver of privilege problems frequently arise in large document litigation. The issues usually involve the attorney-client privilege, but may involve other privileges as well. There are at least three distinct, but sometimes overlapping, problems:

1. The effect on a privilege of an inadvertent production of a privileged document ["inadvertent waiver"].

2. The scope of the waiver of a document produced either intentionally or inadvertently ["scope of waiver"].

3. The effect on future privilege claims of the production of documents in the course of a government investigation, either with or without a confidentiality agreement entered into with the government agency ["selective" or "limited" waiver referred to in this memorandum as "selective waiver"].

Concern that privilege may be waived even by an unintended disclosure of a document will cause counsel and his or her staff to spend countless hours reviewing documents in large volume cases to insure against inadvertent disclosure. The rule applied by many courts that waiver of privilege by disclosure of a single document is a waiver of privilege with regard to all communications dealing with the same subject matter will cause counsel to guard against disclosure of privileged documents even though counsel may not really care if a particular document is disclosed to opposing counsel. These rulings raise the cost of pre-production privilege review to astronomic proportions — in the thousands of dollars for a basic action, in the millions for a major action with electronic discovery.

The likelihood that disclosure of documents to a government agency may result in waiver of privilege as against other parties may limit a party's willingness to cooperate fully with a government investigation.

With regard to the inadvertent waiver and scope of waiver issues, the cases differ widely on such matters as the effect of an inadvertent disclosure and the scope of the subject matter if a waiver or forfeiture is found. Stipulations or case-management orders saving the privilege, at least against inadvertent disclosure, have become common. Nevertheless, as will be discussed, such orders are of somewhat limited usefulness.

With regard to selective waivers, most federal circuits hold, at least without a confidentiality agreement, that a party may not selectively waive a privilege. In other words, disclosure to a government agency literally destroys the privilege. One circuit, the Eighth, holds to the contrary. The other circuits are split on whether the existence of a confidentiality agreement with the government agency preserves the privilege against the rest of the world.

This memorandum seeks to flesh out the dimensions of these interrelated problems, to discuss the case law dealing with the issues, and to propose some statutory models intended to ease the burden on the courts and counsel.

Inadvertent waiver and scope of waiver: the problem

The best formal statement of these two related problems is contained in Richard L. Marcus, The Perils of Privilege: Waiver and the Litigator, 84 Mich. L. Rev. 1605, 1606-07 (1986).

Marcus sets forth the concerns as follows:

> . . . [E]normous energy can be expended to guarantee that privileged materials are not inadvertently revealed in discovery, and lawyers may adopt elaborate witness preparation strategies in order to prevent witnesses from seeing privileged materials. Judges also feel the burden; where waiver is at stake, parties will litigate privilege issues that otherwise would not require judicial attention. Finally, for those not lucky or wealthy enough to adopt strategies that avoid waiver, broad waiver rules erode the reliability of the privilege. In recognition of these costs, courts are increasingly willing to enter orders preserving privilege despite disclosure in order to facilitate the pretrial preparation process. Although commendable, these orders appear totally unenforceable under classical waiver doctrine.

See also, Melanie B. Leslie, The Costs of Confidentiality and the Purpose of Privilege, 2000 Wis. L. Rev. 31, 73; Paul R. Rice, Attorney-Client Privilege: The Eroding Concept of Confidentiality Should Be Abolished, 47 Duke L. J. 853 (1998).

Although the Marcus piece is now almost twenty years old, its description of the problem is still largely current. Perhaps the only things that have changed are the even more frequent use of protective orders to deal with inadvertent disclosures in discovery and the added complexities caused by the increasing existence of electronically stored information.

The Report of the Civil Rules Advisory Committee (May 17, 2004, Revised, August 3, 2004) dealing with proposed amendments concerning electronic discovery specifically notes the problem as well as the attempts of parties to deal with the issue by protocols minimizing the risk of waiver.[1] The Committee notes (p. 8):

[1]The Civil Rules Advisory Committee elected to use the term "waiver" in connection with even inadvertent or unintended disclosures of privileged material. Technically, such disclosures may result in a "forfeiture" rather than a "waiver," which by definition would be intentional. Nevertheless, the courts have consistently used the term "waiver" in connection with unintentional disclosures, and this memorandum and the draft Rule 502 continue that use of terminology.

DOJ_NMG_0141787

Such protocols may include so-called quick peek or claw back arrangements, which allow production without a complete prior privilege review and an agreement that production of privileged documents will not waive the privilege.

The Civil Rules Committee Report cites the Manual for Complex Litigation (4th) § 11.446, setting forth the same issue:

> A responding party's screening of vast quantities of unorganized computer data for privilege prior to production can be particularly onerous in those jurisdictions in which inadvertent production of privileged data may constitute a waiver of privilege as to a particular item of information, items related to the relevant issue, or the entire data collection. Fear of the consequences of inadvertent waiver may add cost and delay to the discovery process for all parties. Thus, judges often encourage counsel to stipulate at the outset of discovery to a "nonwaiver" agreement, which they can adopt as a case-management order. Such agreements protect responding parties from the most dire consequences of inadvertent waiver by allowing them to "take back" inadvertently produced privileged materials if discovered within a reasonable period, perhaps thirty days from production.[2]

The Civil Rules Committee's concern for the problem is reflected in its proposed amendments to Rules 16(b)(6) and 26(f)(4) and Form 35 providing that if the parties can agree to an arrangement that allows production without a complete privilege review and protects against waiver, the court may enter a case-management order adopting that agreement.

However, although a protective or case-management order may be quite useful as among the parties to a particular litigation, it is likely to have no effect with regard to persons or entities outside the litigation. As Marcus indicates in the statement quoted above, protective orders "appear totally unenforceable under classical waiver doctrine."

Moreover, even if the courts were to hold that a stipulation or protective order is effective to guard against waiver with regard to parties outside the litigation, problems still exist. For example, such orders may deal only with inadvertent disclosures. Questions may and do arise under

[2]An example of a case-management order dealing with disclosure of privileged documents is contained in Hoechst Celanese Corp. v. Nat'l Union Fire Ins. Co. of Pittsburgh, 1995 WL 411805 at * 4 (Del. Super.Ct. Mar. 17, 1995), where the court quotes the order as stating:

> The production of a privileged document shall not constitute, or be deemed to constitute, a waiver of any privilege with respect to any document not produced. The production of a document subject to a claim of privilege or other objection and the failure to make a claim of privilege or other objection with respect thereto shall not constitute a waiver of a privilege or objection. . . .

such orders as to what is an inadvertent disclosure. See Baxters Travenol Labs., Inc. v. Abbott Labs., 117 F.R.D. 119 (N.D. Ill. 1987) (disclosure not inadvertent under the circumstances).

Thus, an order requiring the return of an inadvertently disclosed document may help in the instant litigation, but it still requires careful counsel to claim privilege even where she doesn't care about disclosure, and it still requires counsel to conduct an extensive pre-production review for privilege.

Because both concepts are important to a discussion of possible legislative remedies for the above described problem, the next two sections of this memorandum attempt briefly to describe the case law on 1) the effect of inadvertent waiver and 2) the scope of waiver based upon disclosure of documents during the litigation process.

Inadvertent waiver

The courts have taken three different approaches to inadvertent disclosure: 1) inadvertent disclosure does not waive the privilege even with regard to the disclosed document; 2) inadvertent disclosure waives the privilege regardless of the care taken to prevent disclosure; 3) inadvertent disclosure may waive the privilege depending upon the circumstances, especially the degree of care taken to prevent disclosure of privileged matter and the existence of prompt efforts to retrieve the document.

Perhaps the fewest number of cases take the first approach finding no waiver from inadvertent disclosure. The leading case is Mendenhall v. Barber-Greene Co., 531 F. Supp. 951, 955 (1982). The court stated:

> Mendenhall's lawyer (not trial counsel) might well have been negligent in failing to cull the files of the letters before turning over the files. But if we are serious about the attorney-client privilege and its relation to the client's welfare, we should require more than such negligence by counsel before the client can be deemed to have given up the privilege. [citing Dunn Chemical Co. v. Sybron Corp., 1975-2 Trade Cas. ¶ 60,561 at 67,463 (S.D.N.Y. 1975)] No waiver will be found here.

See also Conn. Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Shields, 18 F.R.D. 448 (S.D.N.Y. 1955) (no evidence of intent to waive privilege).

The opposite approach has been taken by a significant number of courts. Among the more frequently cited cases holding that an inadvertent disclosure waives the privilege regardless of the circumstances is International Digital Systems Corp. v. Digital Equipment Corp., 120 F.R.D. 445, 449-50 (D. Mass. 1988). The court in International Digital Systems analyzed the three different approaches to inadvertent disclosure. The court is particularly critical of the approach that analyzes the precautions taken, noting that if precautions were adequate "the disclosure would not have occurred." It added:

> When confidentiality is lost through "inadvertent" disclosure, the Court should not look at the intention of the disclosing party. . . . It follows that the Court should not examine the adequacy of the precautions taken to avoid "inadvertent" disclosure either.

The court adds that a strict rule "would probably do more than anything else to instill in attorneys the need for effective precautions against such disclosure." 120 F.R.D. at 450.

The court in International Digital Systems relied upon Underwater Storage, Inc. v. United States Rubber Co., 314 F. Supp. 546, 549 (D.D.C. 1970). In that case, the court stated:

> The Court will not look behind this objective fact [of disclosure] to determine whether the plaintiff really intended to have the letter examined. Nor will the Court hold that the inadvertence of counsel is not chargeable to his client. Once the document was produced for inspection, it entered the public domain. Its confidentiality was breached thereby destroying the basis for the continued existence of the privilege.

In accord are Harmony Gold U.S.A., Inc. v. FASA Corp., 169 F.R.D. 113, 117 (N.D.Ill. 1996) ("With the loss of confidentiality to the disclosed documents, there is little this court could offer the disclosing party to salvage its compromised position."); Ares-Serono v. Organon Int'l. B.V., 160 F.R.D. 1 (D. Mass. 1994) (trade secrets privilege); Wichita Land & Cattle Co. v. Am. Fed. Bank, F.S.B. 148 F.R.D. 456 (D.D.C. 1992) (attorney-client and work product privileges).

The third or balanced approach is also taken by a significant number of courts. Many decisions cite the factors for determining whether waiver exists as a result of inadvertent disclosure set forth in Hartford Fire Insurance Co. v. Garvey, 109 F.R.D. 323, 332 (N.D. Cal. 1985). In Hartford Fire, the Court relied upon the analysis in an earlier case, Lois Sportswear, U.S.A., Inc. v. Levi Strauss & Co., 104 F.R.D. 103 (S.D.N.Y. 1985), which had found the following elements significant in deciding the existence of a waiver, calling it the "majority rule":

> (1) the reasonableness of the precautions to prevent inadvertent disclosure; (2) the time taken to rectify the error, (3) the scope of discovery; (4) the extent of the disclosure; and (5) the "overriding issue of fairness."

The court in Hartford Fire found there had been waiver under the circumstances.

Other cases among the many taking a similar balancing approach to inadvertent disclosure include Alldread v. City of Grenada, 988 F.2d 1425 (5th Cir. 1993) (governmental privilege); Zapata v. IBP, Inc., 175 F.R.D. 574, 576-77 (D. Kan. 1997) (work product privilege); Hydraflow, Inc. v. Enidine, Inc., 145 F.R.D. 626, 637 (W.D.N.Y. 1993) (attorney-client privilege); Edwards v. Whitaker, 868 F.Supp. 226, 229 (M.D. Tenn. 1994) (attorney-client privilege).

For more detailed descriptions of the various approaches see John T. Hundley, Annotation, Waiver of Evidentiary Privilege by Inadvertent Disclosure – Federal Law, 159 A.L.R. Fed. 153 (2005); Note, Jennifer A. Hardgrove, Scope of Waiver of Attorney-Client Privilege: Articulating a Standard That Will Afford Guidance to Courts, 1998 U.Ill. L. Rev. 643, 659.

The scope of waiver based upon disclosure of documents during the litigation process

A decision that an inadvertent disclosure results in waiver with respect to the disclosed document does not necessarily mean that the privilege is waived with regard to all communications dealing with the same subject matter. As in the case of the effect of an inadvertent disclosure with regard to a disclosed document, there are various approaches to the issue of subject matter waiver.

Some courts hold that even where an inadvertent disclosure results in a waiver with regard to the disclosed documents themselves, there is no waiver with regard to other communications – even those dealing with precisely the same subject matter.

For example, in Golden Valley Microwave Foods, Inc. v. Weaver Popcorn Co., Inc. 132 F.R.D. 204 (N.D. Ind. 1990), the court found that there had been a waiver of the attorney client privilege based upon an inadvertent disclosure. Waiver was found under either the strict or balancing approach. However, the court limited the waiver to the actual document produced, stating (132 F.R.D. at 208):

> Laying aside for the moment the question of whether the attorney-client privilege has been waived as to the letter, the court could find no cases where unintentional or inadvertent disclosure of a privileged document resulted in the wholesale waiver of the attorney-client privilege as to undisclosed documents concerning the same subject matter. [citing Marcus, supra, at 1636].

International Digital Systems Corp. v. Digital Equipment Corp., 120 F.R.D. 445, 449-50 (D. Mass. 1988), discussed above, is a leading case for the strict approach to inadvertent disclosure. Yet, the court in that case refused to find subject matter waiver.

In Parkway Gallery Furniture, Inc. v. Kittinger/Pennsylvania House Group, Inc., 116 F.R.D. 46, 52 (M.D.N.C. 1987), the court used the balancing test to find waiver with regard to an inadvertent disclosure. However, the court noted:

> The general rule that a disclosure waives not only the specific communications but also the subject matter of it in other communications is not appropriate in the case of inadvertent disclosure, unless it is obvious a party is attempting to gain an advantage or make offensive or unfair use of the disclosure. In a proper case of inadvertent disclosure, the waiver should cover only the specific document in issue.

Despite the strong language in cases such as Golden Valley, other courts have in fact found subject matter waiver even where the disclosure was inadvertent. E.g., In re Sealed Case, 877 F.2d 976 (D.C. Cir. 1989); In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 727 F.2d 1352 (4th Cir. 1984); Nye v. Sage Prods., Inc., 98 F.R.D. 452 (N.D. Ill. 1982) (court notes that plaintiffs had secured no agreement from defendants that inadvertent disclosure would not waive privilege with respect to other documents); Duplan Corp. v. Deering Milliken, Inc., 397 F. Supp. 1146 (D.S.C. 1974) (statement of intent not to waive privilege ineffective); Malco Mfg. Co. v. Elco Corp., 307 F. Supp. 1177 (E.D. Pa. 1969) (attempt to reserve privilege ineffective).

Other courts have applied a subject matter waiver but have limited that waiver in some way based upon the circumstances – often indicating a concern for fairness to both of the parties. For example in Hercules, Inc. v. Exxon Corp., 434 F. Supp. 136, 156 (D. Del. 1977), the court applied subject matter waiver but noted:

> The privilege or immunity has been found to be waived only if facts relevant to a particular, narrow subject matter have been disclosed in circumstances in which it would be unfair to deny to the other party an opportunity to discover other relevant facts with respect to that subject matter.

See also In re Grand Jury Proceedings Oct. 12, 1995, 78 F.3d 251 (6th Cir. 1996) (intentional, non-litigation disclosure; waiver of subject matter, but subject matter limited under the circumstances); Weil v. Inv./Indicators, Research and Mgmt., Inc., 647 F.2d 18 (9th Cir. 1981) (subject matter waiver; however, because disclosure made early in proceedings and to opposing counsel rather than the court, the subject matter of the waiver is limited to the matter actually disclosed and not related matters); In re Sealed Case, 877 F.2d 976 (D.C. Cir. 1989) (determination of subject matter of waiver depends on the factual context); Goldman, Sachs & Co. v. Blondis, 412 F. Supp. 286 (D.C. Ill. 1976) (disclosure at deposition; waiver limited to specific matter disclosed at deposition rather than broader subject matter); Perrignon v. Bergen Brunswig Corp., 77 F.R.D. 455 (D.C. Cal. 1978) (same).

The Marcus article surveys the cases up to that point in time in great depth. The author uses the case of Transamerica Computer Co. v. IBM, 573 F.2d 646 (9th Cir. 1978) as an example of a court that appropriately considered the circumstances of the case in determining the existence of waiver. In Transamerica Computer, the court considered whether the inadvertent disclosure of documents in an earlier case waived the privilege in this case. The court determined that it did not, based upon the extreme logistical difficulties of protecting documents in the earlier case.

Marcus argues that waiver should be analyzed in terms of fairness, stating, "the focus should be on the unfairness that results from the privilege-holder's affirmative act misusing the privilege in some way." (84 Mich. L. Rev. at 1627). Elsewhere in the article, the author states (84 Mich. L. Rev. at 1607-08):

This article therefore concludes that the focus should be on unfairness flowing from the act on which the waiver is premised. Thus focused, the principal concern is selective use of privileged material to garble the truth, which mandates giving the opponent access to related privileged material to set the record straight. . . .

Contrary to accepted dogma that all disclosures work a waiver, the article suggests that there is no reason for treating disclosure to opponents or others as a waiver unless there is legitimate concern about truth garbling or the material has become so notorious that decision without that material risks making a mockery of justice.

Marcus expands on his "truth garbling" point later in the article where he raises the possibility that the use of disclosed information, while still protecting other information through the exercise of the privilege, might result in a distortion of the facts. He refers to cases involving the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, including Rogers v. United States, 340 U.S. 367, 371 (1951). Marcus notes (84 Mich. L. Rev. at 1627-28):

Similarly with the attorney-client privilege, the courts have condemned "selective disclosure," in which the privilege-holder picks and chooses parts of privileged items, disclosing the favorable but withholding the unfavorable. It is the truth-garbling risk that results from such affirmative but selective use of privileged material, rather than the mere fact of disclosure, that justifies treating such revelations as waivers.

Even where there is no use of the disclosed communications by the privilege holder, it is also possible that the matter disclosed has become so much a part of the common knowledge that protection of the other communications dealing with the same subject matter makes no sense. Marcus states (84 Mich. L. Rev. at 1641- 42):

At some point widespread circulation of privileged information threatens to make a mockery of justice if, due to his inability to obtain the information or offer it in evidence, the opponent is subjected to a judicial result that many others (who do have the information) know to be wrong. Very strong fairness arguments then counsel disclosure, and the interest in preserving the privilege diminishes to the vanishing point. This, indeed, seems to be a central concern of courts that condemn "selective disclosure" to some but not others.

Selective Waiver

Only the Eighth Circuit has held that a selective waiver of the attorney-client privilege applies whenever a client discloses confidential information to a federal agency. Other courts have suggested that a selective waiver may apply if the client has clearly communicated his or her intent to retain the privilege, such as by entering into a confidentiality agreement with the federal agency. The First, Third, Fourth, Sixth, and D.C. Circuits have expressly held that when a client discloses confidential information to a federal agency, the attorney client privilege is lost. Cases from the Third and Sixth Circuits have held that disclosure destroys the privilege, even in the presence of a confidentiality agreement.

Cases permitting selective waiver

The court in Diversified Industries, Inc. v. Meredith, 572 F.2d 596 (8th Cir. 1977) adopted a selective waiver approach. Diversified Industries had conducted an internal investigation over a possible "slush fund" that may have been used to bribe purchasing agents of other corporations to buy its product. The Securities and Exchange Commission instituted an official investigation of Diversified and subpoenaed all documents relating to Diversified's internal investigation. Without entering into a confidentiality agreement, Diversified voluntarily complied with the SEC's request. Subsequently, Diversified was sued by one of the corporations affected by the alleged bribery scandal. The plaintiff in that suit sought discovery of the materials disclosed to the SEC, arguing that the attorney-client privilege was waived when privileged material was voluntarily disclosed to the SEC. The Eighth Circuit rejected this argument, holding that because the documents were disclosed in a "separate and nonpublic SEC investigation . . . only a limited waiver of the privilege occurred." 572 F.2d at 611. The court explained, "To hold otherwise may have the effect of thwarting the developing procedure of corporations to employ independent outside counsel to investigate and advise them. . . ." Id.

Some district courts outside the Eighth Circuit have adopted the Diversified approach to waiver, holding that the attorney-client privilege may be selectively waived to federal agencies even in the absence of an agreement by the agency to keep the information confidential. For example, in In re Grand Jury Subpoena Dated July 13, 1979, 478 F. Supp. 368, 373 (D. Wis 1979), the court held that cooperation with federal agencies should be encouraged, and therefore refused to treat disclosure of privileged information to the SEC as a waiver of the corporation's attorney-client privilege. See also In re LTV Sec. Litig., 89 F.R.D. 595, 605 (N.D. Tex. 1981), where the court held that disclosure of privileged information to a federal agency does not always constitute an implied waiver of the attorney-client privilege. The court explained that, because the client did not intend to waive the privilege and assertion of the privilege was not unfair, the client's "disclosure of . . . materials to the SEC does not justify [a third party's] discovery of the identity of those documents. . . ."

General rejection of selective waiver

In United States v. Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 129 F.3d 681 (1st Cir. 1997), the court held that the attorney-client privilege was lost when MIT disclosed privileged materials to the Department of Defense. The documents had been disclosed voluntarily to the DOD pursuant to a regular audit. The same documents were sought as part of an IRS investigation. In rejecting the Diversified approach, the court explained that selective waiver was unnecessary because "agencies usually have means to secure the information they need and, if not, can seek legislation from Congress." 129 F.3d at 685. The court added that applying the general principle of waiver of privilege to any third party disclosure "makes the law more predictable and certainly eases its administration. Following the Eighth Circuit's approach would require, at the very least, a new set of difficult line-drawing exercises that would consume time and increase uncertainty." Id.

Reporter's Comment: The MIT rationale ignores the fact that while regulators might have the "means to secure the information they need," those "means" may 1) require substantial effort and cost, and 2) may never lead to the recovery of privileged information. Judge Boggs has critiqued the MIT rationale as follows:

> The court, as well as other courts addressing this question, argues that the government has "other means" to secure the information that they need, while conceding that those other means may consume more government time and money. Massachusetts Inst. of Tech., 129 F.3d at 685. Presumably, the court is referring to search warrants or civil discovery. It should be emphasized, however, that the government has no other means to secure otherwise privileged information. That the documents or other evidence sought is privileged permits the target of an investigation to refuse production through civil discovery, to quash any subpoena duces tecum, or to prevent the admission of the privileged information even by the government. The only way that the government can obtain privileged information is for the holder of the privilege voluntarily to disclose it. The court's argument about the adequacy of other means, suggesting that the only difference between them and voluntary disclosure is cost, requires the premise that all privileged information has a non-privileged analogue that is discoverable with enough effort. That premise, however, does not hold.

In re Columbia/HCA Healthcare Corp. Billing Practices Litigation, 293 F.3d 289, 311 (6th Cir. 2002) (Boggs, J., dissenting). Thus, a waiver rule that promotes voluntary disclosure — without resort to these other means, which are unlikely to be successful anyway — promotes efficiency and saves expense on the part of the government.

In Permian Corp. v. United States, 665 F.2d 1214 (D.C. Cir. 1981), Permian sought attorney-client protection for documents sought by the Department of Energy. The documents had previously been disclosed to the SEC. The court rejected the approach of the Diversified case and held that the privilege had been waived by the SEC disclosure. The court stated that "[v]oluntary cooperation with government investigations may be a laudable activity, but it is hard to understand how such conduct improves the attorney-client relationship." 665 F.2d at 1221. The court added that the "client cannot be permitted to pick and choose among his opponents, waiving the privilege for some and resurrecting the claim of confidentiality to obstruct others, or to invoke the privilege as to communications whose confidentiality he has already compromised for his own benefit. . . . The attorney-client privilege is not designed for such tactical employment." Id.

Rejection of selective waiver even with a confidentiality agreement

Two prominent cases, from the Third and Sixth circuits, have rejected selective waiver, even when privileged material is disclosed to a federal agency pursuant to a confidentiality agreement.

In Westinghouse Electric Corp. v. Republic of the Philippines, 951 F.2d 1414 (3d Cir. 1991), Westinghouse had voluntarily turned over privileged material to the SEC and to the Department of Justice in connection with investigations concerning the bribing of foreign officials. Westinghouse said that its disclosures to the SEC were made in reliance upon SEC regulations providing that "information or documents obtained in the course of an investigation would be deemed and kept confidential by SEC employees and officers unless disclosure was specifically authorized." 951 F.2d at 1418, n. 4 citing 17 C.F.R. § 240.0-4 (1978). The disclosures to the DOJ were subject to an agreement expressly providing that review of corporate documents would not constitute a waiver of Westinghouse's work product and attorney-client privileges. The Republic of the Philippines brought suit against Westinghouse alleging the bribing of former President Marcos to obtain a power plant contract. The Republic sought discovery of the documents Westinghouse had previously disclosed to the federal agencies. The court held that Westinghouse had waived the attorney-client privilege by its voluntary disclosure of privileged material to the SEC and DOJ. The court noted (951 F.2d at 1425):

> [S]elective waiver does not serve the purpose of encouraging full disclosure to one's attorney in order to obtain informed legal assistance; it merely encourages voluntary disclosure to government agencies, thereby extending the privilege beyond its intended purpose. . . . Moreover, selective waiver does nothing to promote the attorney-client relationship; indeed, the unique role of the attorney, which led to the creation of the privilege, has little relevance to the selective waiver permitted in Diversified. . . .
> The traditional waiver doctrine provides that disclosure to third parties waives the attorney-client privilege unless the disclosure serves the purpose of enabling clients to obtain informed legal advice. Because the selective waiver rule in Diversified protects disclosures made for entirely different purposes, it cannot be reconciled with traditional attorney-client privilege doctrine. Therefore, we are not persuaded to engraft the Diversified exception onto the attorney-client privilege. Westinghouse argues that the selective waiver rule encourage corporations to conduct internal investigations and to cooperate with federal investigativ agencies. We agree with the D.C. Circuit that these objectives, however laudable, are beyon the intended purposes of the attorney-client privilege, see Permian, 665 F.2d at 1221, an therefore we find Westinghouse's policy arguments irrelevant to our task of applying th attorney-client privilege to this case. In our view, to go beyond the policies underlying th attorney-client privilege on the rationale offered by Westinghouse would be to create a entirely new privilege.

The court also noted that in 1984, Congress had rejected an amendment to the Securities an Exchange Act of 1934, proposed by the SEC, that would have established a selective waiver rul regarding documents disclosed to the agency. 951 F.2d at 1425, citing SEC Statement in Suppo of Proposed § 24(d) of the Securities and Exchange Act of 1934, in 16 Sec.Reg. & L.Rep. at 46 (March 2, 1984). A regulation to the same effect was proposed, but not adopted, in connection wit the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. See proposed 17 C.F.R. § 205.3 (e)(3), http://www.sec.gov/rules/final/33 8185.htm (Viewed Oct. 5, 2005). The Commission indicated that the regulation, although include in the final draft of the regulations implementing Sarbanes-Oxley, was not adopted because of th Commission's concern about its authority to enact such a provision. In its final report, th Commission reiterated its position that there were strong policy reasons behind such a provision an that, because of those policy reasons, it still intended to enter into confidentiality agreements. Id.

Relevant to the question of scope of waiver, the court in Westinghouse also held that th privilege is waived only as to those communications actually disclosed, "unless a partial waive would be unfair to the party's adversary." Id. at 1426 n.12. If partial waiver disadvantages th adversary by allowing the disclosing party to present a one-sided story to the court, the privileg would be waived as to all communications on the same subject.

The court in Westinghouse distinguished between the attorney-client and work produc privileges and stated that a disclosure to another party might not necessarily operate as a waiver o the work product privilege. Disclosures in aid of an attorney's preparation for litigation would stil be protected. However, the court found that disclosure to the federal agencies in this instance di operate as a waiver, because the disclosures were not made to further the goal underlying the work product doctrine – the protection of the adversary process. Id. at 1429.

The court in In re Columbia/HCA Healthcare Corp. Billing Practices Litigation, 293 F.3d 289 (6th Cir. 2002) also rejected a selective waiver doctrine for both the attorney-client and work product privileges, even in the face of an express confidentiality agreement. In that case, the Department of Justice had conducted an investigation of possible Medicare and Medicaid fraud. Columbia/HCA had disclosed documents to the DOJ under an agreement with "stringent" confidentiality provisions. Id. Numerous lawsuits were then instigated against Columbia/HCA by insurance companies and private individuals. These plaintiffs sought discovery of the materials disclosed to the DOJ. Columbia/HCA raised attorney-client and work product privilege objections. The court expressly rejected the application of selective waiver for either privilege under these circumstances. In rejecting the argument that the confidentiality agreement precluded waiver, the court noted that the attorney-client privilege was "not a creature of contract, arranged between parties to suit the whim of the moment." Id. at 303. The court further reasoned that allowing federal agencies to enter into confidentiality agreements would be to allow those agencies to "assist in the obfuscating the truth-finding process." Id.

Reporter's Comment: The court in Westinghouse recognizes that enforcement of selective waiver is good policy because it encourages cooperation with government investigations. But it dismisses this policy argument as "beyond the intended purposes of the attorney-client privilege." Yet at the point of disclosure to a government regulator, the relevant question is not the purpose of the attorney-client privilege, but rather whether the purposes behind the law of waiver of the privilege are effectuated. Judge Boggs, dissenting in Columbia, critiques the Westinghouse argument as follows:

> It is not clear why an exception to the third-party waiver rule need be moored to the justifications of the attorney-client privilege. More precisely, we ought to seek guidance from the justifications for the waiver rule to which the exception is made. Those justifications are not exactly coincident with the justifications for the privilege itself. * * * The preference against selective use of privileged material is nothing more than a policy preference, and really also has very little to do with fostering frank communication between attorney and client. The question for this court is one of policy: Whether the benefits obtained by the absolute prohibition on strategic disclosure outweigh the benefits of the information of which the government has been deprived by the rule? As the harms of selective disclosure are not altogether clear, the benefits of the increased information to the government should prevail.

Recognition of selective waiver where a confidentiality agreement exists

A few courts have at least indicated that they would recognize selective waiver where there was an express reservation of confidentiality before disclosure.

The leading decision taking this position is Teachers Insurance & Annuity Association of America v. Shamrock Broadcasting Co., 521 F. Supp. 638 (S.D.N.Y. 1981). The court held in that case that a waiver of the attorney-client privilege occurs upon disclosure of privileged information to a federal agency "only if the documents were produced without reservation; no waiver [occurs] if the documents were produced to the SEC under a protective order, stipulation or other express reservation of the producing party's claim of privilege as to the material disclosed." Id. at 646. The court noted:

> [A] contemporaneous reservation or stipulation would make it clear that . . . the disclosing party has made some effort to preserve the privacy of the privileged communication, rather than having engaged in abuse of the privilege by first making a knowing decision to waive the rule's protection and then seeking to retract that decision in connection with subsequent litigation.

In In re Steinhardt Partners, L.P., 9 F.3d 230 (2d Cir. 1993), the court rejected the Diversified selective waiver approach with regard to prior disclosures of documents to the SEC that would otherwise have been protected as work product. However, after so holding, the court stated (Id. at 236):

> In denying the petition, we decline to adopt a per se rule that all voluntary disclosures to the government waive work product protection. Crafting rules relating to privilege in matters of governmental investigations must be done on a case-by-case basis. . . . Establishing a rigid rule would fail to anticipate situations . . . in which the SEC and the disclosing party have entered into an explicit agreement that the SEC will maintain the confidentiality of the disclosed materials.

II. Ken Broun's Memo on the Impact of the Draft Rule 502 on Waiver of Privilege in a State Action

If a statute or rule governing inadvertent waiver, scope of waiver and selective waiver of an evidentiary privilege is to be effective in eliminating the need for unnecessarily burdensome document review and rulings on privilege in mass document cases, the provision would have to be binding in all courts, state and federal. The proposed rule, as submitted to the Committee, is drafted with the intent to accomplish that end as broadly as possible, at least with regard to the attorney-client privilege and work product protection.

My conclusion is that, in order to be binding in both federal and state courts, the Rule would have to be enacted by Congress using both its powers to legislate in aid of the federal courts under Article III of the Constitution and its commerce clause powers under Article I. Although a Rule might be enacted, binding on the states, setting forth waiver rules for all evidentiary privileges where a disclosure is made in the course of federal litigation, a Rule governing disclosure in other circumstances would have to be limited to areas that affect interstate commerce – probably limiting the permissible scope to attorney-client privilege and work product protection. A separate rule might be considered that dealt with disclosures of matters covered by other privileges (e.g., marital communications or psychotherapist-patient communications) in the course of litigation. However, virtually all of the waiver problems that the Committee is trying to address concern the attorney-client privilege or work-product protection.

1. Possible limitations on federal court rulings dealing with waiver of privilege

A. Power to bind the states in the absence of a Rule

In the absence of a Congressionally-adopted rule, there may well be limitations on the power of a federal court to bind the state courts with regard to waiver or non-waiver of an evidentiary privilege.

There is no question that a federal court has the power to limit the use of information obtained in discovery. Protective orders, especially those involving trade secrets, abound and have universally been upheld. See E.I. DuPont De Nemours Powder Co. v. Masland, 244 U.S. 100, 103 (1917); Chem. & Indus. Corp. v. Druffel, 301 F.2d 126, 130 (6th Cir. 1962); 8 Charles Alan Wright, Arthur R. Miller & Richard L. Marcus, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2043.

However, limiting the use of documents or even information obtained in discovery is different from ruling that disclosures or other actions taken in federal court do or do not constitute a waiver of state evidentiary privileges. The most significant case dealing with this issue is Bittaker v. Woodford, 331 F.3d 715 (9th Cir. 2003). Bittaker was an en banc decision of the Ninth Circuit involving the scope of a habeas petitioner's waiver of the attorney-client privilege. The district court had held that the petitioner had waived the attorney-client privilege by filing a claim based on ineffective assistance of counsel. The court, however, entered a protective order precluding use of the privileged materials for any purpose other than litigating the federal habeas petition – including barring the state from use of the information in a re-prosecution. The state appealed claiming that the court had no authority to prevent a state court from dealing with the issue of waiver of privilege under state privilege rules. A majority of the en banc court, in an opinion written by Judge Kozinski, held that the district court's order effectively determined that there would be no waiver of the privilege in a subsequent state trial. The court held that the district court had the power to determine the limits of the waiver and to make that determination binding on the state courts. The opinion noted that a waiver limiting the use of privileged communications to adjudicating the ineffective assistance of counsel claim fully serves federal interest as well as preserving "the state's vital interests in safeguarding the attorney-client privilege in criminal cases." 331 F.3d at 722. The court further noted that the courts of California "remain free, of course to determine whether Bittaker waived his attorney-client privilege on some basis other than his disclosure of privileged information during the course of the federal litigation." 331 F.3d at 726. [emphasis by the court]

On one level, Judge Kozinski's opinion is compelling from a policy standpoint. Limiting the use of information covered by the attorney-client privilege to dealing with the ineffective assistance appropriately limits the waiver to what is necessary to resolve the petitioner's claim. Arguably, the petitioner would pay too high a price for his attack on the prosecution if the information were to be permitted to be used by the state in a re-prosecution. Yet, the two concurring judges also make a valid point, one relevant to the power of the federal courts in dealing with waiver of privilege in a statute or rule such as we have under consideration. Judges O'Scannlain and Rawlinson concurred in Bittaker on the basis that the judge's order should not be interpreted as dealing with the scope of the privilege under state law. Rather, the order should be interpreted as preventing the use of information obtained in the federal litigation but would not prevent the state from the use of the same information obtained from another source if the California law would so permit. The privilege law of California would govern in any re-prosecution of the defendant. The courts of that state should be free to determine whether or not the privilege had been waived. The federal courts have a right to limit the use of information obtained in connection with its litigation – as in trade secrets cases – but no power to determine the application of a state privilege in the state courts.

At least one lower court has refused to issue an order having the effect that the majority in Bittaker prescribed. In Fears v. Bagley, 2003 WL 23770605 (S.D. Ohio 2003), the court rejected the reasoning of the majority in Bittaker and ordered only that the state would be bound to keep the information obtained confidential but that the court would not decide the issue of waiver of privilege in a subsequent state court proceeding.

Even though not a controlling precedent, the Bittaker case is useful in framing the issues. Although, as the court notes, the case involves a waiver by implication rather than an intentional or inadvertent disclosure of a privilege document (see 331 F.3d at 719-20), the case squarely presents the issue of the power of a federal court, at least in the absence of a Congressionally-enacted rule to affect the future application of a state court privilege. As the divided opinion in Bittaker graphically illustrates, the result is far from clear.

B. The effectiveness of a Federal Rule of Evidence or Civil Procedure, adopted under Congress's Article III powers, to bind the states

That the question of whether an individual court has the power to issue an order affecting subsequent state court proceedings is in doubt does not necessarily mean that such a power might not be conferred by rule or statute. Arguably, an issue such as that raised in Bittaker could be based on the absence of a common law rule conferring authority on the court to make such orders binding on the state courts – an absence that might be corrected by the adoption of a rule or statute governing the issue.

28 U.S.C. § 2074(b), providing that any "rule creating, abolishing, or modifying an evidentiary privilege" must be approved by an act of Congress, was adopted by Congress and obviously could be modified or eliminated by Congress. Furthermore, Congress could itself adopt a Rule without going through the Rules Enabling Act, 28 U.S. C. § 2072(b). See, e.g., Fed. R. Evid. 413-415.

A rule that governed the effect on evidentiary privilege of disclosure of a document in the course of federal court litigation would almost certainly survive an attack on its constitutionality. Congress has broad powers to legislate in aid of the federal courts, whether through the Rules Enabling Act process or independently. Congress's power stems from Article III, §1 and Article I, § 8 cl. 9, giving it power to establish lower tribunals, as well as the necessary and proper clause of Article I, § 8, cl. 18. The broad power of Congress to describe and regulate modes of proceeding was established early in our Constitutional history. See Wayman v. Southard, 23 U.S. 1 (1825); Livingston v. Story, 34 U.S. 632, 656 (1835). See also the often quoted dissent by Justice Reed in Erie RR v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 92 (1938) ("no one doubts federal power over procedure").

Some have argued that the power of Congress to enact legislation dealing with procedural matters is broader than that delegated to the courts under the Rules Enabling Act. See, e.g., Leslie M. Kelleher, Taking "Substantive Rights" (in the Rules Enabling Act) More Seriously, 74 Notre Dame L. Rev. 47, 94, 103 (1998).[3] However, whatever the merit of the debate over the extent of

[3]Authors like Kelleher question whether Congress intended to delegate to the courts all of its power to establish procedure under Article III and the necessary and proper clause of Article I. Section 2072(b) prohibits rules that abridge, enlarge or modify any substantive right. The limitation was intended to reach not only federalism concerns but also to deal with the allocation of authority between Congress and the Courts. See Stephen B. Burbank, The Rules Enabling Act of 1934, 130 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1015, 1187 (1982). Certainly, Congress has established statutes dealing with clearly procedural matters, such as venue (28 U.S. C. § 1391) outside of the rules process. The argument is that there are certain policy matters, even though involving procedure, that

Congressional delegation, the issue is moot if the Rule is in fact enacted by Congress rather than promulgated through the Rules Enabling Act process.

It is unlikely that a rule limited to disclosures made in the course of federal litigation would be held invalid. Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 472 (1965) established that the Congress's power delegated under the Rules Enabling Act extends to matters that fall in the "uncertain area between substance and procedure, [but] are rationally capable of classification as either." The Court has never found a Rule invalid for impermissibly affecting a substantive right, see, e.g., Thomas D. Rowe, Jr., Not Bad for Government Work: Does Anyone Else Think the Supreme Court is Doing a Halfway Decent Job in its Erie-Hanna Jurisprudence, 73 Notre Dame L. Rev. 963 (1998); Paul D. Carrington & Derek P. Apanovitch, The Constitutional Limits of Judicial Rulemaking: The Illegitimacy of Mass-Tort Settlements Negotiated Under Federal Rule 23, 39 Ariz. L. Rev. 461 (1997).

One could argue about whether rules governing evidentiary privileges are essentially procedural or essentially substantive. However, even writers who objected to the enactment of the proposed Federal Rules of Evidence governing privilege assumed the power of Congress to enact such rules, arguing against their adoption on policy grounds. See, e.g., Louise Weinberg, Choice of Law and the Proposed Federal Rules of Evidence: New Perspectives, 122 U. Penn. L. Rev. 594 (1974). See also Earl C. Dudley, Jr., Federalism and Federal Rule of Evidence 501: Privilege and Vertical Choice of Law, 82 Geo. L. J. 1781 (1994) (arguing for an amendment of Fed.R.Evid.501 to provide for deference to state privileges in most cases).

The ability of the Rules to bind state court actions has been clearly established. For example, a federal court determination of the preclusive effect of a judgment controls state action with regard to that judgment. Semtek Intl. Inc. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 531 U.S. 497 (2001). See also Stewart Organization v. Ricoh, 487 U.S. 22 (1988) (federal law, not state law with regard to enforceability of forum selection clauses governed transfer under 23 U.S.C. § 1404); Burlington Northern RR v. Woods, 480 U.S. 1 (1987) (Fed.R.App.P 38, not state law, governed issue of damages after unsuccessful appeal).

The principle of the supremacy of federal law has been applied to state procedural rules where federal substantive law is preemptive. See, e.g., Felder v. Casey, 487 U.S. 131 (1988) (federal civil rights law prevented state from applying its notice of claim rule in a federal civil rights action filed in state court); Dice v. Akron, C. & Y.R. Co., 342 U.S. 359 (1952) (validity of a release under should be left to Congress at least in part because state interests are in fact represented in Congress. See Paul J. Mishkin, Some Further Last Words on Erie – The Thread, 87 Harv. L. Rev. 1682, 1685 (1974). For example, under § 2074(b), Congress left for itself issues involving evidentiary privileges. It determined that it should decide such issues; it did not determine that legislation about such issues was beyond its powers. See Kelleher, 74 Notre Dame L. Rev. at 111.

Federal Employers Liability Act determined by federal law); Brown v. Western Ry. of Ala., 338 U.S. 294 (1949) (federal pleading test should have been applied in FELA action filed in state court).

On the other hand, it would be difficult to argue that a Rule governing the effect of a disclosure outside of the litigation process – e.g., disclosure to an administrative agency or in private settlement negotiations before any litigation had begun – would be within the power of Congress under Article III.

Despite the wide berth to enact procedural rules established both in the cases and the legal literature, the language in Hanna would have to be considered on its face – the rule would have to be rationally capable of classification as either substance or procedure. Fairly recent cases, although not invalidating rules of procedure, have interpreted the rules somewhat narrowly so as to avoid application in a way that might conflict with state substantive policy. See, e.g., Kamen v. Kemper Financial Services Inc., 500 U.S. 90 (1991) (limitations on application of Fed.R.Civ. P. 23.1 dealing with the demand requirement in a shareholders derivative action); Gasperini v. Center for Humanities, Inc., 518 U. S. 415 (1996) (application of Fed.R. Civ.P. 59 and the test for granting a new trial); Amchem Products, Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591 (1997) (settlement class certification under Fed.R.Civ.P. 23 interpreted in light of constitutional limitations on the powers of Congress).

Any Rule seeking to have an effect beyond disclosure in the course of litigation would likely face a challenge that it was not rationally capable of classification as procedural. Arguments could be made in support of such legislation – e.g., that the most significant likely impact of the waiver rules would be in the federal courts – but the risk of a finding that the rule would not be binding on the states would be significant.

In order to prevent more constitutional comfort for a rule dealing with disclosures outside the litigation process, Congress's commerce powers would have to come into play.

C. The constitutionality of a Rule, binding on the states, governing waiver of evidentiary privilege if enacted by Congress under its Commerce Clause powers.

A strong argument could and has been made for a federalized attorney client privilege enacted by Congress under its Commerce Clause powers. (Art. I, §8, cl. 3). The Rule under consideration would federalize issues of inadvertent and selective waiver and scope of waiver with regard to the attorney-client privilege and attorney work-product protection. If the power exists for a federalized attorney-client privilege, presumably a rule that affected only an aspect of that privilege, and its close relative – work-product protection – would also pass constitutional scrutiny.

Timothy P. Glynn, in his article, Federalizing Privilege, 52 Amer. U. L. Rev. 59, 156-171 (2002), argues that Congress would have the power under the Commerce Clause to enact a federal law of attorney-client privilege that would apply to the states. He recognizes that the Supreme Court has served notice that Congress's powers under the commerce clause have outer boundaries. Thus, in United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549 (1995), the Court invalidated an act making the possession of a gun on or near school premises a crime as beyond the commerce clause powers. It took the same action with regard to an act providing a federal civil remedy for the victims of gender-motivated violence. United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000). Glynn points out the obvious differences between legislation such as that involved in Lopez and Morrison and a regulation that fosters and protects the economic and commercial activity between attorneys and clients. He adds that the "attorney-client privilege protects communications upon which the industry's article of commerce – provision of legal services depends." 52 Amer. U. L. Rev. 159.

Glynn also raises the possibility that Congressional action might be limited by Tenth Amendment considerations. There are recent cases that place limits on Congressional action because of a violation of principles of federalism. For example, in New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144 (1992) the Court struck down a portion of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act because it, in effect, required the states to implement legislation. Likewise, in Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898 (1997), the Court invalidated a provision in the Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act that would have required law enforcement officers to administer a federal program. On the other hand, in Reno v. Condon, 528 U.S. 141 (2000), the Court upheld a provision of the Driver's Privacy Protect Act that made no such demands on state legislators or local executive officials.

The Rule under consideration makes no demands on the states like the legislation in New York and Printz. The rule is self-executing. It simply needs to be enforced by the courts of the state. At least one author has questioned the power of Congress under the Tenth Amendment to enact procedural rules unconnected with substantive federal rights. See Anthony J. Bellia Jr, Federal Regulation of State Court Procedures, 110 Yale L. J. 947 (2001). However, the legislation that was the focus of the Bellia article, the Y2K Act, involved notice to defendants before commencing suit – not a matter as integrally connected to the regulation of legal commerce as is the rule in question. Arguably, the attorney-client related protections involve substantive protections. The "privilege regulates, indeed protects and promotes, primary conduct and commercial activity – attorney-client communications and the provision of legal services– and serves interests wholly extrinsic to the litigation in which it is asserted." See Glynn, 52 Amer. U. L. Rev. at 165.

Although one could argue that Glynn takes the concept of a federal attorney-client privilege too far, politically and as a matter of policy, by proposing a federal law totally supplanting state attorney-client privileges, more modest legislation dealing simply with the existence and scope of waiver seems likely to be upheld. It is also arguable that the Article I commerce clause rationale may combine with the powers under Article III applicable in many instances to give a strong basis for the legislation.

Nevertheless, the likely validity of such legislation dealing with attorney-client privilege or work product protection may not extend to a statute that attempted to apply the same rules to evidentiary privileges generally. Perhaps one could argue that in many contexts the psychotherapist-patient privilege has some effect on commerce, although the concept stretches one's imagination.

It is even more difficult to argue for a statute that affected privileges such as those for marital or clergyman communications. Other privileges such as those involving law enforcement and the qualified journalist's privilege may involve additional constitutional analyses including a determination of the impact of the provisions on First or Sixth Amendment considerations.

Reporter's Comment: In drafting Rule 502 in light of Ken's analysis of statutory authority, we were cognizant of situations in which waiver questions might not affect interstate commerce, and in those situations, we decided as an initial matter not to extend the rule. The most important example is the rule on mistaken disclosures. That rule is limited to mistaken disclosures made during the course of discovery. Of course, mistaken disclosures may be made in other circumstances (e.g, a privileged document is mistakenly included in a package of other materials sent to a friend). But disclosures outside the litigation context might not affect interstate commerce, and so we decided not to cover those situations.

There may also be situations in which state proceedings are so localized that they do not affect interstate commerce, and in those cases a "federalized" waiver rule may be problematic. We chose, however, not to carve out those proceedings in the rule, for at least two reasons: 1) They may not exist; you don't have to go far to affect interstate commerce in a litigation; and 2) If they do exist, they are hard to describe. We thought it best to leave the matter to the implementing legislation.

III. Ken Broun's Memo on the Scope of Waiver of Work Product

Proposed Rule 502(a) extends the waiver of both attorney-client privilege and work product protection "to undisclosed information concerning the same subject matter if that undisclosed information ought in fairness to be considered with the disclosed information." Some members of the committee and others have raised the question of whether the draft proposed rule extends the waiver of work product privilege beyond the existing law.

Wright and Miller state that the disclosure of some documents does not destroy work-product protection for other documents. 8 C. Wright and A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2024 at 209 (1970). However, an analysis of the cases dealing with the issue indicates that the statement is too broad. Rather, the scope of the waiver depends upon considerations of fairness that include the nature of the disclosure giving rise to the waiver and the subsequent use of the protected materials such as the presentation of testimony based on them. The case law is entirely consistent with the language of proposed draft Rule 502.

The most important case on waiver of work product privilege is United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225 (1975). In Nobles, the Court held that the defendant would waive his work product privilege by calling his investigator to testify about interviews with two prosecution witnesses. The Court held that the investigator, if he testified, would have to disclose his report. The defendant refused to turn over the report and the investigator was precluded from testifying. The Court held that the preclusion was appropriate – if the investigator testified, the report would have to be disclosed. The testimony would waive the privilege "with respect to matters covered in his testimony." 422 U.S. at 239. In a footnote, the Court distinguished counsel's ordinary reference to notes during the course of the trial from testimonial use of such materials. The effect of the Court's ruling was that, not only was the work product protection waived with regard to matters directly reflected in the report but to all related matters – a subject matter waiver. See also Chubb Integrated Systems, Ltd. v. National Bank of Washington, 103 F.R.D. 52, 64 n. 3 (D.D.C. 1984) (Nobles cited for the proposition that "the testimonial use of work-product constituted waiver of all work-product of same subject matter").

More recent cases from the Courts of Appeal and District Courts reflect a view that subject matter waiver may be more limited than suggested in Nobles and that the limitation will depend upon consideration of fairness under the circumstances. Reflective of that view is U.S. v. Doe, 219 F.3d 175 (2d Cir. 2000). In Doe, a corporation had asserted its attorney-client and work-product privileges in its dealing with an ATF investigation concerning sales of firearms. A corporate officer testified and made references to advice of counsel. The primary question was whether his references to advice of counsel and disclosure of communications waived the corporation's attorney-client and work product privileges. The court noted that "the implied waiver analysis should be guided primarily by fairness principles." 219 F.3d at 185. The court indicated that the district court, in determining the existence and scope of waiver as a result of the corporate officer's disclosures, should consider such things as such as the witness's lack of legal training and the fact that the disclosures were made before the grand jury where the corporation could gain nothing affirmative.

Specifically with regard to waiver of work product privilege, the court stated (219 F.3d at 191), "[w]e believe that the district court on remand should consider further whether there was any waiver of Doe Corp.'s work-product privilege, and, if there was, the proper scope of the waiver. The fairness concerns that guide the waiver analysis above are equally compelling in this context." The court distinguished Nobles and In re Martin Marietta Corp., 856 F.2d 619 (4th Cir. 1988), discussed below, stating (Id.)

> In this case, however, there was no actual disclosure of any privileged documents. Further the context – a grand jury proceeding – is, as already indicated, quite different from settlement negotiations or voluntary disclosure programs where the company, initially at least, stand to benefit directly from disclosing privileged materials.

In Duplan Corp. v. Deering Milliken, Inc., 540 F.2d 1215 (4th Cir. 1976), the court held that there would be no subject matter waiver of work product protection under the circumstances. In Duplan, the party seeking protection had made partial and inadvertent waiver of some of the claimed protected documents, which consisted of mental impressions, opinions and legal theories of their attorneys and representatives. In refusing to find subject matter waiver, the court distinguished Nobles on two grounds. First, in Nobles, the work product was a witness's report, not the mental impressions of a lawyer. Second, the court noted that in this case the party had "neither made nor sought to make any affirmative testimonial use of the documents for which the throwsters [the party seeking protection] claim the work product privilege." 540 F.2d at 1223. The court noted that the principles of Nobles may be applicable if the documents were in fact used at trial.

The Fourth Circuit expanded on its reasoning in Duplan in In re Martin Marietta Corp., cited above. In Martin Marietta, the defendant in a criminal case sought documents from Martin Marietta, his former employer, relating to matters on which he had been indicted. Martin Marietta claimed attorney-client and work product privilege. Defendant argued that the privilege had been waived because documents or some portions of them had been disclosed by the corporation to the United States. Attorney and the Department of Defense. The Court found a subject matter waiver of the attorney client privilege based upon the disclosure to the government. With regard to the work product privilege, the court held that the delivery to the government constituted a testimonial use of the documents, as in Nobles, and held that there would be a subject matter waiver of non-opinion work product. However, it held that there was no subject matter waiver of opinion work product. The court emphasized the added protection given to such work product and added (856 F.2d at 626):

> [T]he underlying rationale for the doctrine of subject matter waiver has little application in the context of a pure expression of legal theory or legal opinion. As we noted in Duplan, the Supreme Court applied the concept in Nobles: "where a party sought to make affirmative testimonial use of the very work product which was then sought to be shielded from disclosure." . . . There is relatively little danger that a litigant will attempt to use a pure mental impression or legal theory as a sword and as shield in the trial of a case so as to distort the factfinding process. Thus, the protection of lawyers from the broad repercussions of subject matter waiver in this context strengthens the adversary process, and, unlike the selective disclosure of evidence, may ultimately and ideally further the search for the truth.

Both Duplan and Martin Marietta hold that there is not necessarily a subject matter waiver applied to disclosures of some matters protected as work product. Yet, the holding of both Fourth Circuit cases is consistent with the Proposed Rule: if it is fair to require apply the waiver to subject matter under the circumstances, the waiver should apply. Martin Marietta finds that the protected mental impressions had not been used in such a way as to require disclosure in that case and notes that there is little danger that they would be so used. The case does not predict the result where the party in fact used mental impression work product both as a shield and as a sword.

Relatively recent District Court cases confirm an approach that would apply considerations of fairness to the issue of subject matter waiver. One example is Bank of America v. Terra Nova Insurance Co., 212 F.R.D. 166 (S.D.N.Y. 2002). The court found a split of authority on the issue of subject matter waiver of work product protection citing Martin Marietta and other cases.

The cases it cited are, with my brief parenthetical description of the holdings, as follows: Cases cited as holding that there is a broad subject matter waiver were In re Sealed Case, 676 F.2d 793, 822-23 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (revealing documents to the SEC waived work product privilege as to all other communications relating to the same subject matter); Bowne v. AmBase Corp., 150 F.R.D. 465, 485-86 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) (work product protection waived based on deposition testimony); Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. v. Rohne-Poulenc Rorer, 1997 WL 801454 (S.D.N.Y) (subject matter waiver based on production of document; considerations of "fairness" govern). Cases limiting waiver to the specific materials disclosed were Pittman v. Frazer, 129 F.3d 983, 988 (8th Cir. 1997) (waiver limited to photographs actually used at trial); St. Paul Reinsurance Co., Ltd. v. Commercial Fin. Corp., 197 F.R.D. 620, 639 (N.D. Iowa 2000) (no subject matter waiver under the circumstances; "the scope of the waiver depends upon the scope of the disclosure"); In re United Mine Workers of America Employee Benefit Plans Litig., 159 F.R.D. 307, 312 (D.D.C. 1994)(waiver limited to specific subject matter under the circumstances; where the party did not deliberately disclose documents in an attempt to gain a tactical advantage, "the law does not mandate a subject-matter waiver and such a waiver is more likely to undermine the adversary system than to promote it"). The holding of none of these cases distracts from the proposition that fairness is a consideration in determining the existence of subject matter waiver.

In the Bank of America v. Terra Nova case itself, the court's treatment of the scope of waiver is based on the same kind of fairness considerations noted in the cases discussed in the preceding paragraphs (212 F.R.D. at 174):

> Here, the Court's decision on the scope of the waiver is guided by the nature of Terra Nova's conduct and the policies underlying the work product doctrine. Because all of the information available to Holland [the party's representative] regarding his investigation was made available in an oral presentation to the governmental authorities, it is only fair to permit Bank of America to examine the facts that were in Holland's possession at that time. That

Holland freely revealed the contents of his investigation in Terra Nova's presence reflects that Terra Nova had no great interest in ensuring the confidentiality of the investigation – be it the actual facts revealed to the government or the underlying documents upon which the presentation was based. Thus, Terra Nova must permit Holland to be re-deposed and to answer questions regarding what factual information was available to him at the time he met with the government agencies.

The court held that any documents relating to the investigation in Holland's possession at the time of his presentation to the government authorities would have to be produced. However, the protection would not be waived with regard to documents in his possession after that date.

Cincinnati Ins. Co. v. Zurich Ins. Co., 198 F.R.D. 81 (W.D.N.C. 2000) is an example of circumstances calling for the extension of a subject matter waiver even with regard to opinion work product. The case involved an alleged negligent failure to settle by an insurance company. The attorney involved in the settlement negotiations was to be called as a witness at trial. The court held that there would be no work product protection, even for his opinions. In this case, the attorney's opinion would be used as a "sword."

In short, the proposed rule 502(a) language does not change the prevailing federal law with regard to the scope of work product waiver.

IV. Discussion of Comments Received

This section of the memo addresses some comments that have already been received on draft Rule 502. Where appropriate, language is suggested to address a comment if the Committee determines that the comment requires an adjustment in the draft rule or Committee Note.

1. Scope of Work Product Waiver

Greg Joseph expresses concern about the rule's provision that there is a subject matter waiver of work product when the undisclosed work product "ought in fairness to be considered with the disclosed information." He believes it changes existing law. As discussed in Ken Broun's memo on the subject, we believe that we accurately capture the existing case law on the subject. And it seems to us that there would have to be a subject matter waiver when the nondisclosed information "ought in fairness" to be considered. Certainly the work product doctrine should not be applied in such a way to allow the invoking party to engineer an unfair result.

Greg suggests that the first paragraph of the Committee Note should be amended to add some discussion about subject matter waiver of work product. He suggests first that the note clarify that the "ought in fairness" language is taken from Rule 106 (the rule of completeness); this reference will provide some guidance on how the subject matter waiver test should be applied. He also suggests that the note cite to a case involving subject matter waiver of work product.

Greg's suggestions seem eminently sensible. What follows is a proposed change to the first paragraph of the Committee Note that would implement these suggestions:

Subdivision (a). This subdivision states the general rule that a voluntary disclosure of information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product doctrine constitutes a waiver of those protections. See, e.g., United States v. Newell, 315 F.3d 510 (5th Cir. 2002) (client waived the privilege by disclosing communications to other individuals who were not pursuing a common interest). The rule provides, however, that a voluntary disclosure generally results in a waiver only of the information disclosed; a subject matter waiver (of either privilege or work product) is reserved for those unusual situations in which fairness requires a further disclosure of related, protected information, in order to protect against a selective and misleading presentation of evidence to the disadvantage of the adversary. See, e.g., In re von Bulow, 828 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1987) (disclosure of privileged information in a book did not result in unfairness to the adversary in a litigation, therefore a subject matter waiver was not warranted); In re United Mine Workers of America Employee Benefit Plans Litig., 159 F.R.D. 307, 312 (D.D.C. 1994)(waiver of work product limited to materials actually disclosed, because the party did not deliberately disclose documents in an attempt to gain a tactical advantage). The language concerning subject matter waiver — "ought in fairness" — is taken from Rule 106, because the animating principle is the same. A party that makes a selective, misleading presentation that is unfair to the adversary opens itself to a more complete and accurate presentation. See, e.g., United States v. Branch, 91 F.3d 699 (5th Cir. 1996) (under Rule 106, completing evidence was not admissible where the party's presentation, while selective, was not misleading or unfair). The rule thus rejects the result in In re Sealed Case, 877 F.2d 976 (D.C.Cir. 1989), which held that inadvertent disclosure of documents during discovery automatically constituted a subject matter waiver.

Greg poses a hypothetical in light of these additions: Suppose a lawyer interviews three witnesses (all work product). Two are favorable and one unfavorable. If the lawyer proffers the two favorable statements, does that constitute a subject matter waiver as to the undisclosed unfavorable statement? If the answer to that is yes, then the rule obviously creates a substantial change in practice and it should be changed.

But at least in the Reporter's view, the hypothetical facts do not result in a subject matter waiver. The presentation of the two favorable witnesses is selective, but it is not misleading. The proper analogy is to the Rule 106 cases like Branch, cited above, where the government admitted a portion of the defendant's confession — the portion which essentially said, "I committed the crime." Other portions of the defendant's statement provided his motivation and a purported excuse for committing the crime. But the court held that Rule 106 did not require admission of these excised portions. According to the court, the government's presentation was "selective" but it was not misleading. The fact was that the defendant admitted the crime.

Accordingly, the Reporter's view of Greg's hypothetical is that it would not come close to a subject matter waiver. On the other hand, if counsel represented that his two favorable witnesses were the only witnesses to the event, then this would be not only a selective but also a misleading presentation, and it would result in a subject matter waiver under the rule.

The Consultant is less confident that Greg's hypothetical would not be problematic. He states that the question of "fairness" will be "difficult and often fact-bound", but concludes that these are the very kind of questions that courts are currently deciding in cases involving possible subject matter waiver of work product.

If the Committee is concerned that a subject matter waiver could be found under the facts Greg sets forth, or similar facts, then a sentence could be added to the Committee Note to allay concerns. That sentence could read something like this:

Under the rule, a subject matter waiver is not found merely because privileged information or work product is presented selectively. A subject matter waiver is found only where the disclosure or use of privileged information or work product is selective and misleading, and a further disclosure is required to protect the adversary from a misleading presentation of the evidence.

2. Who "holds" the privilege or work product immunity?

Greg Joseph and Rick Marcus both raise the question of whether the rule should say something about who holds the privilege or work product protection, and accordingly who has the power to waive it. Greg suggests, for example, that subdivision (a) should be changed to read something like the following:

> (a) Waiver by disclosure in general. — A ~~person waives an~~ holder of an attorney-client privilege or work product protection ~~if that person~~ waives the privilege or protection if that holder — or a predecessor while its holder — voluntarily discloses or consents to disclosure of any significant part of the privileged or protected information. The waiver extends to undisclosed information concerning the same subject matter if that undisclosed information ought in fairness to be considered with the disclosed information.

We decided to avoid the term "holder" as much as possible (though the term does appear elsewhere in the rule) because it is not always clear who is the holder of the privilege, and it is even less clear who is the holder of the work product protection. See Fred Zacharias, Who Owns Work Product?, 2006 Univ. Ill. L.Rev. 127, for an extensive discussion of this very murky area. We are not sure that the addition of the word "holder" in place of "person" is any kind of improvement in the rule. But if it is, we would caution against going any further and trying to define who is a holder and who is not. In fact, if the Committee does wish to implement a change from "person" to "holder" in the text, we strongly suggest that a sentence be added to the Committee Note that would disavow any intent to determine who is the holder of a privilege or work product — leaving that question to common law.

The addition to the Committee Note could read something like this (including the changes to the entry on subject matter waiver, discussed above):

> Subdivision (a). This subdivision states the general rule that a voluntary disclosure of information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product doctrine constitutes a waiver of those protections. See, e.g., United States v. Newell, 315 F.3d 510 (5th Cir. 2002) (client waived the privilege by disclosing communications to other individuals who were not pursuing a common interest). The rule provides, however, that a voluntary disclosure generally results in a waiver only of the information disclosed; a subject matter waiver (of either privilege or work product) is reserved for those unusual situations in which fairness requires a further disclosure of related, protected information, in order to protect against a selective and misleading presentation of evidence to the disadvantage of the adversary. See, e.g., In re von Bulow, 828 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1987) (disclosure of privileged information in a book did not result in unfairness to the adversary in a litigation, therefore a subject matter waiver was not warranted); In re United Mine Workers of America Employee Benefit Plans Litig., 159 F.R.D. 307, 312 (D.D.C. 1994)(waiver of work product limited to materials actually disclosed, because the party did not deliberately disclose documents in an attempt to gain a tactical advantage). The language concerning subject matter waiver — "ought in fairness" — is taken from Rule 106, because the animating principle is the same. A party that makes a selective, misleading presentation that is unfair to the adversary opens itself to a more complete and accurate presentation. See, e.g., United States v. Branch, 91 F.3d 699 (5th Cir. 1996) (under Rule 106, completing evidence was not admissible where the party's presentation, while selective, was not misleading or unfair). Under the rule, a subject matter waiver is not found merely because privileged information or work product is presented selectively. A subject matter waiver is found only where the disclosure or use of privileged information or work product is selective and misleading, and a further disclosure is required to protect the adversary from a misleading presentation of the evidence. The rule ~~thus~~ rejects the result in In re Sealed Case, 877 F.2d 976 (D.C.Cir. 1989), which held that inadvertent disclosure of documents during discovery automatically constituted a subject matter waiver.

The rule governs only waiver by disclosure. Other common-law waiver doctrines may result in a finding of waiver even where there is no disclosure of privileged information or work product. See, e.g., Nguyen v. Excel Corp., 197 F.3d 200 (5th Cir. 1999) (reliance on an advice of counsel defense waives the privilege with respect to attorney-client communications pertinent to that defense); Ryers v. Burleson, 100 F.R.D. 436 (D.D.C. 1983) (allegation of lawyer malpractice constituted a waiver of confidential communications under the circumstances). The rule is not intended to displace or modify federal common law concerning waiver of privilege or work product where no disclosure has been made.

The rule governs waiver by disclosure of the "holder" of the attorney-client privilege or work product protection. The rule does not attempt to determine or define who is a holder of either the privilege or the work product protection. The "holder" question is often difficult and fact-bound. See generally Fred Zacharias, Who Owns Work Product?, 2006 Univ. Ill. L.Rev. 127.

3. Inadvertent disclosure coverage limited to discovery:

Professor Bob Pitler of Brooklyn Law School asks why the provision on inadvertent disclosure should be limited to the context of discovery. The draft rule provides that a disclosure is not a waiver if:

> the disclosure is inadvertent and is made during discovery in federal or state litigation or administrative proceedings — and if the holder of the privilege or work product protection took reasonable precautions to prevent disclosure and took reasonably prompt measures, once the holder knew or should have known of the disclosure, to rectify the error, including (if applicable) following the procedures in Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(5)(B);

We made the choice to limit the rule's coverage to mistaken disclosures during discovery for three reasons: 1) Almost all of the reported cases on mistaken disclosure involve disclosure during discovery; 2) The rule sweeps broadly and dramatically in its attempt to control waiver principles under both federal and state law, and so we tried not to extend it to situations that rarely arise — as Ken puts it, it "seems piggy" to extend the rule any further than it already goes; and 3) At the state level, we were confident that the risk of mistaken disclosures in discovery would affect interstate commerce and therefore could be regulated by Congress — but we were less confident that commerce would be affected when a mistaken disclosure of privilege or work product is made outside of a litigation context.

If the Committee believes, however, that the rule should extend to all mistaken disclosures, this can be done easily.

1. The italicized, qualifying language in the above paragraph (and is made during discovery in federal or state litigation or administrative proceedings) can simply be deleted.

2. The Committee Note would need to be altered to delete references to discovery, but again this could be effectuated easily. The relevant language of the Committee Note would be changed as follows:

> Inadvertent disclosure during discovery: Courts are in conflict on whether an inadvertent disclosure of privileged information or work product~~, made during discovery,~~ constitutes a waiver. A few courts find that a disclosure must be intentional to be a waiver. Most courts find a waiver only if the disclosing party acted carelessly in preserving the privilege and failed to request a return of the information in a timely manner. And a few courts hold that any mistaken disclosure of protected information constitutes waiver without regard to the protections taken to avoid such a disclosure. See generally Hopson v. City of Baltimore, 232 F.R.D. 228 (D.Md. 2005) for a discussion of this case law.

The rule opts for the middle ground: inadvertent disclosure of privileged or protected information ~~during discovery~~ constitutes a waiver only if the party did not take reasonable precautions to prevent disclosure and did not make reasonable and prompt efforts to rectify the error. This position is in accord with the majority view on whether inadvertent disclosure is a waiver. See, e.g., Alldread v. City of Grenada, 988 F.2d 1425 (5th Cir. 1993) (governmental attorney-client privilege); Zapata v. IBP, Inc., 175 F.R.D. 574, 576-77 (D. Kan. 1997) (work product); Hydraflow, Inc. v. Enidine, Inc., 145 F.R.D. 626, 637 (W.D.N.Y. 1993) (attorney-client privilege); Edwards v. Whitaker, 868 F.Supp. 226, 229 (M.D. Tenn. 1994) (attorney-client privilege). The rule establishes a compromise between two competing premises. On the one hand, information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product immunity should not be treated lightly. On the other hand, a rule imposing strict liability for an inadvertent disclosure ~~during discovery~~ threatens to impose prohibitive costs for privilege review and retention, especially in cases involving electronic discovery.

4. Subdivision (c) court orders: state and federal?

Rick Marcus points out that subdivision (c) , on the controlling effect of court orders, does not specify whether state confidentiality orders are covered by the rule. The rule simply refers to "a court order." Rick states that ordinarily "court order" in a federal rule would mean the order of a federal district court.

Rick's point is well-taken. The rule is intended to cover both state and federal courts. (See Part Five of this memo for an explanation of this drafting choice.) It is intended to protect the expectations of all litigants, permitting them to rely on a confidentiality order, whether entered by a federal or a state court.

Therefore, we suggest that the language of the subdivision be changed slightly, as follows:

(c) Controlling effect of court orders. — Notwithstanding subdivision (a), a federal or state court order concerning the preservation or waiver of the attorney-client privilege or work product protection governs its continuing effect on all persons or entities, whether or not they were parties to the matter before the court.

5. Subdivision (e)— Work Product

Rick Marcus suggests that the reference to "work product" in the definitional section, subdivision (e), should instead be "work product protection" because that is the phrasing used throughout the rule. We agree with this suggestion and so propose adoption of that slight change, as follows:

> (e) Included privilege and protection. — As used in this rule:
> 1) "attorney-client privilege" means the protections provided for confidential attorney-client communications under either federal or state law; and
> 2) "work product protection" means the immunity for materials prepared in preparation of litigation as defined in Fed.R.Civ.P. 26 (b) (3) and Fed.R.Crim.P. 16 (a) (2) and (b)(2), as well as the federal common- law and state-enacted provisions or common-law rules providing protection for attorney work product.

6. Committee Note Reference to Commerce Clause as the Source of Legislative Authority:

The Committee Note makes reference to the Commerce Clause as the source of legislative authority for promulgating this rule — a rule that applies a single set of waiver rules to both state and federal litigation. That section of the Note states as follows:

> The Committee is well aware that a privilege rule proposed through the rulemaking process cannot bind state courts, and indeed that a rule of privilege cannot take effect through the ordinary rulemaking process. See 28 U.S.C § 2074(b). It is therefore anticipated that Congress must enact this rule directly, through its authority under the Commerce Clause. Cf. Class Action Fairness Act of 2005, 119 Stat. 4, PL 109-2 (relying on Commerce Clause power to regulate state class actions).

Rick Marcus argues that there might be enough authority for the rule in Congress's power to regulate federal courts, and finally concludes that "the Note need not say what the authority of Congress might be. That's not something it can get from the rules process." Reviewing Rick's comment, Ken Broun concludes that the Note should "leave out the question of the power to enact this legislation entirely" because the Note is "a guide for practitioners and the courts" and not an explication of the authority for promulgating the rule.

The Reporter placed the reference to authority for the rule in the Committee Note because this is obviously an unusual rule. It can be argued that an explanation of authority for is helpful — especially at this early point in the process — because otherwise those who review the rule during a public comment period may wonder how the Rules Committee could possibly believe it had the authority to promulgate not only a rule of privilege but also a rule that binds state as well as federal courts. It is possible, of course, that this could all be explained in some kind of cover letter accompanying the rule through the public comment period. But those letters do not get the same focus as the Committee Note. And there is an argument that a notice function will be necessary for such a unique rule even once it becomes enacted.

Thus, the above paragraph in the Committee Note is intended to serve a (perhaps temporary) notice function that arguably is necessary given the unique provenance of the rule. But if the Committee decides that the source of authority for the rule is a topic not suite to, or better left untreated by, the Note, then the paragraph can be deleted.

7. Committee Note on Subdivision (d), Citation to Hopson

The section of the Committee Note covering subdivision (d) — on confidentiality agreements not entered as court orders — declares as follows:

> Subdivision (d) codifies the well-established proposition that parties to litigation can enter an agreement to limit the effect of waiver by disclosure between or among them. See, e.g., Dowd v. Calabrese, 101 F.R.D. 427, 439 (D.D.C. 1984) (no waiver where the parties stipulated in advance that certain testimony at a deposition "would not be deemed to constitute a waiver of the attorney-client or work product privileges"); Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 216 F.R.D. 280, 290 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (noting that parties may enter into "so-called 'claw-back' agreements that allow the parties to forego privilege review altogether in favor of an agreement to return inadvertently produced privilege documents"). Of course such an agreement can bind only the parties to the agreement. The rule makes clear that if parties want protection from a finding of waiver by disclosure in a separate litigation, the agreement must be made part of a court order. See Hopson v. City of Baltimore, 232 F.R.D. 228, 238 (D.Md. 2005) (noting that "it is essential to the success of this approach in avoiding waiver that the production of inadvertently produced privileged electronic data must be at the compulsion of the court, rather than solely by the voluntary act of the producing party").

Rick Marcus argues that the citation of the Hopson case is problematic. He explains that the theme of Hopson "is that the Ninth Circuit's decision in Transamerica Computers v. IBM establishes that protection can only come if the court orders production. Thus, that is involuntary and can be sanitized from waiver, while a voluntary act of production can't be protected." Rick concludes that the citation is inapt if intended to establish the proposition that voluntarily entered court orders guard against waiver.

While the point can be argued one way or the other, we agree that the citation is not necessary, and if it could confuse the point made in the note, then it should be deleted. We recommend simply deleting the citation to Hopson (and of course the parenthetical) from the above paragraph of the Committee Note.

V. Two Important Drafting Choices

The Reporter and the Consultant made (at least) two important drafting decisions in writing up the draft of the rule. The first is that the text of the rule specifically covers state court actions and state administrative proceedings. The second is that selective waiver is enforced even if there is no confidentiality agreement between the client and the government regulator. We want to explain why we made these choices, and set forth alternatives in case the Committee disagrees with these choices.

A. Covering State Court Actions and State Administrative Proceedings in the Text of the Rule

The Committee determined at its last meeting that any rule on waiver must apply uniformly in state and federal proceedings. Otherwise the rule could not be relied upon, and clients and lawyers would be back where they started—expending substantial resources to guard against waiver and unnecessarily increasing the cost of litigation; and being subject to a disincentive for cooperating with government regulators.

The question, then, is not whether a waiver rule should apply uniformly to both state and federal proceedings. The question is whether this should be made explicit in a Federal Rule of Evidence. Obviously, the Federal Rules apply to federal proceedings and so it is unusual to include within it a rule that covers state proceedings. The coverage can be justified by the fact that Rule 502 would be directly enacted by Congress. Still, there is some tension between draft Rule 502 and Rule 1101(a), which states that the rules apply to "the United States district courts." It could be argued that Rule 1101 (c) resolves any anomaly by providing that rules of privilege apply to "all stages of all actions, cases and proceedings." But it could also be argued that the term "all" is implicitly limited by subdivision (a), which refers to federal proceedings only.

Given the fact that it is critical to cover both state and federal proceedings with the same waiver standards, is there any drafting alternative to that taken in the draft Rule 502? One alternative would simply be to cover only federal proceedings in the rule, and leave state proceedings to parallel legislation adopted by Congress. This possibility is referred to in the Sensenbrenner letter, attached to this memo. This alternative would mean that all references to state proceedings would be eliminated from the draft, and a separate letter to Congress would stress the need for conforming legislation that covers state proceedings.

We decided to include state proceedings within the text of the rule, at least at this point, to make the public aware that there is an explicit intent to cover state proceedings in any legislative attempt to promulgate a waiver rule. That intent would not be as clear if the references to state proceedings were taken out of the text of the draft and left to an explanation in some kind of covering letter. After all, this rule has to be enacted by Congress. The Judicial Conference will not provide the final language. We thought it better to provide notice about the reach of the rule in the text of the rule, and to leave it to Congress to implement the rule in the way it sees fit.

If the Committee disagrees with our drafting choice, the alternative can be implemented without difficulty. Reference to "state" proceedings can be deleted from the text of the rule and the committee note, and we can draft a letter accompanying the rule indicating the need for parallel legislation to govern state proceedings.

Another drafting alternative would be to limit rule 502 to disclosures made during litigation in the federal courts, but to define its effect as including a determination of waiver under either federal or state law. In other words, the Committee could remove the references to state action except in the definitional part (e). The triggering of the rule would then have to occur in the federal judicial process (much like res judicata). Waiver of state privileges would be affected by the rule, but not disclosures that occurred outside of federal litigation and administrative proceedings. A letter accompanying the rule would indicate the need for separate legislation to deal with disclosure in state court and state administrative or agency situations. Such a rule would probably more comfortably fit in the Federal Rule scheme. But again, we decided to put all the provisions in a single rule at this point, in order to obtain the fullest public comment. Ultimately the most efficient method for binding state courts has to be sorted out by Congress.

B. Enforcing Selective Waiver Even Without a Confidentiality Agreement

As indicated in Part One of this memo, a number of courts enforce selective waiver only if the client has entered into a confidentiality agreement with the government regulator. A few courts enforce selective waiver even without such an agreement. We decided to draft the rule so as not to require confidentiality agreements as a condition for enforcement of selective waiver. We made this decision in part because of a comment received by Judge Levi from Helane Morrison, District Administrator of the San Francisco office of the SEC. Ms. Morrison concludes that a requirement of a confidentiality agreement may not fully implement the policy of encouraging cooperation with government investigations that is the animating principle of the draft rule.

Ms. Morrison first points out that the term "confidentiality agreement" is not self-defining, and that many agreements entered into by the SEC contain only "conditional confidentiality language." The conditions include the possibility that the privileged material will be disclosed to other law enforcement officials, and that confidentiality is maintained "except to the extent that the Staff determines that disclosure is otherwise required by federal law or in furtherance of the Commission's discharge of its duties and responsibilities." Ms. Morrison states that the Commission "has to maintain the leeway" established by this conditional confidentiality language. If that is so, it seems that the confidentiality agreement does not establish very much that is relevant in determining whether to enforce a selective waiver. If the reason for a confidentiality requirement is to limit selective waiver to situations in which there will, by agreement, be a limit on widespread use of the protected material, the conditional confidentiality language cuts against that rationale.

Ms. Morrison also points out that legislation introduced in Congress in 2003 and supported by the Commission (H.R. 1729) "did not require a confidentiality agreement to prevent waiver of the privilege when privileged documents were shared with the Commission." To the extent we are doing Congress's work for them in drafting this rule, we felt that this proposed legislation had some relevance.

Finally, Ms. Morrison points out that a confidentiality agreement requirement "would not protect the privilege in the Commission's examination program, which inspects the books and records of brokerage firms, investment advisers and mutual funds, because examinations are not performed pursuant to confidentiality agreements (as currently handled)." To the extent cooperation with government regulators is to be encouraged by the rule, we determined that the encouragement should apply to all aspects of government regulation.

Fundamentally, we concluded that a confidentiality agreement requirement imposed a formalism that would impede efficient cooperation with the government; and it appears to be a formalism that has very little to do with whether it is fair or appropriate to limit the breadth of a waiver of privilege or work product. Essentially the requirement would create lawyers' work without an apparent corresponding benefit. We explain our reasoning in a paragraph of the draft Committee Note:

> The Committee considered whether the protection of selective waiver should be conditioned on obtaining a confidentiality agreement from the government agency. It rejected that condition for a number of reasons. If a confidentiality agreement were a condition to protection, disputes would be likely to arise over whether a particular agreement was sufficiently air-tight to protect against a finding of a general waiver, thus destroying the predictability that is essential to proper administration of the attorney-client privilege and work product immunity. Moreover, a government agency might need to use the information for some purpose and then would find it difficult to be bound by an air-tight confidentiality agreement, however drafted. If such an agreement were nonetheless required to trigger the protection of selective waiver, the policy of furthering cooperation with and efficiency in government investigations would be undermined. Ultimately, the obtaining of a confidentiality agreement has little to do with the underlying policy of furthering cooperation with government agencies that animates the rule. The Committee found it sufficient to condition selective waiver on a finding that the disclosure is limited to persons involved in the investigation.

Of course we are aware that selective waiver would be a tough sell if a party gave privileged information to a government regulator with the express agreement that the regulator could and would disseminate it widely — on the news, to friends and family, etc. But this does not mean that a confidentiality requirement is necessary to justify a finding of selective waiver. We chose to address any concerns about widespread disclosure by putting as a condition that disclosure must be "limited to persons involved in the investigation."

If the Committee disagrees with our assessment, however, there is a drafting alternative that would impose a requirement of obtaining a confidentiality agreement before a selective waiver will be found. That drafting alternative was reviewed by the Committee at its last meeting. The change from the draft would be as follows:

(b) Exceptions in general. — A voluntary disclosure does not operate as a waiver if:

(1) the disclosure is itself privileged or protected;

(2) the disclosure is inadvertent and is made during discovery in federal or state litigation or administrative proceedings — and if the holder of the privilege or work product protection took reasonable precautions to prevent disclosure and took reasonably prompt measures, once the holder knew or should have known of the disclosure, to rectify the error, including (if applicable) following the procedures in Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(5)(B); or

(3) the disclosure is made to a federal, state, or local governmental agency during an investigation by that agency, ~~and is limited to persons involved in the investigation~~ under an agreement that preserves the confidentiality of the communications disclosed.

The Committee Note would have to be changed as well:

Selective waiver: Courts are in conflict on whether disclosure of privileged or protected information to a government agency conducting an investigation of the client constitutes a general waiver of the information disclosed. Most courts have rejected the concept of "selective waiver", holding that waiver of privileged or protected information to a government agency constitutes a waiver for all purposes and to all parties. See, e.g., Westinghouse Electric Corp. v. Republic of the Philippines, 951 F.2d 1414 (3d Cir. 1991). Other courts have held that selective waiver is enforceable if the disclosure is made subject to a confidentiality agreement with the government agency. See, e.g., Teachers Insurance & Annuity Association of America v. Shamrock Broadcasting Co., 521 F. Supp. 638 (S.D.N.Y.

1981). And a few courts have held that disclosure of protected information to the government does not constitute a general waiver, so that the information remains shielded from use by other parties. See, e.g., Diversified Industries, Inc. v. Meredith, 572 F.2d 596 (8th Cir. 1977).

The rule rectifies this conflict by providing that disclosure of protected information to an investigating government agency does not constitute a general waiver of attorney-client privilege or work product protection if the holder of the privilege obtains a confidentiality agreement from the agency. A rule protecting selective waiver to investigating government agencies furthers the important policy of cooperation with government agencies, and maximizes the effectiveness and efficiency of government investigations. See In re Columbia/HCA Healthcare Corp. Billing Practices Litigation, 293 F.3d 289, 314 (6th Cir. 2002) (Boggs, J., dissenting) (noting that the "public interest in easing government investigations" justifies a rule that disclosure to government agencies of information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product immunity does not constitute a waiver to private parties). The requirement of obtaining a confidentiality agreement will tend to assure that the client is treating the privilege seriously and is not engaging in widespread disclosure of information that would be inconsistent with the justification for finding a selective waiver.

~~The Committee considered whether the protection of selective waiver should be conditioned on obtaining a confidentiality agreement from the government agency. It rejected that condition for a number of reasons. If a confidentiality agreement were a condition to protection, disputes would be likely to arise over whether a particular agreement was sufficiently air-tight to protect against a finding of a general waiver, thus destroying the predictability that is essential to proper administration of the attorney-client privilege and work product immunity. Moreover, a government agency might need to use the information for some purpose and then would find it difficult to be bound by an air-tight confidentiality agreement, however drafted. If such an agreement were nonetheless required to trigger the protection of selective waiver, the policy of furthering cooperation with and efficiency in government investigations would be undermined. Ultimately, the obtaining of a confidentiality agreement has little to do with the underlying policy of furthering cooperation with government agencies that animates the rule. The Committee found it sufficient to condition selective waiver on a finding that the disclosure is limited to persons involved in the investigation.~~

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE*

Rule 502. Attorney-Client Privilege and Work Product; Waiver By Disclosure

(a) Waiver by disclosure in general. — A person waives an attorney-client privilege or work product protection if that person — or a predecessor while its holder — voluntarily discloses or consents to disclosure of any significant part of the privileged or protected information. The waiver extends to undisclosed information concerning the same subject matter if that undisclosed information ought in fairness to be considered with the disclosed information.

(b) Exceptions in general. — A voluntary disclosure does not operate as a waiver if:

(1) the disclosure is itself privileged or protected;

(2) the disclosure is inadvertent and is made during discovery in federal or state litigation or administrative

*New material is underlined; matter to be omitted is lined through.

proceedings — and if the holder of the privilege or work product protection took reasonable precautions to prevent disclosure and took reasonably prompt measures, once the holder knew or should have known of the disclosure, to rectify the error, including (if applicable) following the procedures in Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(5)(B); or

(3) the disclosure is made to a federal, state, or local governmental agency during an investigation by that agency, and is limited to persons involved in the investigation.

(c) Controlling effect of court orders. — Notwithstanding subdivision (a), a court order concerning the preservation or waiver of the attorney-client privilege or work product protection governs its continuing effect on all persons or entities, whether or not they were parties to the matter before the court.

(d) Controlling effect of party agreements. — Notwithstanding subdivision (a), an agreement on the effect of disclosure is binding on the parties to the agreement, but not on other parties unless the agreement is incorporated into a court order.

(e) Included privilege and protection. — As used in this rule:

1) "attorney-client privilege" means the protections provided for confidential attorney-client communications under either federal or state law; and

2) "work product" means the immunity for materials prepared in preparation of litigation as defined in Fed.R.Civ.P. 26 (b) (3) and Fed.R.Crim.P. 16 (a) (2) and (b)(2), as well as the federal common- law and state-enacted provisions or common-law rules providing protection for attorney work product.

Committee Note

This new rule has two major purposes:

1) It resolves some longstanding disputes in the courts about the effect of certain disclosures of material protected by the attorney-client privilege or the work product doctrine— specifically those disputes involving inadvertent disclosure and selective waiver.

2) It responds to the widespread complaint that litigation costs for review and protection of material that is privileged or work product have become prohibitive due to the concern that any disclosure of protected information in the course of discovery (however innocent or minimal) will operate as a subject matter waiver of all protected information. This concern is especially troubling in cases involving electronic discovery. See, e.g., Rowe Entertainment, Inc. v. William Morris Agency, 205 F.R.D. 421, 425-26 (S.D.N.Y. 2002) (finding that in a case involving the production of e-mail, the cost of pre-production review for privileged and work product material would cost one defendant $120,000 and another defendant $247,000, and that such review would take months). See also Report to the Judicial Conference Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure by the Advisory Committee on the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, September 2005 at 27 ("The volume of information and the forms in which it is stored make privilege determinations more difficult and privilege review correspondingly more expensive and time-consuming yet less likely to detect all privileged information."); Hopson v. City of Baltimore, 232 F.R.D. 228, 244 (D.Md. 2005) (electronic discovery may encompass "millions of documents" and to insist upon "record-by-record pre-production privilege review, on pain of subject matter waiver, would impose upon parties costs of production that bear no proportionality to what is at stake in the litigation").

The rule seeks to provide a predictable, uniform set of standards under which parties can determine the consequences of a disclosure of information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product doctrine. As part of that predictability, the rule is intended to regulate the consequences of disclosure of information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product doctrine at both the state and federal level. Parties to litigation need to know, for example, that if they exchange privileged information pursuant to a confidentiality order, the court's order will be enforceable in both state and federal courts. If a federal court's confidentiality order is not enforceable in a state court (or vice versa) then the burdensome costs of privilege review and retention are unlikely to be reduced.

The Committee is well aware that a privilege rule proposed through the rulemaking process cannot bind state courts, and indeed that a rule of privilege cannot take effect through the ordinary rulemaking process. See 28 U.S.C § 2074(b). It is therefore anticipated that Congress must enact this rule directly, through its authority under the Commerce Clause. Cf. Class Action Fairness Act of 2005, 119 Stat. 4, PL 109-2 (relying on Commerce Clause power to regulate state class actions).

Subdivision (a). This subdivision states the general rule that a voluntary disclosure of information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product doctrine constitutes a waiver of those protections. See, e.g., United States v. Newell, 315 F.3d 510 (5th Cir. 2002) (client waived the privilege by disclosing communications to other individuals who were not pursuing a common interest). The rule provides, however, that a voluntary disclosure generally results in a waiver only of the information disclosed; a subject matter waiver is reserved for those unusual situations in which fairness requires a further disclosure of related, protected information. See, e.g., In re von Bulow, 828 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1987) (disclosure of privileged information in a book did not result in unfairness to the adversary in a litigation, therefore a subject matter waiver was not warranted). The rule thus rejects the result in In re Sealed Case, 877 F.2d 976 (D.C.Cir. 1989), which held that inadvertent disclosure of documents during discovery automatically constituted a subject matter waiver.

The rule governs only waiver by disclosure. Other common-law waiver doctrines may result in a finding of waiver even where there is no disclosure of privileged information or work product. See, e.g., Nguyen v. Excel Corp., 197 F.3d 200 (5th Cir. 1999) (reliance on an advice of counsel defense waives the privilege with respect to attorney-client communications pertinent to that defense); Ryers v. Burleson, 100 F.R.D. 436 (D.D.C. 1983) (allegation of lawyer malpractice constituted a waiver of confidential communications under the circumstances). The rule is not intended to displace or modify federal common law concerning waiver of privilege or work product where no disclosure has been made.

Subdivision (b). This subdivision collects the basic common-law exceptions to waiver by disclosure of attorney-client privilege and work product.

Protected disclosure: Disclosure does not constitute a waiver if the disclosure itself is protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product immunity. For example, if a party privately discloses a privileged communication to another party pursuing a common legal interest, that disclosure is itself protected and the privilege covering the underlying information is not waived. See, e.g., Waller v. Financial Corp. of America, 828 F.2d 579 (9th Cir. 1987) (communications by a client to his lawyer remained privileged where the lawyer shared the communications with codefendants pursuing a common defense); Hodges, Grant & Kaufman v. United States Gov't Dept. of Treasury, 768 F.2d 719, 721 (5th Cir. 1985) (noting that the privilege is not waived "if a privileged communication is shared with a third person who has a common legal interest with respect to the subject matter of the communication"). Similarly, the protection of the attorney-client privilege or work product immunity is not waived if protected information is disclosed by one lawyer to another in a law firm.

Inadvertent disclosure during discovery: Courts are in conflict on whether an inadvertent disclosure of privileged information or work product, made during discovery, constitutes a waiver. A few courts find that a disclosure must be intentional to be a waiver. Most courts find a waiver only if the disclosing party acted carelessly in preserving the privilege and failed to request a return of the information in a timely manner. And a few courts hold that any mistaken disclosure of protected information constitutes waiver without regard to the protections taken to avoid such a disclosure. See generally Hopson v. City of Baltimore, 232 F.R.D. 228 (D.Md. 2005) for a discussion of this case law.

The rule opts for the middle ground: inadvertent disclosure of privileged or protected information during discovery constitutes a waiver only if the party did not take reasonable precautions to prevent disclosure and did not make reasonable and prompt efforts to rectify the error. This position is in accord with the majority view on whether inadvertent disclosure is a waiver. See, e.g., Alldread v. City of Grenada, 988 F.2d 1425 (5th Cir. 1993) (governmental attorney-client privilege); Zapata v. IBP, Inc., 175 F.R.D. 574, 576-77 (D. Kan. 1997) (work product); Hydraflow, Inc. v. Enidine, Inc., 145 F.R.D. 626, 637 (W.D.N.Y. 1993) (attorney-client privilege); Edwards v. Whitaker, 868 F.Supp. 226, 229 (M.D. Tenn. 1994) (attorney-client privilege). The rule establishes a compromise between two competing premises. On the one hand, information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product immunity should not be treated lightly. On the other hand, a rule imposing strict liability for an inadvertent disclosure during discovery threatens to impose prohibitive costs for privilege review and retention, especially in cases involving electronic discovery.

Selective waiver: Courts are in conflict on whether disclosure of privileged or protected information to a government agency conducting an investigation of the client constitutes a general waiver of the information disclosed. Most courts have rejected the concept of "selective waiver", holding that waiver of privileged or protected information to a government agency constitutes a waiver for all purposes and to all parties. See, e.g., Westinghouse Electric Corp. v. Republic of the Philippines, 951 F.2d 1414 (3d Cir. 1991). Other courts have held that selective waiver is enforceable if the disclosure is made subject to a confidentiality agreement with the government agency. See, e.g., Teachers Insurance & Annuity Association of America v. Shamrock Broadcasting Co., 521 F. Supp. 638 (S.D.N.Y. 1981). And a few courts have held that disclosure of protected information to the government does not constitute a general waiver, so that the information remains shielded from use by other parties. See, e.g., Diversified Industries, Inc. v. Meredith, 572 F.2d 596 (8th Cir. 1977).

The rule rectifies this conflict by providing that disclosure of protected information to an investigating government agency does not constitute a general waiver of attorney-client privilege or work product protection. A rule protecting selective waiver to investigating government agencies furthers the important policy of cooperation with government agencies, and maximizes the effectiveness and efficiency of government investigations. See In re Columbia/HCA Healthcare Corp. Billing Practices Litigation, 293 F.3d 289, 314 (6th Cir. 2002) (Boggs, J., dissenting) (noting that the "public interest in easing government investigations" justifies a rule that disclosure to government agencies of information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product immunity does not constitute a waiver to private parties).

The Committee considered whether the protection of selective waiver should be conditioned on obtaining a confidentiality agreement from the government agency. It rejected that condition for a number of reasons. If a confidentiality agreement were a condition to protection, disputes would be likely to arise over whether a particular agreement was sufficiently air-tight to protect against a finding of a general waiver, thus destroying the predictability that is essential to proper administration of the attorney-client privilege and work product immunity. Moreover, a government agency might need to use the information for some purpose and then would find it difficult to be bound by an air-tight confidentiality agreement, however drafted. If such an agreement were nonetheless required to trigger the protection of selective waiver, the policy of furthering cooperation with and efficiency in government investigations would be undermined. Ultimately, the obtaining of a confidentiality agreement has little to do with the underlying policy of furthering cooperation with government agencies that animates the rule. The Committee found it sufficient to condition selective waiver on a finding that the disclosure is limited to persons involved in the investigation.

Subdivision (c). Confidentiality orders are becoming increasingly important in limiting the costs of privilege review and retention, especially in cases involving electronic discovery. See Manual for Complex Litigation Fourth § 11.446 (Federal Judicial Center2004) (noting that fear of the consequences of waiver "may add cost and delay to the discovery process for all sides" and that courts have responded by encouraging counsel "to stipulate at the outset of discovery to a 'nonwaiver' agreement, which they can adopt as a case-management order."). But the utility of a confidentiality order in reducing discovery costs is substantially diminished if it provides no protection outside the particular litigation in which the order is entered. Parties are unlikely to be able to reduce the costs of pre-production review for privilege and work product if the consequence of disclosure is that the information can be used by non-parties to the litigation.

There is some dispute on whether a confidentiality order entered in one case can bind non-parties from asserting waiver by disclosure in a separate litigation. See generally Hopson v. City of Baltimore, 232 F.R.D. 228 (D.Md. 2005) for a discussion of this case law. The rule provides that such orders are enforceable against non-parties. As such the rule provides a party with a predictable protection that is necessary to allow that party to limit the prohibitive costs of privilege and work product review and retention.

Subdivision (c) contemplates that the court may order production and guarantee confidentiality under criteria different from those providing exceptions to waiver under subdivision (b). For example, the court order may provide for return of documents without waiver irrespective of the care taken by the disclosing party; the rule contemplates enforcement of "claw-back" and "quick peek" arrangements as a way to avoid the excessive costs of pre-production review for privilege and work product..

Subdivision (d). Subdivision (d) codifies the well-established proposition that parties to litigation can enter an agreement to limit the effect of waiver by disclosure between or among them. See, e.g., Dowd v. Calabrese, 101 F.R.D. 427, 439 (D.D.C. 1984) (no waiver where the parties stipulated in advance that certain testimony at a deposition "would not be deemed to constitute a waiver of the attorney-client or work product privileges"); Zubulake

v. UBS Warburg LLC, 216 F.R.D. 280, 290 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (noting that parties may enter into "so-called 'claw-back' agreements that allow the parties to forego privilege review altogether in favor of an agreement to return inadvertently produced privilege documents"). Of course such an agreement can bind only the parties to the agreement. The rule makes clear that if parties want protection from a finding of waiver by disclosure in a separate litigation, the agreement must be made part of a court order. See Hopson v. City of Baltimore, 232 F.R.D. 228, 238 (D.Md. 2005) (noting that "it is essential to the success of this approach in avoiding waiver that the production of inadvertently produced privileged electronic data must be at the compulsion of the court, rather than solely by the voluntary act of the producing party").

Subdivision (d) contemplates that the parties may agree to production and guarantee confidentiality under criteria different from those providing exceptions to waiver in subdivision (b). For example, the parties may provide for return of documents without waiver irrespective of the care taken by the disclosing party, and may agree to "claw-back" or "quick peek" arrangements to reduce the cost of pre-production review for privilege and work product.

Subdivision (e). This subdivision makes clear that the rule governs waiver by disclosure for the attorney-client privilege and work product immunity under both state and federal law.

The rule's coverage is limited to attorney-client privilege and work product. The limitation in coverage is consistent with the goals of the rule, which are 1) to provide a reasonable limit on the costs of privilege and work product review and retention that are incurred by parties to litigation; and 2) to encourage cooperation with government investigations and reduce the costs of those investigations. These two interests arise mainly, if not exclusively, in the context of disclosure of attorney-client privilege and work product. The operation of waiver by disclosure, as applied to other evidentiary privileges, remains a question of federal common law. Nor does the rule purport to apply to the Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination.

Dear Ralph:

I write to request that the U.S. Judicial Conference initiate a rule-making on forfeiture of privileges.

I am informed that an absence of clarity on this subject, particularly as it pertains to the attorney-client privilege, is causing significant disruption and cost to the litigation process. I therefore urge the Judicial Conference to proceed with a rule-making that would –

- protect against the forfeiture of privilege where a disclosure in discovery is the result of an innocent mistake;
- permit parties, and courts, to protect against the consequences of waiver by permitting disclosures of privileged information between the parties to a litigation; and
- allow persons and entities to cooperate with government agencies by turning over privileged information without waiving all privileges as to other parties in subsequent litigation.

The expense in reviewing an enormous volume of papers, electronic files, and other materials in intensive discovery cases can represent a major component of litigation costs, which continue to rise. Lawyers are often compelled to expend countless hours screening vast quantities of documents to guarantee that any document produced in response to a discovery request does not include a privileged document for fear that the disclosure will waive the privilege for all other documents dealing with the same subject matter.

Parties occasionally try to facilitate the discovery process by agreeing to make discovery without forfeiting privileges so that any claim of privilege can be selectively asserted at a later date. Sometimes these agreements are approved by court order. Yet these agreements, even with a court order, do not provide adequate assurances that the privilege will not be deemed waived in other proceedings or in other fora. The same difficulties can arise when disclosure is made voluntarily to a regulatory or governmental agency.

I understand that implementation of such a rule would require approval by an act of Congress in accordance with the Rules Enabling Act. Separate legislation would also be needed to extend the rule's protection to subsequent litigation in state court.

A federal rule protecting parties against forfeiture of privileges in these circumstances could significantly reduce litigation costs and delay and markedly improve the administration of justice for all participants. My Committee looks forward to working with the Judicial Conference on this important matter.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Chairman:

Thank you for your letter of January 23, 2006, requesting the Judicial Conference to initiate the rulemaking process to address litigation costs and burdens arising from the review of attorney-client and work-product information. I have sent your request to the Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules for its consideration.

I understand that the Evidence Rules Committee is planning to hold a mini-conference with attorneys, academics, and judges expert in privilege law at the Fordham University School of Law in New York City on April 24-25, 2006. The Committee will consider a draft proposal that protects parties from waiving attorney-client privilege or work-product protection when information is inadvertently disclosed in discovery, when information is disclosed in accordance with the parties' agreement or a court order, or when information is disclosed by a party cooperating with a government agency in an investigation preceding the litigation. The Committee would welcome you or your staff at the New York City conference. In any event, we will keep you posted of progress on this important issue.

We appreciate your continuing support of the rulemaking process. If you need further assistance in this matter, please contact Cordia A. Strom, Assistant Director, Office of Legislative Affairs at (202) 502-1700.

Today's Events In Washington 44

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Plans Focus On Iraq, Economy For 2006. In a story that runs over 2100 words highlighting political and policy opportunities for the Administration -- as well as potential pitfalls, USA Today (1/3, Jackson, Page, 2.31M) says that while past president have faced their greatest difficulties during the sixth year of their tenure, the White House is making preparations for a "better year" ahead. USA adds that for President Bush, 2005 "was a year of growing public impatience with the Iraq war, angst over record gas prices, devastation from Hurricane Katrina, the collapse of his Social Security plan and, finally, a firestorm over his decision to authorize targeted domestic spying without court warrants. Now he faces a challenge that has upended the best-laid plans of his predecessors: his sixth year in office." However, the White House "and its allies see opportunities, though, sixth year or not." Top aides "say Bush aims to travel more often and speak out more forcefully, touting the economy as underappreciated good news." To "avoid the sort of stalemate that undermined his Social Security proposal, Bush will downsize his domestic agenda, proposing changes in immigration law but shelving, at least for now, plans for a tax overhaul." White House spokesman Scott McClellan "says the basic game plan is simple: 'The economy and progress in Iraq.'" USA adds Bush's "most powerful aide, Karl Rove, has invited think-tank analysts, authors and others to the White House for ideas to help reinvigorate the president's domestic agenda." But there is "trouble on the horizon, too, and events that are outside White House control," such as in Iraq, the CIA leak investigation, and the Abramoff probe. USA then outlines the White House's planned strategy across a number of policy fronts.

The Washington Times (1/3, Sammon, 90K) reports President Bush "is planning to spend 2006 getting back to the basics of his agenda by making the case for his policies on Iraq and the economy instead of pursuing lofty new domestic initiatives." White House spokesman Trent Duffy said, "The president will begin the new year very much in the way he left 2005, which is to discuss the country's two top priorities, keeping our economy strong and growing stronger and creating jobs, and also winning the war on terrorism." The Times adds that is "not to say Mr. Bush will not reveal new initiatives in his State of the Union address, tentatively scheduled for Jan. 31. But those initiatives are expected to be more modest than his ambitious quest to reform Social Security, partly because it will be harder to enact his agenda in a congressional re-election year." Aides "hinted that Mr. Bush will try to make his tax cuts permanent, pass an immigration reform law and push for additional energy legislation, including a measure to open oil exploration in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska. Although he has not officially abandoned Social Security reform, he will spend less time promoting the long-shot initiative."

Democrats To Attack Bush, GOP On Privacy Issues. The Washington Times (1/3, Hurt, 90K) reports congressional Democrats "are drafting a strategy to attack the Bush administration and Republicans as having little regard for the privacy of Americans." Before Christmas, Senate Minority Whip Richard Durbin said, "We will initiate at the beginning of this year one of the most serious debates and discussions on Capitol Hill in our history about individual rights and liberties." The Times adds the "topic will be a major focus of the Supreme Court confirmation hearings of federal Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. as privacy rights -- the political code phrase for abortion rights -- already has become a major issue, Mr. Durbin said." Democratic leaders "then plan to keep the issue alive as they continue their opposition to key parts of the USA Patriot Act, which is set to expire in early February unless extended." But the "real payoff, Democrats say, will be the hearings into President Bush's authorization of warrantless spying on terror suspects."

Comey Opposed Parts Of NSA Domestic Spying Program. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/2, Romans) reported, "The White House is vowing to aggressively defend its program to secretly wiretap Americans in the days and weeks ahead. But this upcoming offensive comes amid new reports of serious internal debate in the Bush administration over the legality of this program." CNN (Quijano) added, "Government officials say during at least part of James Comey's tenure as deputy attorney general, he vigorously opposed parts of the National Security Agency's secret domestic surveillance program and refused to sign off on its renewal." On Sunday, President Bush "would not comment directly when asked whether he was aware of any high-level resistance to the NSA program. Instead, he again forcefully defended its use, calling it legal and necessary." CNN added that "sources have told CNN that the surveillance program was stopped in 2004 for a short time because of legal questions. Some changes were then made to the program, but it's not clear what those changes were."

Williams Says Domestic Spying Program Is Hard To Defend. Pete Williams said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/2) that the domestic surveillance program is "a hard program to defend, because we don't know the extent of it or precisely how it worked. … Now, the legal justification they make is twofold. First, they say, the president has a constitutional authority as commander-in-chief to do this. And secondly, they say, when Congress authorized the use of military force, which was right after 9/11, it gave the president whatever authority he needed to do in wartime. Intelligence gathering, the administration argued, is incident to making war and the president has authority under that law as well. That's been their legal argument.

Mitchell Says Administration Needs To Be "More Out Front" About Eavesdropping. Andrea Mitchell of NBC News said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/2), "I think [Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen] Specter is a bellwether. … Right now the administration is pressing Specter to give this up and let the intelligence community do this in secret. And he's been arguing that this needs to be the Judiciary Committee. That there are major legal issues involved. One of the things that the White House probably is still resisting, but really needs to do, is be a little bit more out front, because it's not just a handful of cases. It's at least 500 people at a time being eavesdropped upon. And in fact, there were millions and millions of calls and e-mails that were swept up in this electronic vacuum cleaner.'

Thomas Says Presidents Always Give Themselves Power In Times Of War. Evan Thomas of Newsweek said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/2) that this is "an historic moment. A couple hundred years of presidents in times of crisis reaching out, giving a lot of power to themselves. Inevitably, there's a reaction, first it starts with a bureaucracy, it's a little slow and then seeps into the public. You can trace this after Watergate, Vietnam, World War II, World War I, every time we have a war, presidents do this. Eventually there's a reaction. I think that reaction is beginning now. What's not clear is how severe it is, whether the president is going to get whapped back, but you can feel some emanations off of Capitol Hill, as often where it starts, that people are starting to say, hey, maybe the balance is a little bit out of whack here."

Bush Defends Domestic Wiretap Program. President Bush on Sunday visited San Antonio to meet with wounded Iraq veterans and staff at the Brooke Army Medical Center. That visit, however, was largely upstaged by what NBC called his "strongly worded defense" of the Administration's use of the National Security Agency to wiretap people in the US. Other reports also tended to state say Bush defended the program "strongly" or "fiercely." The President made the remarks as media reports indicated there was some dissension within the Justice Department over the legality of the program -- and as four senators backed holding hearings. The story was the lead on NBC, while CBS covered it in a full segment and ABC mentioned it briefly. Today's major newspapers also cover the story in depth.

NBC Nightly News (1/1, lead story, 2:30, Costello) reported the President said, "yet again, in a very strongly worded defense," that "if al Qaeda is trying to call someone, the government should now who and why." Bush "felt compelled again to defend the secret White House program to monitor email traffic and listen into the phone calls of as many as 500 Americans each day without court approval. Mr. Bush said only international calls to and from the US and involving known al Qaeda sympathizers were tapped." President Bush: "It seems logical to me if we know a phone number associated with al Qaeda and or an al Qaeda affiliate, and they are making phone calls, it makes sense to find out why." Costello: "The President again emphasized Congress was kept informed of the program, which was regularly reviewed by the Justice Department and found to be legal. But the New York Times reported that then-Deputy Attorney General James Comey resisted approving parts of the spying program out of concern that it wasn't legal. And Newsweek reports in a cover story that then-Attorney General John Ashcroft refused to overrule Comey, while Time magazine reports that the President even bypassed top Justice Department attorneys who normally reviewed top-secret intelligence programs."

The CBS Evening News (1/1, story 4, 2:00, Roberts) reported, "Bush again fiercely defended his domestic spying program, one that authorizes the government to monitor conversations to and from the US without a court warrant." In an "attempt to dissuade congressional hearings its legality, he says even the program's disclosure has damaged national security and in answer to criticisms about possible civil liberty violations he argues that spying is limited in scope." President Bush: "If somebody from al Qaeda is calling you, we'd like to know why. In the meantime, this program is conscious of people's civil liberties, as am I." Roberts: "Today four US Senators, including Richard Lugar, the Republican Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee said that hearings on the President's authorization of domestic spying without warrants are appropriate."

The New York Times (1/2, Lichtblau) reports Senator Arlen Specter, "a Pennsylvania Republican and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has already pledged to make hearings into the program one of his highest priorities." In a letter to Specter on Sunday, "Senator Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat who is also on the committee, said the panel should also explore 'significant concern about the legality of the program even at the very highest levels of the Department of Justice.'"

Lugar, appearing on CNN's Late Edition (1/1, Blitzer), said, "I can understand in the context of 9/11 that there may have been, in a common sense way, a reason why calls coming from the Middle East or Afghanistan to America might be intercepted, but I think the Congress quite rightly is trying to take a look at now that we're past 9/11, we're going to have to live with the war on terror for a long, long while." Asked if he advocated holding hearings on the matter, Lugar responded, "I do. I think this is an appropriate time. … I think we want to see what in the course of time really works best and the FISA Act has worked pretty well from the time of President Carter's day to the current time."

Sen. Mitch McConnell, on Fox News Sunday (1/1, Wallace), said, "Thank goodness the Justice Department is investigating to find out who has been endangering our national security by leaking this information so that our enemies now have a greater sense of what our techniques are in going after terrorists. The overwhelming majority of the American people understand that we need new techniques in the wake of 9/11 in order to protect us. … This needs to be investigated, because whoever leaked this information has done the U.S. and its national security a great disservice."

ABC World News Tonight (1/1, story 6, :20, Harris) reported, "There are reports that high-level officials at the Justice Department objected to the Administration's controversial domestic spying program." Reuters (1/2, Zakaria) notes the New York Times "reported on Sunday that James Comey, a deputy to then-Attorney General John Ashcroft, was concerned about the legality of the NSA program and refused to extend it in 2004." White House aides "then turned to Ashcroft while the attorney general was hospitalized for gallbladder surgery, the Times said." The AP (1/2, Riechmann) says Bush "didn't answer a reporter's question about whether he was aware of any resistance to the program at high levels of his administration and how that might have influenced his decision to approve it."

The New York Post (1/2, Mangan, Dicker) reports, "President Bush belittled top Justice Department official James Comey with the nickname 'Cuomo' after the former Manhattan U.S. attorney balked at allowing controversial warrantless eavesdropping to catch terrorists, a new report claims." The Post continues, "Comey acquired the nickname — which referred to New York ex-Gov. Mario Cuomo — after Bush administration officials concluded he was not a 'team player' on that and other issues, Newsweek reports. … Comey, who now is general counsel for the Lockheed Martin corporation, could not be reached for comment. … But Cuomo laughingly told The Post, 'I'll say this — Comey and Cuomo have this in common: They both agree that the president was wrong.' … The White House denied that Bush, who has a penchant for doling out nicknames, tagged Comey with the scornful sobriquet."

New York Daily News (1/2, Siemaszko) reports, "Schumer also said he will ask Specter to question top White House officials such as former Acting Attorney General Jim Comey, who reportedly opposed the secret domestic eavesdropping on legal grounds. … 'When Comey, who was one of the premier terrorism prosecutors in this country, said that he thought this program violated the law ... it calls into question the way the president and the vice president went about changing it,' Schumer said on 'Fox News Sunday.'"

Schumer, on Fox News Sunday (1/1, Wallace), commented, "The problem here is that the President thought there was a problem -- that's legitimate -- but instead of coming to people and saying 'okay, I need changes in the law,' he just changed it on his own. And today's revelations…really heighten the concerns about this. When [former Deputy Attorney General James] Comey, who was one of the premiere terrorism prosecutors in this country, said that he thought this program violated the law, when it's reported that people at the NSA -- and none of these people are left-wing liberals -- had real doubts about the program, it calls into question the way the president and vice president went about changing it."

The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Roche, Chen) says Bush "strongly defended the domestic eavesdropping program," and quotes the President saying, "If somebody from Al Qaeda is calling you, we'd like to know why. … We're at war with a bunch of coldblooded killers."

The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Rein) notes it was Bush's "third defense in two weeks of his secret domestic spying program." The Post quotes Bush saying, "This is a limited program designed to prevent attacks on the United States of America, and I repeat limited." The Post later says, "The president's first public comments of the new year after no public appearances last week offered a glimpse into how his administration intends to deflect congressional inquiries into his authorization of wiretaps on terrorism suspects -- with a vigorous defense of the program as a matter of national security."

The Washington Times (1/2, Curl) adds the President also "criticized anew the leaker who revealed the program to the New York Times, which published a front-page article about it on the day the Senate was scheduled to vote on an extension of the Patriot Act. 'There's an enemy out there. They read newspapers, they listen to what you write, they listen to what you put on the air, and they react,' said Mr. Bush, who added that the leak of the program causes great harm to national security."

NSA Surveillance Credited With Stopping Terror Attacks Post-9/11. Syndicated columnist Charles Krauthammer, appearing on Fox News Sunday (1/1, Wallace), said, "There's a great irony here. Everybody has been asking of themselves for the last four years why haven't we had a second attack. … But what we've heard over the last six months with these revelations, these so-called scandals, of the secret prisons where high-level Al Qaida have been held, the coercive interrogation which is under attack in the McCain amendment, and now the NSA eavesdropping -- we have the untold story which the administration could not tell. It knew why we had been protected. … We had a means, technological, in the NSA eavesdropping, and also other means in capturing these terrorists, of getting information. It's worked. It's held us safe."

DOJ Probes Of High-Level Leaks Seldom Meet With Success. Knight Ridder (1/2, Mondics) reports, "When President Bush defended the National Security Agency after the disclosure that it had spied on hundreds of Americans, he angrily denounced media leaks about the program, and the Justice Department has now opened a criminal probe. … But an ongoing Justice investigation of the president's own staff in an unrelated leak case and the handling of hundreds of other leak allegations each year suggest that the probe of the NSA leak - which focuses on the disclosure of classified information to The New York Times - faces huge obstacles." Knight Ridder continues, "Only two government officials have ever been convicted of leaking classified information to a news organization. Samuel L. Morison, a Navy intelligence analyst, was prosecuted for leaking three spy satellite photos to Jane's Defence Weekly in 1984; Jonathan Randel, a former Drug Enforcement Administration analyst, was convicted in 1999 of leaking confidential information about DEA investigations to a London newspaper." Knight Ridder adds, "More recently, special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald acknowledged difficulty proving that any laws governing the release of classified information were broken in the White House leak to the media of a CIA operative's identity. Fitzgerald did win an indictment Oct. 28 of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Cheney, for allegedly lying to investigators in the case. But after two years, Fitzgerald has charged no one with illegally releasing sensitive national security information - the charge that prompted the investigation. … Mark Corallo, a former Justice spokesman who is now a spokesman for Bush adviser Karl Rove in matters related to the Fitzgerald investigation, said the department typically received hundreds of requests a year from intelligence agencies to investigate leaks, and most cases went nowhere. … One reason is that the Justice Department, despite a handful of high-profile cases, has been reluctant to subpoena reporters who for reasons of confidentiality declined to testify; another is that laws governing such prosecutions require the government to show that the leaker intended to break the law - a difficult hurdle to clear."

Bush Will Begin 2006 "Preoccupied" By Domestic Spying Controversy. Time (1/9, Lacayo) reports that President Bush's 2002 Executive Order allowing the NSA to eavesdrop without a warrant on phone conversations, e-mail and other electronic communications "remained a closely guarded secret" for four years. Time adds, "Because the NSA program was so sensitive, Administration officials tell TIME, the 'lawyers' group,' an organization of fewer than half a dozen government attorneys the National Security Council convenes to review top-secret intelligence programs, was bypassed. Instead, the legal vetting was given to Alberto Gonzales, then White House counsel. In the weeks since Dec. 16, when the program was disclosed by the New York Times, it has set off a ferocious debate in Washington and around the country about how the rule of law should constrain the war on terrorism. That development ensures that the President will start the new year preoccupied for a while with a fight over whether his responsibility to prevent another attack gave him the power to push aside an act of Congress -- or, to use the terms of his harshest critics, to break the law."

In a separate story, Time (1/9, Tumulty, Allen) reports that "the revelation that his Administration has been spying in this country without warrants -- illegally, critics say -- may have put a crimp in Bush's plan to climb back on top of the agenda as the new legislative session begins. 'When Congress comes back,' warns a top G.O.P. congressional aide, 'domestic surveillance and privacy issues will be all over the front pages.' To which the President and his strategists seem to be saying, Bring it on." From the Time the story broke, the Administration "decided its strategy would be to 'overwhelm the skeptics, not back off, not change anything about the program and really home in very strongly on the fact that this is a legitimate part of presidential warmaking power,' says an adviser." GOP strategists "argue that Democrats have little leeway to attack on the issue because it could make them look weak on national security and because some of their leaders were briefed about the National Security Agency (NSA) no-warrant surveillance before it became public knowledge. Some key Democrats even defend it."

"Ferocious" Administration Infighting Delayed Domestic Spying Program For A Time. Newsweek (1/9, Thomas, Klaidman) reports, "NEWSWEEK has learned, ferocious behind-the-scenes infighting stalled for a time the administration's ambitious program of electronic spying on U.S. citizens at home and abroad." Newsweek adds, "It does not appear that President Bush -- determined to stand tall in the war on terror -- or Vice President Cheney, a staunch believer in executive power, hesitated to circumvent FISA.

Asserting the broad warmaking powers conferred on the president by Article 2 of the Constitution and by a post-9/11 congressional resolution authorizing the use of force to combat global terror, Bush repeatedly approved of what the NSA calls a 'special collection program' that eavesdropped -- without warrants -- on about 500 Americans a day."

"Reassertion Of Presidential Power" Said To Be At Heart Of Spying Debate. U.S. News and World Report (1/9, Kaplan) reports, "At the heart of the debate over domestic spying is a reassertion of presidential power. Legal advisers to the president have made a case for sweeping executive authority during wartime. The White House's authority to render terrorism suspects jailed without trial and run warrantless eavesdropping, they argue, is authorized by a congressional war resolution passed after 9/11 and by the Constitution's grant of war-making power to the commander in chief. Among the prime supporters of this position is Vice President Dick Cheney, who as White House chief of staff under Gerald Ford saw Congress take back considerable amounts of executive power after the abuses of the Nixon era. But Congress and the courts may now be pushing back. Legal challenges to the administration's detention policy and the FBI's national security letters are winding their way through the courts." Likewise, Time (1/9, Lacayo) says the White House "has been developing a very robust interpretation of presidential power" to "support its aggressive conduct." Vice President Dick Cheney "in particular believes that presidential power has been unreasonably confined since the 1970s." Time adds, "Because they required the President to plainly bypass an act of Congress, the no-warrant wiretaps may be the sharpest expression yet of the Administration's willingness to expand the scope of Executive power."

Domestic Spying Efforts May Be More Widespread Than Previously Thought. U.S. News and World Report (1/9, Kaplan) reports, "A string of revelations in recent weeks suggests that domestic spying programs may be far broader than previously thought." Government officials "have offered spirited defenses" of these programs. They say these allegations of spying "have been misinterpreted and exaggerated," and they "insist that the public expects law enforcement and intelligence agencies to be aggressive in the age of terrorism. President Bush was unapologetic about the NSA's warrantless intercepts. … The FBI, too, has mounted a strong defense. No investigations are opened, officials say, unless there is 'specific information about a potential criminal or terrorist threat.' Mere mention of groups or individuals in an FBI file, agents say, does not mean they are under investigation."

Allegations Have Sparked Lawmakers Into Action. U.S. News and World Report (1/9, Kaplan) reports that "the mounting allegations of domestic spying have sparked widespread concern and prompted members of Congress to action, among them Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who chairs the Senate Judiciary Committee and who will convene hearings later this month. 'I want to know precisely what they did,' Specter said. 'How the NSA utilized their technical equipment, whose conversations they overheard, how many conversations they overheard, what they did with the material, what purported justification there was.' Democrat Rep. Robert Wexler is demanding documents on the Defense Department's secret monitoring program, part of a little-known agency called the Counterintelligence Field Activity."

Time (1/9, Lacayo) adds that "the House and Senate Intelligence Committees are almost certain to make deeper inquiries. Meanwhile, the Justice Department is launching an investigation of its own, into how word of the secret program was leaked." Justice officials "have refused to say whether the overall legality of the NSA program will also be investigated."

Bush Administration "Implored" NYTimes Editors Not To Publish Domestic Spying Story. Time (1/9, Ratnesar) reports on New York Times reporters James Risen and Eric Lichtblau, who broke the story "that the Bush Administration was running a covert domestic-spying program." It "took Risen more than a year to get the story into print -- and not before President Bush personally implored Times editors not to publish Risen and Lichtblau's account of how Bush authorized the National Security Agency to wiretap telephone and e-mail communications inside the US without court-sanctioned warrants." Time adds, "At the center of the article's backstory is Risen, who unsuccessfully pushed to publish the wiretap report last year, then took a leave to write a book, State of War: The Secret History of the CIA and the Bush Administration. It now appears he may pay a price for the disclosure: last Friday the Justice Department opened an investigation into who leaked the existence of the NSA program to the Times, raising the prospect of Risen's being compelled to reveal the identities of the 'nearly dozen' current and former officials who spoke to him about the program or face jail time for contempt of court."

Domestic Spying Debate Follows A "Predictable" Wartime Pattern. Newsweek (1/9, Thomas, Klaidman) reports in its cover story, "The current debate over national security and civil liberties is not new. It follows a predictable pattern of a democracy in wartime. … To understand the current struggle -- and judge how seriously to take the Bush and Cheney bids for power -- it is useful to compare this battle to all the balancing acts that have come before. The facts change, but the pattern varies little: In national crises, presidents reach for power." A president "will almost always choose to violate individual rights over the risk of losing a war." Newsweek adds, "Congress lies low and goes along. … Typically, in times of national peril, Congress gets swept along on a wave of patriotism. … The bureaucracy pushes back. … Though 'bureaucrat' can be a bad name, government careerists are sometimes the only ones who will uphold standards of fairness or decency. They know, too, that they can be left holding the bag if later congressional hearings look into dubious secret operations. … The public and the politicians react -- and overreact. Historically, wartime encroachments on civil liberties have spawned backlashes. … The American public may be less than sympathetic to the targets of the Bush antiterror crackdown. But if the administration is shown to have violated the civil liberties of mainstream peace groups or (heaven forbid!) members of the press, the outcry could produce an overreaction."

More Commentary. Columnist Ruth Marcus, meanwhile, writes in today's Washington Post (1/2) about Bush's domestic spying, and comments, "Perhaps, in the aftermath of Sept. 11, that's how the country wants its intelligence activities conducted." But "living on the edge inevitably risks falling off a cliff - especially if you choose to live there on your own and in secret." Marcus says "the need for legal checks, the importance of congressional oversight, the missteps that inevitably occur when the executive branch is accountable only to itself -- seem to have been ignored by all the parties involved. As Congress gears up for another needed round of hearings, the challenge is not only to discover what happened but also not to forget, again, what was already, painfully learned."

DOJ IG Finds Terror Specialists At US Attorney's Offices Failing To Coordinate. The Washington Times (1/3, Seper, 90K) reports that a report from the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General has concluded that "Intelligence specialists at the 93 US attorneys' offices assigned to identify terrorist activity and assist in prosecutions are not coordinating their efforts and lack guidance." According to the report, though the offices "have made 'valuable' individual contributions to counterterrorism efforts, their overall effectiveness needs to increase through improved coordination and guidance." The IG report "made eight recommendations to improve the use of the specialists, including identifying and providing the standard tools they should use, defining the types of results they should produce, and establishing the quality standards those results should meet. "

Former CIA Official Says Agency May Need A Decade To Build Up Anti-Terror Service. Reuters (1/2, Morgan) reports, "A former CIA counterterrorism officer who tracked Osama bin Laden through the mountains of Afghanistan says the U.S. spy agency could need a decade to build up its clandestine service for the U.S. war on terrorism." Gary Berntsen, "a decorated espionage officer who led a paramilitary unit code-named 'Jawbreaker' in the war that toppled the Taliban after the September 11 attacks," said CIA Director Porter Goss "faces an uphill battle to fill the agency's senior ranks with aggressive, seasoned operatives." Berntsen said in an interview, "He's probably more aggressive than most of the senior officers in the clandestine service. So I think he's having to pull them along a bit." Goss, he added, "is trying to improve the situation. But it's going to be tough. The rebuilding is going to take years. A decade, at least."

Experts Say Padilla Dispute Could Jeopardize Terror War. The Legal Times (1/2, Henning) reports, "This time, audacity may not pay off for Bush administration lawyers. …. Having aggressively — and in the view of their critics, arrogantly — pursued an expansive view of executive power since the start of the war on terrorism, they could see their plans derailed by an escalating skirmish over 'enemy combatant' Jose Padilla." The Times continues, "Last week was punctuated by another round, in a rancorous and highly unusual exchange between the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit and the Bush administration over the detention of Padilla, a U.S. citizen whose case is regarded as a crucial legal litmus test of anti-terrorism tactics. … In late November the government abruptly asked the appeals court to vacate a Sept. 9 decision granting President George W. Bush the right to detain indefinitely U.S. citizens as enemy combatants without charge or trial. It was a move that alienated one of the administration's most reliable judicial allies, the largely conservative 4th Circuit." The Times adds 'The administration's abandonment of its aggressive position in a case that it has touted as crucial to battling terrorists confounded outsiders and infuriated the judges who had previously given the White House a highly favorable ruling. … 'This is perhaps the most important constitutional litigation since September 11,' says Timothy Lynch, director of the Cato Institute's Project on Criminal Justice. 'They severely underestimated the reaction by the judiciary and other legal observers. Maybe they missed the forest for the trees and lost sight of how big this was, but this is going to hurt the credibility of the Justice Department in other terrorism cases.'"

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/2, McGough) reports, "It must have seemed like a good idea at the time. Fearful of another test of presidential power in the U.S. Supreme Court, the Bush administration in November decided to cut its losses and end the 3 1/2-year-long confinement of Jose Padilla as an 'enemy combatant.' .. Mr. Padilla, a Brooklyn-born convert to Islam, was arrested at Chicago's O'Hare Airport in May 2002 and was identified by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft as a participant in an al-Qaida plot to explode a radioactive 'dirty bomb' in the United States. A federal appeals court upheld his detention, but Mr. Padilla's lawyers appealed to the Supreme Court. … Then the Bush administration executed a legal U-turn. It secured an indictment of Mr. Padilla by a federal grand jury in Florida on terrorism charges unrelated to a 'dirty bomb,' announced that he would be transferred from a Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., to a civilian prison in Miami and asked the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond to vacate its decision upholding Mr. Padilla's confinement." The Post-Gazette adds, "The 4th Circuit, one of the administration's favorite tribunals, wouldn't play. It refused to vacate its order or approve of Mr. Padilla's transfer from military to civilian custody. In an opinion by Judge J. Michael Luttig, a conservative icon often mentioned as a possible Bush appointee to the Supreme Court, the 4th Circuit worried about 'an appearance that the government may be attempting to avoid consideration of our decision by the Supreme Court.' … Last week the administration shot back, demanding that the Supreme Court authorize Mr. Padilla's transfer. In a petition filed with the Supreme Court, Solicitor General Paul D. Clement fumed that 'the 4th Circuit's order defies both law and logic' and constituted an 'unwarranted attack' on President Bush's authority. Besides, Mr. Clement said, Mr. Padilla's lawyers hadn't objected to transferring their client. … It is true that in an earlier filing with the 4th Circuit, Mr. Padilla's attorneys had indicated that they wouldn't object to the transfer because they could continue to challenge Mr. Padilla's designation as an enemy combatant. But last week they took a different tack. … The battle of the briefs between the government and Mr. Padilla's lawyers turns on the proper interpretation of a federal court rule that says prisoners seeking a writ of habeas corpus -- as Mr. Padilla is doing -- ordinarily can't be transferred from one jailer to another. But the larger issue in the turf war between the 4th Circuit and the Bush administration is the same one raised in Mr. Padilla's original legal challenge: the scope of presidential power in the 'war on terror.'"

WPost Comments On Changing Government Tactics In The Padilla Case. The Washington Post (1/2) editorializes, "Just when it appeared the case of accused enemy combatant Jose Padilla couldn't get any weirder, the two parties have switched sides. In an emergency brief filed before the Supreme Court last week, the Justice Department asked the justices to step in and allow the government to transfer Mr. Padilla immediately from military to civilian custody so that he can face the criminal charges recently filed against him. This is the same Justice Department that had been arguing for 3 1/2 years that Mr. Padilla could be held without charge on President Bush's order as an al Qaeda fighter - for much of that time without even having access to his lawyers. … The government is now seeking to release Mr. Padilla from his legal limbo, and Mr. Padilla is objecting."

US Said To Be Underutilizing Arab, Muslim Community In War On Terror. Randa Fahmy Hudome, former associate deputy energy secretary in the Bush administration, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/3, A24, 2.11M) writes that while the US government "has focused on the vital national security challenges posed in the post-9/11 environment -- challenges in law enforcement, intelligence gathering and public diplomacy," there is "an untapped resource in all 50 states that can provide insight into many of these challenges -- the American Arab and Muslim community." However, "they have been underutilized on the frontlines of the global war on terror. While President Bush has appointed more Arab- and Muslim-Americans to senior positions than any previous administration, the rest of the government has been slow to follow his lead." Fahmy Hudome states, "The Department of State should create an Arab- and Muslim-American Advisory Board -- made up of experts who reflect the religious, ethnic and geographic diversity of the Middle East -- to advise the US government about issues, sensitivities, perceptions and misperceptions both here and abroad."

Administration Action On Hamadi Release Called Inadequate. Ken Stethem, brother of US Navy Diver Robert Stethem, who was murdered during the 1985 TWA hijacking, was asked on MSNBC's Scarborough Country (1/2), why he wrote to the Bush Administration complaining about the release by German authorities of Mohammed Ali Hamadi, who was convicted of the murder. Stethem said, "We're absolutely unsatisfied with the indifference and the action that they took upon Hamadi's release. … We've gotten two phone calls, one from Andrew Card, wishing us well and saying he's sorry. And then we got one from [State Department Counterterrorism Coordinator] Ambassador [Henry] Crumpton…saying basically the same thing." Stethem went on to say he has not "heard anything" from Congress, "and it's unbelievable." When asked what the Administration's response to his requests has been, Stethem said, "Nothing! We've been trying to get meetings with Condoleezza Rice in the State Department, through the Justice Department since May. And we've not been given the opportunity once. … It's incredible, just incredible to see the president soliciting support for the war on terrorism, the same week that Hamadi is released and the Administration knew about his impending release while the president was preparing that speech."

PATRIOT ACT:

White House To Step Up Defense Of Patriot Act, NSA Surveillance. The Financial Times (1/3, Daniel) reports the White House "will this week step up efforts to defend its policy on the Patriot Act as well as its controversial decision to conduct domestic surveillance on US citizens without a warrant from a judge, in the face of mounting concerns from civil liberties groups." President Bush "began the counter-offensive with a strong defence of his decision in 2001 to authorise the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on those suspected of links to al-Qaeda and of his legal authority to prosecute the war on terror." On Tuesday, Bush "will take part in a meeting on the Patriot Act, the anti-terrorism legislation that Congress failed to renew before the Christmas break. On Wednesday he will make a statement on the 'war on terror' at the Pentagon." As "part of a co-ordinated approach, Dick Cheney, vice-president, will also give a speech about terrorism."

DOJ_NMG_0141848

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff To Announce Changes To Homeland Security Grant Program. Several media outlets this morning are reporting on the upcoming announcement of changes to the Urban Area Security Initiative. The AP indicates that Secretary Chertoff has sought the changes, while the New York Times notes that he is prepared for some negative response. The New York Times (1/3, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "Facing cuts in antiterrorism financing, the Department of Homeland Security plans to announce today that it will evaluate new requests for money from an $800 million aid program for cities based less on politics and more on assessments of where terrorists are likely to strike and potentially cause the greatest damage, department officials say. The changes to the program, the Urban Area Security Initiative, are being driven in part by a reduction in the overall pool of money for antiterrorism efforts." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who is to announce the shift, said in a speech last month that "the changes he was considering would require an acknowledgment that the nation could not protect itself against all risks." DHS officials "would not offer predictions of what the likely outcome would be in terms of how many cities would see their grants eliminated or cut significantly." Meanwhile, "Mr. Chertoff has made clear that he expects protests when the final grant awards are announced."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/3, A4) reports, "The change…addresses both the destruction and lack of preparedness seen during Hurricane Katrina. It also reflects…Chertoff's efforts to give his department an all-hazards mission -- even though it was created as a direct result of the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks." The AP notes, "Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke would not comment on which cities will be eligible for grants this year." A longer version of the AP (1/2, Jordan) story noted, "Calls to city officials around the country and to the US Conference of Mayors for comment were not immediately returned."

Under the headline "More Cities Eligible For Urban Grants, USA Today (1/3, 2.31M) reported, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff will announce today which cities will receive part of $765 million in annual Urban Area Security Initiative grants. In past years, the grants have gone to the nation's 50 largest cities for terror-related security measures. This year, cities that risk being hit by a natural disaster or health crisis also are eligible."

DHS Issues Manual On Correspondence For Employees. In its "Verbatim" column, the Washington Post (1/3, A15, 744K) runs a portion of "a new manual for correspondence standards and procedures" sent out by Fred Schwien, the Department of Homeland Security's executive secretary. The portion is headlined, "4.3 Statement of Lateness (Note: Not in use until on or about Feb 1, 2006)," and reads, "If a component response does not meet the five-day deadline for returning correspondence to the ES, a statement of lateness is required. … Workload and component priorities are not valid excuses. As stated previously, for the DHS employee tasked with preparing an item for the Secretary or Deputy Secretary signature, there are few, if any, higher priorities."

Deadline Extended For Evacuees To Leave Hotels. Federal officials have extended the deadline for Hurricane Katrina evacuees to check out of their government-funded hotel rooms. The AP (1/3, McGill) reports that the extension comes as the feds "iron out issues arising from a class-action lawsuit. One issue: The Federal Emergency Management Agency, which inherited the program from the American Red Cross, still does not have up-to-date records on the identities of evacuees in the hotel program or where they are staying, according to court papers filed last week by government lawyers. Under a federal judge's ruling last month, FEMA is required to keep the hotel program running until Feb. 7. However, U.S. District Judge Stanwood Duval said FEMA could stop paying for hotel rooms beginning Jan. 7 — Saturday — for evacuees who have been approved or disapproved for other FEMA housing aid, such as a trailer or rental assistance. Now, the Jan. 7 date no longer holds, according to a flier being distributed to hotels in the program. It says: 'The program will continue for all evacuees in all states until further notice pending the resolution of certain issues now in litigation.'" levees that protected the Chalmette, Louisiana "gave way to Hurricane Katrina on Aug. 29, about 1,800 homes were inundated with floodwaters carrying nearly 1.1 million gallons of oil from a nearby refinery. Thick black crude seeped into homes and yards. Officials sealed off the area. A private contractor hired by the refinery's owner, Murphy Oil Corp. of El Dorado, Ark., began cleaning up. But the crews left most homes and yards untouched for weeks until Murphy Oil could track down their scattered owners to seek permission to clean them, the oil company says. Four months after Katrina hit, oil remains in hundreds of homes and yards. This heavily damaged community, which remains mostly abandoned, raises acute personal and public-policy questions: How can residents displaced by Katrina determine if it's safe to return to their homes, and when? And who ultimately should decide?" The Journal notes that "neither federal nor state nor local officials have provided residents with any clear answers. Parish leaders and residents say they expected the federal Environmental Protection Agency to manage the cleanup process and determine when the neighborhood was safe. But the EPA says it's not up to it to decide whether the community should be resettled."

I-10 Repairs Cited As An Example For All Gulf Coast Rebuilding Projects. The New York Times (1/3, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports that while the repair of the twin spans of Interstate 10 over Louisiana's Lake Pontchartrain "has gone unusually right, coming in ahead of time and under budget. By cannibalizing one bridge to fix the other, and then using temporary steel spans to fix the first bridge, the State of Louisiana and the contractor were able to open one span in October and plan to have traffic flowing on the other as early as Jan. 6, nearly two weeks ahead of schedule." The Times adds that following Katrina, "one of the highest priorities was getting the Interstate open, and doing so quickly required creative thinking, dedication and no small amount of luck. … The work was financed by the Federal Highway Administration, which advised Louisiana on the project. Norman Y. Mineta, the federal transportation secretary, said through a spokeswoman that the project was 'serving as a model for the kinds of efficiencies we should try to achieve in all gulf rebuilding projects.'"

Local Gulf Coast Contractors Feel Cut Out Of Katrina Cleanup. The CBS Evening News (1/1, story 7, Roberts) reported, "In the months since Hurricane Katrina hit, Federal agencies have poured billions of dollars into the battered gulf region. But in Mississippi, Bill Whitaker heard complaints from local contractors who say few of those dollars have come their way." CBS (Whitaker) added, "Big players like Ashbritt of Pompano Beach, Florida, awarded a Federal contract worth $500 million and others like Bechtel and Halliburton subsidiary Kellog Brown and Root got contracts for tens of millions dollars more." Socrates Garrett: "And the network of good old boys were already in place." Whitaker: "Socrates Garrett's company is the biggest in Mississippi yet trucks and workers he has in place sit idle." Garrett: "If we can't work then you can bet that other smaller minority firms don't even have a chance." Whitaker: "Mississippi Congressman Thompson says his state's businesses are suffering because FEMA and the Army Corps of Engineers and other Federal agencies responsible for cleanup are playing politics." Rep. Bennie Thompson: "Those are the contracts that have gone to companies that were well connected, had the right lobbyists, contributed to the right party in power." Whitaker: "Ashbritt says it wasn't politics but hard work that won the contracts." Randal Perkins, Ashbritt: "At the end of the day if you're not qualified and capable and ready to handle the challenge given to you you're not getting the contract." Whitaker: "He says most of Ashbritt's subcontracts have gone to Mississippi companies, but Congressman Thompson says they're getting the dregs, the little jobs and little of the Federal money. Mississippi's Republican governor agrees." Gov. Haley Barbour: "We don't think there's a high enough percentage of the work going to local contractors. There's some, unquestionably, but we think there needs to be more."

Nagin Says New Orleans Could Take Three To Five Years To Regain Population. The AP (1/2) reports, "New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin yesterday said it could take three to five years to regain the city's population of nearly half a million before Hurricane Katrina. Mr. Nagin said on CBS' Face the Nation that reopening several public and private schools this month would help raise New Orleans' population to about 200,000, double the current level, as families returned with their children. Shortages of suitable housing would limit further growth over the near term, he said."

Emergency Officials Include Animal Rescue In Emergency Plans. The Washington Post (1/2, B1, Wan) reports on the "merging field of disaster planning for pets, filled with doomsday scenarios, four-legged victims and people who love them. For years, despite an estimated 69 million U.S. households with a pet, animal advocates have been relegated to the fringes of emergency planning. After Katrina, however, and the sight of people in New Orleans refusing to evacuate and in some cases dying with their pets, emergency officials are starting to take animal rescue seriously. By saving the pets, advocates said, owners can be saved as well." The Post adds, "The concept is as old as Noah's Ark, but modern pet disaster planning didn't truly begin, U.S. experts said, until after Hurricane Andrew in 1992.

When Andrew tore through South Florida, it killed more than 100 animals in the Miami Metrozoo. Hundreds of others, including baboons, antelope and 500-pound Galapagos tortoises, wandered off through the rubble. Escaped horses drowned in canals. … After Andrew, the federal government created Veterinary Medical Assistance Teams, to be deployed wherever animal-threatening disasters hit. The 1992 hurricane also prompted the Humane Society to establish a department devoted to disaster planning and rescue."

Gulf Coast Seeing Puppy Boom Following Hurricane Katrina. The Washington Post (1/3, A10, Reeves, 744K) reports on a boom in the birth of puppies in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. According to the Post, "Officials say more than 6,000 pets were saved in the region after Katrina came ashore Aug. 29, and many of them were relocated to new homes elsewhere in the country. An unknown number drowned in the floodwaters or died later of injuries. But thousands of animals remain, and humane organizations are beginning to see the result of even small numbers of animals running loose for weeks in neighborhoods where fences were flattened and owners fled.'

Charleston Post & Courier Lauds FBI's Nuclear Monitoring. The Charleston (SC) Post & Courier (1/3) editorializes, "A federal program to monitor radiation levels has quietly sought to defuse one of the greatest terror threats to the nation. Radiation surveillance seeks to diminish the likelihood that terrorists could set off a so-called "dirty bomb" containing radioactive material or, worse, detonate a nuclear explosive." The P&C continues, "The program was recently reported on the Web site of U.S. News & World report, and confirmed by federal officials. It hasn't received the same media attention as electronic eavesdropping and other forms of domestic spying, though it has been criticized by some Muslim groups who feel they are being targeted." The P&C adds, "Radioactivity monitors have been installed at a variety of public locations, including ports and subways since 9/11. There should be no reluctance to use passive monitoring as broadly as is warranted. … Monitoring potential sources of radioactivity by 'sniffing the air' clearly doesn't raise the same issues of privacy as wiretapping. Keeping radioactive material out of the hands of potential terrorists is essential to national security and public safety."

WAR NEWS:

Shiites, Kurds May Drop Allawi From Coalition, Give Sunnis Role. The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Daragahi, 958K) reports, "The victors in last month's parliamentary election indicated Monday that they were prepared to cut a secular politician backed by Washington out of the new government in favor of Iraq's main Sunni Arab slate. The pro-Western politician, former interim Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, did poorly in the Dec. 15 balloting despite spending heavily on a sleek television campaign." The Times adds that "the emerging political alliance lumps together Shiites, Kurds and Islamist Sunni Arabs — and excludes secular Iraqis, hard-core Sunni Arab nationalists and those sympathetic to the Baath Party of ex-dictator Saddam Hussein."

USA Today/AP (1/3) adds "Iraq's main Sunni Arab group made an unprecedented trip north to see Kurd leaders and agreed Monday for the first time on broad outlines for a coalition government." The move "opens a way out of the political turmoil that has gripped the country since disputed parliamentary elections Dec. 15." The agreement "struck by Kurdistan regional President Massoud Barzani and representatives of the main Sunni Arab group, the Iraqi Accordance Front, could lead to a broad-based government." The Accordance Front "will be part of a future government," said Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, "a Kurd who sat in on the meetings."

The New York Times (1/3, Oppel Jr., 1.19M) also reports on the "broad framework for a coalition government," which "drew a rebuke from other Sunni Arab political leaders who accused the Sunni consensus party of violating an agreement to press ahead with claims of Sunni disenfranchisement during the vote on Dec. 15 and to not bargain on their own for a role in the new government."

Despite Poor Election Results, Chalabi Could Play Key Role. Knight Ridder (1/3, Hannah, Youssef) reports, "Even though Ahmad Chalabi apparently lost badly in last month's parliamentary election here, the former Pentagon favorite is still likely to be a big player in the next Iraqi government." The Dec. 15 vote "went largely to ethnic and sectarian coalitions at the expense of secular slates, including his, preliminary returns indicate. That could leave him without a seat in parliament." Yet "the former exile who helped spur the US-led invasion by feeding false intelligence to Washington about Saddam Hussein's alleged weapons of mass destruction, and who returned to Iraq after Saddam's fall to craft himself into a political leader, still has more cards to play. Characteristically, Chalabi, 61, could land on his feet in a high government post even though he failed to win even a minimum of votes from the Iraqi people."

Iraq Facing Fuel Crisis As Oil Minister Quits. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 8, :30, Holt) reported, "There are growing concerns tonight about an oil crisis in Iraq. Fuel prices for Iraqi citizens are way up, supplies are growing scarce and new numbers out today show Iraq's oil exports hit their lowest levels since the war. Today, Iraq's oil minister quit." The AP (1/3, Juhi) adds "Iraq's exports of oil hit their lowest level in December since the war, as the country's oil minister resigned Monday in the wake of protests and riots over soaring gas prices and lengthening lines at the pump. Only 34.4 million barrels were exported in December, or about 1.1 million barrels per day," which was "the lowest average since Iraq resumed exports after the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, according to figures released Monday." The Washington Post (1/3, A12, Hernandez, 744K) also reports the story.

Twelve Iraqis Killed In Insurgent Attacks. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 8, :30, Holt) reported, "At least 12 people, including two children, were killed in violence today. In the worst incident, a suicide bomber rammed his car into a bus full of Iraqi policemen, killing seven and injuring 13." The CBS Evening News (1/02, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "No American deaths were reported in Iraq today but insurgent violence killed at least a dozen Iraqis."

The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Daragahi, 958K) reports the US military also "reported the deaths of four American civilian contractors involved in a motor vehicle accident on the Asad Air Base in western Iraq on Sunday. Nineteen others, including a Marine, were also injured when their bus was struck by a 7-ton truck, the military said."

Iraqi Volunteer Buries Unclaimed Bodies Of Those Slain In Violence. The CBS Evening News (1/02, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported on the "story of a remarkable man who has devoted himself to honoring the dead, no matter who they were." CBS (Alfonsi) added on Sheikh Jamal-al Sudani's effort to bury the unclaimed bodies of about 250 of those killed in insurgent attacks. Al-Sudani "and his group of volunteers aren't paid. They do this grim job, they say, solely for God's rewards." The "group drives the bodies from Baghdad to Najaf through Iraq. The final stop is the Valley Cemetery, a holy place because a number of prophets are buried there and a practical place because the loose soil makes it easy to bury so many bodies. The bodies of Sunnis, Shiites, Muslims and Christians are all carefully washed and wrap." Terrorists "want to kill him because he cares for the victim of their suicide attacks others because he buries the suicide bombers but he is no stranger to threats. He's been doing this work for 15 years."

Poll Finds Support Among Military For Bush Policies Drops To 60%. Agence France-Presse (1/3) reports, "Support for President George W. Bush's Iraq policy has fallen among the US armed forces to just 54 percent from 63 percent a year ago, according to a poll by the magazine group Military Times. In its annual survey of the views of military personnel, the group reported on its website that support for Bush's overall policies dropped over the past year to 60 percent from 71 percent." AFP adds, "While still significantly more supportive of the president than the broad US population, the fall in support by military personnel tracks a similar decline in the president's popularity among the general public."

Murtha Says He Wouldn't Join Military Today. Reuters (1/3) reports, "Rep. John Murtha, a key Democratic voice who favors pulling U.S. troops from Iraq, said in remarks airing on Monday that he would not join the US military today. A decorated Vietnam combat veteran who retired as a colonel after 37 years in the U.S. Marine Corps, Murtha told ABC News' 'Nightline' program that Iraq 'absolutely' was a wrong war for President George W. Bush to have launched." "Would you join (the military) today?," he was asked in an interview taped on Friday. He replied, "No." The interviewer retorted, "And I think you're saying the average guy out there who's considering recruitment is justified in saying 'I don't want to serve.'" Said Murtha, "Exactly right."

On ABC News Nightline (1/2), Murtha said the Administration "got awful lot of bad information" about the situation in Iraq because "they don't talk to Congress. … They don't listen to people with experience." When asked if President Bush "doesn't really know what's going on" in Iraq, Murtha said, "Yes, that's what happens. The President mischaracterizes things because he gets bad information." In the run-up to the Gulf War, former President Bush "would get all kinds of criticism from Democrats and Republicans, and he would patiently listen to it, and then do what he thought was right." The American public "is way ahead of this president. If they think they're fooling the public with their rhetoric, they're wrong. You can't operate that way in today's world. … The American people want to see a clear mission, they want to see an exit strategy."

Father Calls Son's Death In Iraq "A Waste." Paul E. Schroeder, managing director of a trade development firm in Cleveland, writes in the Washington Post (1/3, A17, 744K), "Early on Aug. 3, 2005, we heard that 14 Marines had been killed in Haditha, Iraq. Our son, Lance Cpl. Edward 'Augie' Schroeder II, was stationed there. At 10:45 a.m. two Marines showed up at our door. After collecting himself for what was clearly painful duty, the lieutenant colonel said, 'Your son is a true American hero.' … I am outraged at what I see as the cause of his death. For nearly three years, the Bush administration has pursued a policy that makes our troops sitting ducks. While Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that our policy is to 'clear, hold and build' Iraqi towns, there aren't enough troops to do that. … Though it hurts, I believe that his death -- and that of the other Americans who have died in Iraq -- was a waste" if "Americans stop hiding behind flag-draped hero masks and stop whispering their opposition to this war. Until then, the lives of other sons, daughters, husbands, wives, fathers and mothers may be wasted as well. This is very painful to acknowledge, and I have to live with it. So does President Bush."

Abizaid Optimistic About Turning Control Over To Iraqi Government.

USA Today (1/3, Komarow, 2.31M) reports, "The top US general in the Iraq region says he is optimistic the United States will succeed this year in turning a substantial part of the country over to Iraqi government control, moving US forces into a backup role. The ability of Iraq's military to secure the country is a key condition for the eventual withdrawal of US forces." In an interview this weekend, Gen. John Abizaid, who "was on a short visit to Iraq, prodded his subordinates to turn control of their sectors over to Iraqi forces as soon as the Iraqis are ready. U.S. commanders must overcome their reluctance to turn over control to less-experienced Iraqi forces, Abizaid said." Said Abizaid, "Look, there is always a risk in taking a chance on the people that you've come to help. … There's also a risk of condescension (where) you look at them and say, 'They're not ready.'" Abizaid, "head of US Central Command, declined to speculate on what American troop levels will be at the end of 2006."

Administration Boosts Peacekeeping, Post-War Capabilities. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, King Jr., Jaffe, 2.11M) reports, "The difficulties of rebuilding Iraq after toppling Saddam Hussein have taught President Bush a painful lesson: Aftermaths can be tougher than wars. Now the administration is trying to recalibrate the military and foreign service to better handle postwar developments in future conflicts. For the first time, the Pentagon has declared that, along with battling foes, the ability to foster stability and reconstruction is one of its core missions." The Administration also "planted the seed for a corps of trained nation builders in 2004 when it created an Office of the Coordinator for Reconstruction and Stabilization in the State Department. The 55-person shop is staffed largely by officials on loan from the Defense Department, the Central Intelligence Agency and other agencies. It tries to anticipate the next global hot spot -- be it Sudan or North Korea -- and prepares to deploy as the main US postwar coordinator wherever a need might arise." However, "with finances tight, Congress isn't rushing to budget the money. One senior Pentagon official says he has heard objections from both Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill. Their worry: elevating the importance of nation-building will, over time, divert funds from the nation's ability to wage all-out war and leave the military less prepared to counter an unexpected major threat from a country such as China. And legislators in both parties are wary of more Iraq-style adventures."

Budget Request To Include No New Iraq Rebuilding Funds.

The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports, "The US and its key foreign allies are likely to fall short of their funding pledges to help rebuild Iraq, as violence in the war-torn country absorbs contributions and deters nations from making new ones. T he reconstruction shortfall may total one-third of promised funds, adding to the challenges for Iraq's next government." The White House and "some US lawmakers have made clear that this year they want Iraqi security forces to take the lead in combating the insurgency, laying the groundwork for a gradual US military withdrawal." The new year also "marks a turning point in the administration's goal to rebuild Iraq -- an effort that has had mixed success." The Journal adds, "The $18.4 billion US rebuilding program was established with a three-year term that expires in the fall, and lawmakers -- mindful of contractor overcharges, corruption and security issues that have surfaced -- have made clear that they are unwilling to authorize a follow-up program. The budget request for Fiscal Year 2007 that the White House sends Congress next month will include no new Iraq rebuilding money, according to an official familiar with the matter. News that the White House won't seek Iraq reconstruction funds for fiscal 2007 was reported earlier by the Washington Post."

Book Claims CIA Ignored Information That Iraq Had No WMD.

The AP (1/3) reports, "A new book on the government's secret anti-terrorism operations describes how the CIA recruited an Iraqi-American anesthesiologist in 2002 to obtain information from her brother, who was a figure in Saddam Hussein's nuclear program." Dr. Sawsan Alhaddad of Cleveland "made the dangerous trip to Iraq on the CIA's behalf. The book said her brother was stunned by her questions about the nuclear program because -- he said -- it had been dead for a decade." New York Times reporter James Risen "uses the anecdote to illustrate how the CIA ignored information that Iraq no longer had weapons of mass destruction. His book, 'State of War: The Secret History of the CIA and the Bush Administration' describes secret operations of the Bush administration's war on terrorism." The major revelation in the book "has already been the subject of extensive reporting by Risen's newspaper: the National Security Agency's eavesdropping of Americans' conversations without obtaining warrants from a special court." The book said Dr. Alhaddad "flew home in mid-September 2002 and had a series of meetings with CIA analysts. She relayed her brother's information that there was no nuclear program. A CIA operative later told Dr. Alhaddad's husband that the agency believed her brother was lying."

Clinton Administration Said Saddam Was Reconstituting His WMD. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (1/3, 90K) excerpts the State Department's Daily Press Briefing of November 10, 1998 in which then-Assistant Secretary of State James Rubin said, "[T]his can't go on indefinitely; that if Saddam [Hussein] continues to block UNSCOM and we do not respond, he will be able to reconstitute his weapons of mass destruction in a matter of months, not a matter of years. This is a dangerous situation; this is why we have considered it a grave situation. If we fail to act, he will feel emboldened to threaten the region further, armed, possibly, with the most dangerous kinds of weapons."

Saddam Says He Prefers To Be Shot If Sentenced To Death. The Washington Times (1/3, Martin, 90K) reports, "Saddam Hussein has told his lawyers that he wants to be shot by firing squad, not hanged, if sentenced to death during his murder trial, which resumes later this month in Baghdad." Saddam "maintains that he is still commander in chief of Iraq's armed forces -- and that a firing squad is 'the right way' to execute a military leader."

US Teen Returns Home From Winter Vacation Trip To Baghdad. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 11, 1:50, Holt) reported 16-year-old Farris Hassan is "returned home last night from his ill-advised solo journey to Iraq. And it's not just his mom who wants answers." NBC (Sanders) added, "Maybe it's a sign of the times when a 16-year-old tells his family he's more nervous about facing the US media than traveling to a war zone. But he may have good reason after his arrival at Miami International Airport last night. He certainly appeared self-assured late this afternoon." Farris Hassan: "Yes. Right now, I came back and I'm pretty tired and I'm preparing my statement this time." Sanders: "Today, it was Farris' day off. He says he'll talk the details about his trip tomorrow." Hassan "reportedly told selected friends he gone to Iraq to witness democracy in progress. But after talking to the Associated Press there, the US Embassy told him he couldn't make any more statements." USA Today (1/3, Koch, 2.31M) and New York Times/AP (1/3), among others, also report the story.

Magazine Notes Iraq War Game Staging Ground In Louisiana. The Washington Post (1/3, C1, Carlson, 744K) reports Harper's magazine "has found a big, heartwarming silver lining inside that gloomy old Global War on Terrorism. Here it is: Our government has hired a bunch of poor souls who lost their arms and legs in accidents and has rigged them up with bags of fake blood so they can play wounded civilians in war games down at Fort Polk, La." Cubic, "the defense contractor that produces these games, has also hired 250 Arabic-speaking immigrants at $220 a day as 'Cultural Role Players' in the war games. They've also hired hundreds of local Louisianans to play random Arab civilians, plus 'dozens of scriptwriters' to come up with realistic scenarios for the war games." Wells Tower, "author of this jaw-droppingly bizarre article," said, "The military spends an average of $9 million staging each 3 1/2 -week mission rehearsal exercise," which "works out to about $117 million a year." That "doesn't include the $49 million spent constructing the state-of-the-art fake city of Suliyah, which contains 29 buildings."

US Giving NATO, Allies Growing Role In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (1/3, A1, Witte, 744K) reports, "Four years into a mammoth reconstruction effort here that has been largely led, funded and secured by Americans, the United States is showing a growing willingness to cede those jobs to others. The most dramatic example will come by this summer, when the US military officially hands over control of the volatile southern region -- plagued by persistent attacks from Islamic militias -- to an international force led by the NATO alliance." The United States "will cut its troop strength by 2,500, even though it is not clear how aggressively NATO troops will pursue insurgents, who have shown no sign of relenting." The Post ads, "At the same time, the U.S. government is increasingly allowing Western allies, or Afghans themselves, to take on the tasks of rebuilding a country that has suffered more than two decades of fighting and remains beset by poverty, drugs and insurgency."

Bush Awards Purple Hearts To Soldiers Wounded In Iraq. The Houston Chronicle (1/2, Hedges) reports, "President Bush's first official act of the new year was pinning Purple Hearts on US soldiers wounded in Iraq, a signal that for the White House, 2006 would be another year dominated by the war." The President "gave the military award to nine soldiers during a private session today with veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan and some family members at the Brooke Army Medical Center." The soldiers "were among more than 2,300 wounded service members treated there since the beginning of the two wars, and Bush took note of their plight as he restated his reasons for the unpopular Iraq war." Said Bush, "There's horrible consequences to war -- that's what you see in this building. … On the other hand, we also see (soldiers) who say, 'I'd like to go back in, Mr. President, what we're doing is the right thing,' because many of these troops understand that by defeating the enemy there, we don't have to face them here. And they understand that by helping the country and the Middle East become a democracy, we are, in fact, laying the foundation for future peace."

ranch in Crawford and flew more than an hour to Randolph Air Force Base. His motorcade drove to Brooke Army Medical Center, a 224-bed hospital at nearby Fort Sam Houston, to meet with about 50 injured members of various branches of the armed forces and their families." Said Bush, "This hospital is full of healers and compassionate people that care deeply about our men and women in uniform. … It's also full of courageous young soldiers and marines, airmen. I'm just overwhelmed by the great strength of character of not only those who have been wounded but of their loved ones as well."

Reuters (1/2) adds Bush "returned to Washington later in the day to tackle his agenda for 2006, another year in which the Iraq war is expected to be a dominating factor with critics calling for US troops to withdraw." The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Chen) also mentions Bush's visit.

As 2006 Begins, Bush's Focus Is On Economy, Iraq, War On Terror. According to the AP (1/2, Riechmann), President Bush is starting 2006 trumpeting upturns in the US economy, defending US actions in Iraq and challenging critics of his policies in the war on terror. The AP adds, "White House officials hope this week sets the tone for its top priorities as Bush visits the Pentagon on Wednesday to discuss the war on terror and then flies to Chicago on Friday to try to convince Americans that the economy is on solid footing." On Sunday, Bush visited wounded US troops in San Antonio, and this week, he will use "the backdrop of the White House to meet with a bipartisan group of former secretaries of state and defense to discuss terrorism and Iraq and to surround himself with U.S. attorneys to pressure lawmakers to renew the Patriot Act."

Brownstein Compares Bush, Polk Presidencies. Ron Brownstein writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/2), "The president whom George W. Bush may resemble most is not his biological father, George H.W. Bush, or even Ronald Reagan, who often seems his ideological father, but James K. Polk, a dynamic and willful leader few discuss anymore. … Polk may be the only predecessor who matched Bush's determination to drive massive change on a minute margin of victory. Polk won by fewer than 38,000 votes of 2.7 million cast. Over four tumultuous years, he pursued an ambitious, highly partisan agenda that offered little to those who had voted against him. Sound familiar? … It's worth considering Polk's record not because Americans will take up arms against each other anytime soon — although you might never know that from listening to talk radio — but because it suggests that a president who slights the need to build national consensus can seed long-term problems that aren't immediately apparent amid short-term successes."

Bush Will Not Ask Congress For Additional Iraq Reconstruction Funding. The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Knickmeyer), in a front-page article, reports that the Bush administration "does not intend to seek any new funds for Iraq reconstruction in the budget request going before Congress in February, officials say. The decision signals the winding down of an $18.4 billion US rebuilding effort in which roughly half of the money was eaten away by the insurgency, a buildup of Iraq's criminal justice system and the investigation and trial of Saddam Hussein. … US officials in Baghdad have made clear, other foreign donors and the fledgling Iraqi government will have to take up what authorities say is tens of billions of dollars of work yet to be done merely to bring reliable electricity, water and other services to Iraq's 26 million people."

Army Officer Shows Off Baghdad Reconstruction Projects. The Washington Post (1/2, A10, Knickmeyer) traveled around Baghdad with Maj. John Hudson of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers on a tour his "Prides and joys," the many reconstruction projects going on in the city. At "an Army Corps of Engineers office in the Green Zone -- the fortified site of much of the Iraqi government -- Hudson, in flak jacket and helmet, spread his hands lovingly on a map of Baghdad. 'Two youth centers. Two fire stations -- those are in some of your poorer neighborhoods. Baghdad highway patrol. A facility for the SWAT team. A new perimeter wall for Doura,' a power plant in Baghdad's insurgency-ridden south. A checkpoint on a southern road into the city. An electrical substation. … The projects are among 90 under his domain and among 3,600 projects in an $18.4 billion reconstruction package for Iraq due to peak, and be completed, this year." The Post adds, "Hudson will return to Colorado Springs around March. Money for the U.S. reconstruction package here is scheduled to run out around the end of the year. International donors largely have not kept their pledges to pick up the tab for reconstruction. Iraqis have balked at the painful economic reforms necessary to win foreign loans to do the work. Insurgents want to destroy it all. Civil war would do the same."

DOJ:

New Maryland US Attorney Restructures Staff, Targets Violent Crime. The Baltimore Sun (1/2, Dolan) reports, "Maryland's top federal prosecutor is both expanding his office and reorganizing his staff to emphasize a commitment to fighting violent crime." The Sun continues, "Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said he would start this month by restructuring his criminal division. It's part of an effort, he said, to coordinate better with local and federal law enforcement agents. … 'I had a meeting with the FBI's public corruption unit, and there was a real question of where that responsibility lay in our office,' Rosenstein said. 'It's a question of accountability.' The Sun adds, "Starting this year, federal prosecutors handling criminal cases in Baltimore will be required to focus on either terrorism and national security, fraud and public corruption, violent crime, drugs or major crimes - a catch-all section including civil rights violations and child pornography. They'll be expected to stay in their subjects for at least two years, Rosenstein said. … The division's managers have all been asked to reapply for their jobs, he added. … Five months into the job, the moves come as Rosenstein has established a reputation as a genial and intense leader known for his thoroughness and his prolific e-mails to his staff. … James Wyda, the federal public defender for Maryland, praised Rosenstein for his new hires and complimented the quality of his staff. … But Wyda also cautioned that Rosenstein is early in his tenure. He said Rosenstein would be judged, in part, on how he handles the substantial number of capital murder cases that have been transferred into the federal system in Maryland."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Attorneys For CA Defendants Claim US Misusing Sarbanes-Oxley. The Legal Times (1/2, Perrotta) reports, "Attorneys representing two former executives of Computer Associates, the Long Island, N.Y., company caught up in a massive accounting scandal, argued last week that federal prosecutors are misusing a criminal statute revised as part of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, possibly leading to severe prison sentences — up to 20 years — that were not intended by federal legislators." The Times continues, "The dispute involves the prosecution of Sanjay Kumar, the former chairman and CEO of Computer Associates, and Stephen Richards, a former sales executive, on various fraud and obstruction charges. Federal prosecutors accuse both men of lying to the government and lying to their company's outside counsel, Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz, which was conducting an internal investigation of the company's accounting practices." The Times adds, "Kumar and Richards are in a fight over the meaning of a federal criminal statute that was amended as part of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. … While defense attorneys argue that the SOX revisions have created a narrow statute that applies only to physical evidence, such as documents, the government contends it reaches beyond that to include any conduct that could obstruct an official proceeding."

Milberg Weiss Worried About Indicted Attorney's Actions. The California Recorder (1/3, Scheck) reports, "Nearly 12 years ago, an internal memo from the Southern California firm Best Best & Krieger expressed concerns that it was acting as a conduit for legally questionable payments from the plaintiff firm Milberg Weiss to Seymour Lazar, the lead plaintiff in dozens of securities class actions." The Recorder continues, "The memo, filed in court by prosecutors last week, expresses particular worry about the Best firm recording payments from the firm then known as Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach to Lazar as firm income, which would then be secretly credited to Lazar for future legal services. … 'To us it just smells bad,' the memo says, 'and probably would to an investigator.'" The Recorder adds, "That concern came to fruition in June, when Lazar and his attorney, Paul Selzer -- a former partner at the Best firm -- were indicted by a Los Angeles federal grand jury for allegedly taking more than $2 million in illegal kickbacks from Milberg Weiss. … The L.A. U.S. Attorney's Office has spent the past five years probing whether Milberg Weiss -- which split in 2004 when star partner William Lerach broke off to form his own San Diego-based firm -- paid illegal kickbacks to lead plaintiffs in class actions. … After several years of investigation with few public developments, the Lazar and Selzer indictments were widely seen as an effort to force the two defendants to testify against Milberg Weiss and its partners. … Prosecutors have also given immunity to at least two other former clients who say they received kickbacks from the firm via other attorneys. Lawyers familiar with the case say their allegations are similar to those detailed in the Lazar indictment."

NYTimes Bemoans Inflated Corporate Executive Pay. The New York Times (1/2) editorializes, "It would be nice to see corporate America put more effort - and money - into quality control and fair living wages for workers and less into exorbitant pay packages and bonuses for corporate chieftains. We remain hopeful."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Plea Bargain Could Be Announced Today. The CBS Evening News (1/02, story 4, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "In Washington, law enforcement sources told CBS News tonight that a plea bargain deal involving Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff could be announced as early as tomorrow. We are told that the deal could implicate lawmakers who allegedly took illegal gifts from him. Abramoff has already been charged in connection with a corruption case in Florida. His attorneys had no immediate comment."

Abramoff Under Pressure To Take Plea Deal. With Abramoff under pressure from Federal authorities to accept a plea bargain, many Washington observers expect the arrangement would lead to the implication of several members of Congress. ABC World News Tonight (1/1, story 5, 2:15, Harris) reported Federal officials are "investigating what's likely to be one of the biggest influence-pedaling scandals in history. The potential that Abramoff is cooperating is making some people in Congress very nervous. ABC's Geoff Morrell has that story." ABC (Morrell) added prosecutors believe Abramoff "used that money to bribe members of Congress and are now pressuring him to name names." Melanie Sloan, former Federal prosecutor: "I think people are going to be amazed when they learn the extent of the bribery that Jack Abramoff was involved with members of Congress." Morrell: "Tonight, the only lawmaker known to be under scrutiny is Bob Ney of Ohio. But several others are scrambling to distance themselves from Abramoff. Montana Sen. Conrad Burns, who raked in nearly $60,000 from the disgraced lobbyist, now says 'I hope Abramoff goes to jail and we never see him again. I wish he had never been born.'" Sloan: "I think by the time this is over, this is going to be the biggest congressional scandal in history."

Abramoff Plea Would "Send Shockwaves Through Washington." U.S. News and World Report (1/9, Brush) reports that Abramoff is "reportedly close to cutting his own deal with federal investigators, a development that would send shock waves through Washington. Abramoff's testimony could implicate lawmakers in a vast influence-peddling case, and those once friendly with the man known as 'Casino Jack' are now ducking for cover." Abramoff "is reportedly close to an agreement with prosecutors that might include cooperation with investigators looking into his lobbying tactics. A spokesman for Abramoff declined to comment." Lawmakers "are scrambling to return campaign contributions. According to the Center for Responsive Politics, 210 federal lawmakers have received donations to their campaigns or political action committees from either Abramoff or his clients, since 1999; most big recipients were Republicans. Republican Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana, who's up for re-election this year, has returned $150,000, saying the donations 'served to undermine the public's confidence in its government.' … Sen. Max Baucus, a Montana Democrat, is returning roughly $19,000. Sen. Byron Dorgan, a North Dakota Democrat and ranking member of the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, which is investigating Abramoff, is returning $67,000. Rep. Denny Rehberg, a Montana Republican, returned $18,000 to Indian tribes and donated to charity the $2,000 he received directly from Abramoff."

Congressional Hearings To Add Drama To Conflicts With White House. The Christian Science Monitor (1/3, Chaddock, 61K) reports Congress "is gearing up for the most dramatic slate of hearings since the Clinton impeachment fracas." The "high-profile probes underscore efforts by Congress to reclaim power from a war-time White House. And they could reshape this fall's midterm elections." Lawmakers "on both sides of the aisle set in motion an aggressive oversight agenda, ranging from secret prisons and the treatment of detainees under US control, to the president's authorization of domestic eavesdropping without a warrant." In addition, "more members of Congress find themselves under scrutiny," as Abramoff "and his former associates work out plea agreements promising cooperation in a widening bribery investigation on Capitol Hill. Former House majority leader Tom DeLay, meanwhile, will face charges of money laundering in court later this month." The "scrutiny on - and from - Congress is a sharp turnaround for a Republican-controlled body that came to power extolling ethics, and one that has been deferential to the Bush presidency about its conduct in the war on terrorism." A "major reason for the new posture on Capitol Hill is the willingness of GOP moderates to challenge the Bush administration's war policies."

Maryland Tech Firm Owner To Plead Guilty To Bribing DC School Officials. The Legal Times (1/2, Kelley) reports, "The owner of a Maryland-based technology firm is expected to plead guilty this week to bribing District of Columbia Public School officials in exchange for contracts." The Times continues, "On Dec. 7 the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia charged Charles Wiggins, the owner of Wiggins Telecommunications in Temple Hills, Md., with one felony count of bribing public officials. Within a week of being charged, Wiggins agreed to plead guilty and cooperate." The Times adds, "Wiggins' attorney, Sidney Friedman of Baltimore, says he is not authorized to comment on the deal reached with prosecutors. Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Butler, who is handling the prosecution, could not be reached for comment. … In charging documents, the prosecution alleges that from early 2001 through 2003, Wiggins doled out nearly $50,000 in bribes to a DCPS office manager and an elementary school principal. The two school officials, who so far are identified only as 'Individual 1' and 'Individual 2' in court documents, allegedly gave Wiggins preferential treatment in exchange for receiving a cut of the profits generated by his DCPS contracts."

Prince George's County Community No Longer Immune From Violence. The Washington Post (1/3, Thomas-Lester) reports, "Three miles beyond the Capital Beltway, Woodmore South seems far removed from the violence and fear that has infested some Prince George's County neighborhoods. … The upscale subdivision, with its rolling green lawns along wide and winding roads, reflects what draws many residents to the county: a chance for a classic suburban life in a community where most neighbors and political leaders are African American. … But consider the past several months: In June, a Woodmore South boy was beaten at nearby Six Flags America, and a teenage girl was shot after leaving a neighborhood graduation party. At one nearby shopping mall, a young man was beaten to death in early November. At another, a District man was shot Dec. 10. Earlier that day, an argument at a popular restaurant led to a fatal shooting a few blocks away." The Post continues, "The county and its incorporated cities recorded 173 homicides in 2005 -- surpassing the record 154 set during the crack epidemic in 1991 -- and a car was stolen every half hour. Although most of the crime remains concentrated inside the Beltway, residents in such suburban enclaves as Mitchellville, Bowie and Fort Washington are going through an upheaval, psychic and otherwise. … Some residents, who fled crime in the District a generation ago, are considering leaving Prince George's. Others, still drawn by the appeal of one of the nation's largest black, middle-class communities, are staying put -- but fortifying their homes and hiring off-duty police officers. … Some have lost faith in a county police department stretched thin by rapid growth: In November, Bowie voters decided overwhelmingly to set up their own department, and College Park residents gave their City Council the option." The Post notes, "Just as telling and troubling, the rise in crime has fueled perceptions among some middle-income residents that their low-income neighbors from the District or elsewhere in the county are preying on their prosperity."

Grant Seeking More FBI Agents To Fight Corruption In Chicago. The Chicago Sun Times (1/2, Korecki) reports, "If you're a government employee or contractor and you thought last year was a bad time to be corrupt in Chicago, you better look out in 2006. While the Chicago FBI just added a third public corruption squad in September to make the unit the largest in the country -- it still isn't enough. FBI Special Agent in Charge Robert Grant said he and U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald have asked Washington, D.C., for more resources to help root out public fraud. 'We asked headquarters to give us more bodies,' Grant told the Chicago Sun-Times. … Though new corruption cases continue to hit the Dirksen federal courthouse at a brisk pace, 'there are areas we want to explore that we haven't even gotten to yet,' Grant said." The Sun Times notes, "Grant wouldn't say how many additional agents he's seeking. But he said he thinks Chicago has a good chance of getting the boost in manpower because public corruption has become a bureau priority nationally and 'they know we're doing such a good job here.'" The AP (1/3) posts a truncated version of the Sun Times story.

Ryan, Warner Expected To Take Stand. The Chicago Sun Times (1/3, Korecki) reports, "In all, jurors have endured testimony from nearly 50 witnesses in the 13 weeks since George Ryan's public corruption trial began. But there's still one person who could drastically reshape their impressions: the former governor himself. And he may have that opportunity, because it seems likely that Ryan will take the stand in his own defense. Lawyers representing Ryan and his co-defendant Lawrence Warner said last week they expect to put their clients on the stand after the prosecution rests this month." Ryan attorney Dan Webb and Warner lawyer Ed Genson "said they'll make a final decision when the prosecution rests, which is expected mid-month. Neither would go into the tactical reasoning of doing something that defense lawyers typically avoid.

Tennessee State Trooper Transferred For Own Safety After Helping FBI Probe. The Knoxville News (1/2, Stambaugh) reports, "A Tennessee Highway Patrol trooper was recently transferred from Cocke County to keep him out of harm's way after his cooperation with the FBI was revealed during legal proceedings, court records show." Trooper Kevin Kimbrough "is one of at least three local lawmen who have been secretly recording their conversations with other officers at the behest of federal and state authorities as part of a four-year probe into public corruption and organized crime." The News notes, "The probe has relied heavily on undercover officers, informants and wiretaps in Tennessee, North Carolina, Georgia and Florida. Thus far, seven Cocke County lawmen have been arrested, two illegal cockfighting compounds have been uncovered, two brothels have been shut down and more than 150 people have faced criminal charges."

Indicted Lawmakers Vow To Attend Ethics Special Session. The AP (1/2) reports, "Two Tennessee Democratic senators facing federal bribery charges say they will attend a special session on ethics this month despite calls from Republican leaders that they not." Sens. Ward Crutchfield and Kathryn Bowers "are among five current or former lawmakers indicted on bribery and extortion charges in an FBI investigation that focused on a bogus company called E-Cycle Management." Sen. Jim Bryson "has written a letter to both Crutchfield and Bowers urging them not to participate in the special session. 'What I hope not to do, but will do if I have to, is present a resolution to the Senate, urging them not to attend,' Bryson said." The Tennessean (1/1, de la Cruz) notes, "Bowers supports many proposals in the ethics bill that will be the focal point of the session but does not like the ban on cash contributions, she said last week. At the same time, cash transactions have been at the heart of the public corruption case. A cash payment is what snared Bowers in the bribery sting."

Reform Provision Would Ban Cash Contributions. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (1/2, Locker) reports, "It was one of the eye-popping aspects of the FBI's 'Tennessee Waltz' bribery investigation: a handful of state legislators accepting hundreds of dollars in cash from undercover FBI agents posing as business executives. The acceptance of cash by some of the legislators was perfectly legal: It was properly disclosed as a campaign contribution on their campaign-finance reports, was within the $1,000 limit on individual contributions, and was not, they said, payment for legislative action. … But campaign contributions in cash will be banned if the sweeping ethics reform bill legislators will consider in a special session starting Jan. 10 is approved. Contributions will be by check, money order or some form other than cash."

Chat Room Solicitation Leads To Kansas Man's Arrested For Child Porn. The AP (1/2) reports, "Law enforcement officers in two states used high-tech tools to crack what they believe is the largest child porn case in Wichita history." Steven Craig Perrine "was charged last week with possession and distribution of child pornography after investigators said they searched his home and found more than 16,000 sexually explicit images involving children. … Authorities said the case began Sept. 9, when a Leetsdale, Pa., man visited an Internet chatroom and began talking to someone using the screen name 'Stevedragonslayer,'" who "asked if he wanted to see a 'hot video,' FBI Special Agent Rebecca Martin wrote in an affidavit. The video showed naked girls who looked younger than 10 walking around a bathroom, Martin wrote." The Pennsylvania man, James Vanlandingham, reported the incident to state authorities; and, The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (12/31, Ayad, 261K) notes, "With only a screen name to aid his search," Pennsylvania State Police Computer Crimes Task Force Officer Reginald Humbert "located IP addresses…with subpoenas of Yahoo! Inc. and Cox Communications Inc. that led FBI investigators and the Sedwick-Witchita County Exploited and Missing Child Unit straight to the two computers Mr. Perrine was using."

Detectives In DC Nightclub Slaying Probe Under Investigation. The Washington Post (1/3, B1, Cauvin) reports, "The witness didn't know what to think. … A few days earlier, she had seen a dying man dragged off the dance floor at a popular Northwest Washington nightclub. Now two homicide detectives wanted her to change her story, she said. Instead of saying that the man in the black shirt was stabbing the victim, she was told she should make it seem as though it was the man in the white shirt." The Post continues, "So she did, she later testified. … 'I was confused,' the witness said, 'but I figured that it's their job. They know what they're doing. I guess they got it under control.'" The Post adds, "In fact, the investigation into the Feb. 13 death of Terrence Brown at Club U was about to spin out of control. The two detectives, hoping to pursue murder charges against a suspect, apparently wanted the woman -- and two other witnesses -- to revise their accounts to point to their suspect and reflect the medical examiner's conclusion that the 31-year-old Brown died from a deep stab wound. Everything fell apart when prosecutors grew suspicious. … Nearly a year later, Brown's killing remains unsolved, clouded and complicated by an investigation into the detectives' conduct. Recently filed documents in D.C. Superior Court provide the most complete picture yet of how the high-profile case was derailed. They depict the detectives as determined to close the case even though the evidence and witnesses' statements suggested that the suspect they had in their sights could not have inflicted the fatal wound. … The theory didn't fly, and it was the two detectives, Erick Brown and Milagros Morales, who wound up in trouble. Brown, 40, was taken off the case almost immediately, and Morales, 41, was removed several days later. They have been stripped of their badges and guns and are under investigation by prosecutors and the police internal affairs unit." The Post notes, "It is a remarkable turn for both. Brown, a police officer for 15 years, is a onetime homicide detective of the year, according to David Schertler, a defense attorney for both detectives, and law enforcement officials. Morales, a police officer for 20 years, was once an investigator for internal affairs, the unit that investigates police corruption, Schertler and the officials said. … Schertler said they did nothing wrong. 'The detectives strongly disagree with the characterization that they tried to pressure or coerce any witness into saying anything that wasn't true,' he said."

Warner May Order New DNA Test In 1992 Execution. As his term nears its end, Virginia Gov. Mark Warner is facing a decision on whether to order DNA testing that could determine if Virginia executed an innocent man in 1992. The AP (1/3, Gelineau) reports, "If the tests show Roger Keith Coleman did not rape and murder his sister-in-law in 1981, it would mark the first time in the United States an executed person is scientifically proven innocent, say death-penalty opponents, who are keenly aware that such a result could sway public opinion their way." Warner, who is seen as a likely presidential candidate in 2008, "hopes to finalize negotiations over how the test would be conducted before his term ends Jan. 14, said spokesman Kevin Hall." Coleman's attorneys "argued he didn't have time to commit the crime, that tests showed semen from two men was found inside Miss McCoy and that another man bragged about murdering her."

Executions, Death Sentences Becoming More Rare In The US. The Washington Post (1/2, A11, Lane) reports, "As 2005 gives way to 2006, the death penalty remains a major item of business on the Supreme Court's docket. In addition to a steady flow of stay-of-execution applications, the court has four capital punishment cases to decide. … Yet in one important sense, this activity is misleading: The justices may be busy with death penalty cases, but capital punishment is on the wane in the United States." The Post notes, "In the year just completed, 60 convicted killers were executed. That is a drop of 39 percent from the recent peak of 98 in 1999. … Perhaps more significant, death sentences are dwindling. In 2005, there were 96 new death sentences, according to the center. This is down 70 percent from 1996."

Tennessee Case Seen As First Test Of Roberts' Influence On Death Penalty Cases. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Savage) reports, "The major death penalty case before the Supreme Court this year reads like a 'whodunit,' as one judge put it. But if there is doubt about who did it, should the defendant be on death row? … Though they might not solve the murder mystery, the case should give an early clue on whether the high court, now led by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., is willing to overturn a death sentence if an inmate's guilt is in doubt." In the case from Tennessee, "The justices will now decide whether to make it easier to reopen old cases when new evidence — including DNA testing -- raises real doubts about the defendant's guilt."

DC Region Homicides Rose In 2005. The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Klein) reports, "The Washington region saw a rise in bloodshed in 2005, largely fueled by a spike in slayings in the D.C. suburbs, most dramatically in Prince George's County. … Across the region, there were 466 homicides in 2005, compared with 420 in 2004 -- a rise of about 11 percent. About half of those slayings have been solved. It was the first time the District has recorded fewer than 200 homicides in consecutive years since the mid-1980s. At the same time, the total in Prince George's climbed from 148 to 173, a grim record for the county."

WPost Calls Bush Record On Pardons "Dismal." An editorial in the Washington Post (1/3, A16, 744K) says that although President Bush is "a big fan of presidential power," he "still has not exercised his veto," and he "prefers to forget that Article II of the Constitution gives him the 'Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offenses against the United States.' Mr. Bush, who famously proclaims himself a 'compassionate conservative,' has shown mercy fewer times than any president in recent history (though he has granted more pardons than President Bill Clinton had at the comparable point in his presidency). He has granted clemency less than a fifth the number of times of presidents Jimmy Carter, Ronald Reagan or Gerald Ford, who served not even a full term in office." The Post adds that Bush's record on pardons "dismal" and "a far cry from the manner in which the Framers of the Constitution envisioned the power."

CIVIL LAW:

DC Appeals Court Institutes Mediation Program For Civil Appeals. The Legal Times (1/2, Broida) reports, "In a continuing effort to reduce the backlog of cases at the D.C. Court of Appeals, the court has instituted a one-year appellate mediation program for civil appeals." The Times continues, "Starting this week, all parties who are represented by counsel will be required to attend alternative dispute mediation sessions to see if their appeal can be settled without being brought before the court." The Times adds, "The yearlong pilot program is an outgrowth of a similar limited mediation program that was successfully tried at the court this summer. … Ed Schwab, head of the appellate division of the D.C. Attorney General's Office, says his office had a positive experience with the program. He cited one case that was settled within three hours. 'So we were quite happy,' he says. … But Schwab cautions that not every case can be settled, especially those that don't involve money. In some cases, citizens will be seeking a remedy for a government action, and in cases like those, mediation may not work. Nevertheless, he says, 'Anytime you can settle, I think it is a good idea.'"

WPost Says Drug Safety Disputes Should Not Be Decided In Court. An editorial in the Washington Post (1/2, A12) says, "The New England Journal of Medicine's recent retraction of a 2000 article that helped establish the popularity of Vioxx, the controversial painkiller, should give doctors, hospitals and journal authors reason to think harder about how drug safety information is processed. The retraction, published last month, stated that the article's authors -- including scientists in the employ of Merck & Co., which makes Vioxx -- knew in advance of publication that 20 out of more than 2,000 patients taking part in a study of Vioxx suffered from heart attacks after taking the drug, not 17 as the article reported. They left out the information, they say, on the grounds that the three heart attacks in question occurred after the study had technically ended. But as a result, the level of heart attack risk associated with Vioxx appeared in the article to be slightly lower than it should have been." The revelation "raises legitimate questions about the relationship between scientists, who are often paid by drug companies, and medical journals, which should do a better job of stating authors' conflicts of interest. It should also lead doctors who prescribe drugs and are ultimately responsible for understanding their side effects to read such journals with greater skepticism. It does not, however, alter our view that the courts are the wrong place to resolve disputes about drug safety. … Scientific judgments about the risks and advantages of drugs are not black and white -- which is why they are best made by scientists and by the regulatory agency that employs them, not by jurors through the lens of hindsight."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

High Court To Hear Two Fourth Amendment Cases This Month. The Supreme Court will hear two Fourth Amendment cases this month. The Washington Times (1/2, Taylor) reports, "Hudson v. Michigan, which the justices will hear when the court reconvenes Jan. 9, questions whether police violated the Fourth Amendment 'knock and announce rule' when they burst into a suspected cocaine dealer's home in Detroit. The following week, the justices will consider rules pertaining to searches conducted with special 'anticipatory' warrants, which become operative only after 'triggering events' indicate probable cause."

District Of Columbia Activists Seek Approval For Gay Marriages. The Washington Post (1/2, B1, Weiss) reports, "The D.C. Council is considering measures that would amount to the greatest expansion of rights for same-sex couples in a decade. But for some in the District's large and influential gay community, the package of tax and inheritance benefits is perhaps most notable for what it is not: a move to legalize gay marriage. With Massachusetts having legalized gay marriage and other states coming close, some gay activists are saying that now is the time to push for full marriage rights in the District." The Post notes Sen. Sam Brownback "warned that the city would trigger a sharp backlash from Congress if it pursued gay marriage."

Democrats' Approach To Religion Seen As Wrongheaded. In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/2) Joseph Loconte, a research fellow in religion at the Heritage Foundation, writes, "Nancy Pelosi…sounded like an Old Testament prophet recently when she denounced the Republican budget for its 'injustice and immorality' and urged her colleagues to cast their no votes 'as an act of worship' during this religious season. This, apparently, is what the Democrats had in mind when they vowed after President Bush's re-election to reclaim religious voters for their party. … A look at the tactics and theology of the religious left, however, suggests that this is exactly what American politics does not need. If Democrats give religious progressives a stronger voice, they'll only replicate the misdeeds of the religious right. For starters, we'll see more attempts to draw a direct line from the Bible to a political agenda."

Many Counties Remain In Turmoil Over New Voting Technology. The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Levey, 958K) reports that California and other states "are embroiled in a contentious debate over how voters should cast their ballots." With "electronic machines under attack as unreliable and vulnerable to hackers, there is little consensus about what the new technology should look like. That has left many counties nationwide in turmoil as they struggle with unproven technology while state regulations remain in flux and the federal government offers minimal guidance." The Times adds, "Congress in 2002 passed the Help America Vote Act, pledging nearly $4 billion to help states upgrade their voting systems. The same year, California passed its own $200-million bond for the same purpose. The flood of money fueled a nationwide spending spree on high-tech machines that were expected to revolutionize vote counting. But the machines often have not proved as reliable as hoped. And while states and counties rushed to buy them, elections officials struggled to regulate how machines should record votes and safeguard results."

Voting Act Puts County Registrars In Bind. The Sacramento Bee (1/2, Yamamura) reports, "Mikel Haas is running out of time and patience, but he says he'll give it one more month before he really starts to panic. … With an April 11 special election fast approaching, the San Diego County registrar of voters still doesn't have any California-certified machines to meet the requirements of the 2002 U.S. Help America Vote Act." The Bee continues, "Most counties in California - and many across the country - officially fell out of compliance Sunday with rules mandating that election systems be accessible to voters with disabilities. But the San Diego County special election puts Haas at the head of the line when it comes to compliance. … While the legal deadline has passed, Secretary of State Bruce McPherson has tried to assure county officials and voters that California will resolve its Help America Vote Act issues by the June primary, the first statewide election with federal races. … But McPherson has not certified any new accessible voting machines since August, making some registrars nervous and others downright angry." The Bee adds, "McPherson's spokeswoman, Jennifer Kerns, said that at least six election systems are 'in the pipeline' and that McPherson is confident multiple options will be available for the June primary. … But registrars like Haas are torn. They say they respect McPherson's need to put controversial equipment through a battery of tests. But they also face the practical need of having to run an election in a matter of months."

Timing Of Evolution Sticker Petitions Still In Dispute. The Fulton County (GA) Daily Report (1/2, Land) reports, "Federal appeals judges are still wrestling with factual inconsistencies over how a petition -- pushed by Marjorie Rogers, a self-described 'six-day biblical creationist' -- affected the Cobb County, Ga., school board's decision to amend new science textbooks with stickers questioning the validity of evolution." The Report continues, "A panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last month heard the school board's appeal of a federal judge's 2005 decision that the stickers, which say that evolution is 'a theory, not a fact,' amounted to an unconstitutional endorsement of religion. Selman v. Cobb County School District, 390 F. Supp 2d 1286. (The 11th Circuit case is No. 05-10341-1.) … During the arguments, judges sounded highly skeptical of the ruling by U.S. District Judge Clarence Cooper. They also upbraided Jeffrey O. Bramlett, the lawyer for the plaintiffs challenging the stickers, for making statements about the timeline of the case that 11th Circuit Judge Edward E. Carnes called 'just wrong.'" The Report adds, "Carnes demanded that Bramlett provide a written explanation of his assertions that the stickers had been placed in the textbooks as a result of Rogers' petition drive. … Bramlett's claims had been called into question by Cobb County's attorney, Ernest Linwood Gunn IV, whose brief said the petition had not been circulated until four months after the disclaimers were inserted into the books. … On Dec. 22, a week after the argument, Bramlett filed a 127-page response that said there were two petitions -- one by Rogers, with more than 2,300 signatures delivered to the school board before the books were purchased, and a smaller petition delivered after the sticker plan was implemented. … The day the 11th Circuit received Bramlett's response, the court issued a one-page letter to Gunn instructing him, by today, to provide 'any evidence regarding the timing of any petitions that may have been filed with the School Board.'"

Federal Workforce Trails Private Sector In Hiring Hispanics. Under the headline, "Hispanics Underrepresented In The Federal Workforce," the Washington Post (1/3, A16, Fears, 744K) reports, "Hispanics represent 7 percent of employees in federal government when the group's population is growing faster than all others. The five-percentage-point gap between Hispanics working in the public and private domains translates to thousands of jobs and billions of dollars in potential pay, according to a coalition of Hispanic federal employees. The private sector tracks with the 13 percent of Hispanics in the general population, 40 million people, not including an estimated 11 million undocumented workers living in the country illegally." The Post adds, "The consequences are felt nationwide, Hispanic advocates say. The government suffers from a shortage of Spanish-speaking workers who could help non-English speakers navigate Social Security and other federal documents. In the chaotic aftermath of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, the government discovered that it could not effectively communicate with displaced immigrants, legal and undocumented."

ANTITRUST:

Columnist Predicts Mergers For Coming Year.

In a column for New York Magazine (1/2), James Cramer writes, "The start of the year is a time for crystal-ball gazing. Sure, I could give you the standard fare, the typical Wall Street gibberish that you will hear in a virtual 24-hour loop for the next few weeks: untried Fed chairman, big-budget deficits, uncertain presidential leadership, a peak in real estate, an end to the interest-rate-tightening cycle. Know what? You know all that already. I'd rather tell you about some things that could happen that could make you some huge money in 2006. I can't guarantee any of them will come to pass, but if they do, well, remember your friend Cramer tipped you to them." Cramer continues, "Citigroup Will Merge With Goldman Sachs … For the past few years, Citigroup has been in the doghouse with regulators. Now new honcho Chuck Prince, a buttoned-down lawyer, has eliminated the cowboys and stopped the culture of trying to sell anything to customers as long as it had a big fee. That may soon give him the green light to make an acquisition. Citigroup has been taking a huge backseat to other players as it gets its ethical house in order. An acquisition could make Citigroup dominant again worldwide." Cramer adds, "Comcast Will Buy CBS … In 2004, when Comcast made its aborted offer for Disney—something that Comcast actually thought that Disney wanted, when nothing could have been further from the truth—I figured that win or lose, Comcast would remain a key, if not the key, player in the distribution of television programming in this country. But Intel, Broadcom, Qualcomm, Apple, Microsoft, Texas Instruments, Motorola, Nokia, Dell, and Marvell Technology Group all have another agenda, which is to make a new device that makes your phone calls, gets you on the Internet (wirelessly), and downloads TV programming, sans commercials, when you want, on the channel you want it. Late in 2006, we're bound to see one or more of these great tech companies unveil a product that will allow you to purchase, download, and watch anything that you want, from sports programs to movies to television shows to video games. The device will smash the current cable paradigm and will make all those stocks worth owning once again, as they were in the year just past." Cramer continues, "Pfizer And Bristol-Myers Squibb Will Merge, And Merck Will Snap Up Schering-Plough … My crystal ball sees no end to the turmoil afflicting the pharmaceutical industry. With the government as the biggest payer in the system, courtesy of the changes in Medicare, the drug companies will be forced to discount drugs well below where they thought they might have to. That combination of price squeeze and endless overhead will force Bristol-Myers and Pfizer to merge, and Merck and Schering-Plough will get together."

Arizona Questions Competition Problems With Development Deal. The Arizona Republic (1/2, Alltucker) reports, "State regulators want to scrutinize Cox Communications' role in arranging a special deal that effectively prevented rivals from seeking customers in a massive new-home development in Peoria." The Republic continues, "A new report by the Arizona Corporation Commission suggests there is "clear and convincing evidence" that in December 2003 a deal was struck between Cox Communications and a private developer to curb competition for phone, cable and high-speed Internet services at the 17,000-home Vistancia community. … The Corporation Commission wants to hold a public hearing to examine the deal and discuss potential fines against Cox." The Republic adds, "Although the arrangement was proposed by the developer, Shea Sunbelt, state regulators said Cox was an "active participant," with 15 employees helping write and revise terms of the deal. … The arrangement came to light after a tiny telephone company, Accipiter Communications, filed a complaint with state regulators alleging it was shut out of Vistancia. The arrangement also triggered an investigation by the federal Department of Justice's antitrust division."

Columnist Decries Government-Sanctioned Monopolies. In a column for the Orange County Register (1/2), Tibor R. Machan writes, "In Silverado Canyon, there is a tiny post office where each weekday we pick up our mail. One or two of the people who work there are, unfortunately, quite often absent because of illness or something else and, more often than not, the mail now doesn't get distributed until late in the afternoon. The Postal Service says they have to have the mail out by 5 p.m. but it used to be in our boxes by 10:30 a.m. or even earlier, until recently. … OK, so there has been more mail this time of year, but here is how that eventuality should play out. The post office should either hire more people so the mail gets out earlier or an alternative mail service should appear on the scene and offer competing first-class delivery service." Machan continues, "That latter alternative, of course, is illegal. Competition in first-class mail delivery is against the law, nevermind the demand. Accordingly, the post office can keep being later and later with mail distribution and does not have to hire any extra help since no one's about to come in and take the business from them. … This is but one of the relatively innocuous results of the monopoly in first-class mail service. Other monopolies are far more insidious. Take the New York Metropolitan Transit Authority, which last month was struck by the public-employee union to which all its workers belong. … " When there's a strike in a free market, people often have other vendors from whom they can receive service. There is usually competition, so that if Chrysler's autoworkers go on strike, there are Ford, Toyota, General Motors and other carmakers still in business." Machan adds, "Just why the American public is mostly passive about the many monopolies protected or operated by government is a mystery to me - one reason might be is that the government schools do not explain in their economics classes just how unnecessary and unjust such monopolies are, seeing that the schools themselves are a case in point. But perhaps with some voices making a bit of noise about the situation others will catch on and in time we can get a system in which my little post office would either shape up or find itself competing with an alternative mail-delivery agency."

Homeowners' Web Site In Wisconsin Competes With Realtors. The New York Times (1/3, Bailey) reports, "Across the country, the National Association of Realtors and the 6 percent commission that most of its members charge to sell a house are under assault by government officials, consumer advocates, lawyers and ambitious entrepreneurs. But the most effective challenge so far emanates from a spare bedroom in the modest home here of Christie Miller." The Times continues, "Ms. Miller, 38, a former social worker who favors fuzzy slippers, and her cousin, Mary Clare Murphy, 51, operate what real estate professionals believe to be the largest for-sale-by-owner Web site in the country." The Times adds, "They have turned Madison, a city of 208,000 known for its liberal politics, into one of the most active for-sale-by-owner markets in the country. And their success suggests that, in challenging the Realtor association's dominance of home sales, they may have hit on a winning formula that has eluded many other upstarts. Their site, FsboMadison.com (pronounced FIZZ-boh) holds a nearly 20 percent share of the Dane County market for residential real estate listings. … The site, which charges just $150 to list a home and throws in a teal blue yard sign, draws more Internet traffic than the traditional multiple listing service controlled by real estate agents." The Times notes, "Madison is home to the University of Wisconsin and a city where the percentage of residents who graduated from college is twice the national level. It is also a hotbed of antibusiness sentiment, which turns out to be the perfect place for a free-market real estate revolution. Bucking the system is a civic pastime here. … Elsewhere, the Justice Department, free-market scholars, plaintiffs' lawyers and countless entrepreneurs are vowing to make real estate more competitive and to bring down sales commissions. To do that, they advocate forcing the Realtors' association to share control of its established listing services. Those critics seem to view the listings as an unassailable monopoly. … And who can blame them? Those 800-plus local listing services, controlled by local branches of the Realtors' association, help dole out about $60 billion a year in commissions to real estate agents and the firms that employ them. Despite numerous attacks, the association has been remarkably successful to date at protecting its turf. Through lobbying, litigation and legislation, the Realtors' group has managed to keep control of the crucial listings."

Unlikely Alliance Develops Between Rivals Sony, Samsung. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Dvorak, Ramstad) reports, "For years, Samsung Electronics Co.'s key mission was to unseat rival Sony Corp. as the world's top electronics maker. Long seen as a South Korean underdog, Samsung has in the past few years surpassed its Japanese rival in market capitalization, revenue and profits. In television sets, Sony's traditional stronghold, Samsung now jockeys with Sony and a handful of top players for the No. 1 share of sales globally." The Journal continues, "But the relationship between Sony's Hiroshi Murayama and Samsung's Jang Insik tells a different story. The two engineers symbolize how the two companies have increasingly come to depend on each other since 2003. That's when Sony, looking for a source of panels for its new flat-panel TV line, asked to become a partner in a $2 billion factory Samsung was building to produce liquid-crystal displays." The Journal adds, "Messrs. Jang and Murayama phone each other from their bases in South Korea and Japan respectively several times a day and visit in person every month to discuss how to make better panels. Mr. Murayama persuaded Mr. Jang and his bosses to speed their development of key technologies, and Samsung let Mr. Murayama use some of those technologies in Sony's TV panels even before its own products. Sony's TVs that use those new panels ended up outselling Samsung's LCD sets by more than three to one this fall in major U.S. retailers. … But Samsung is still keen to work with Sony because it's getting a crash course in how to improve LCD panels, which it had mostly used in computer monitors and cellphones, in the important TV segment. … The unlikely alliance shows just how tangled the connections have become between consumer-electronics companies as competition in the industry intensifies. … The same trend is happening across Asian electronics makers, which have traditionally prided themselves on doing as much as they could in-house, from the design of their gadgets to the technology that goes into them."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Health Officials Note Progress In Preparations For Bird Flu Epidemic. Health officials said yesterday that the US is making progress in preparing for a bird flu epidemic. This includes measures to close schools and quarantine the sick. However, the AP (1/2, Yen) reports that vaccine supplies remain inadequate. Julie Gerberding, director of the national Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said on CBS' Face the Nation, "We've got a lot of work to do." Citing "'bottlenecks' in vaccine production and the delivery of health care if there's an outbreak," Gerberding added, "We've got to get more and better anti-viral drugs. And we've got to have every single link in our public health system as strong as it can be so it can detect this problem." The AP adds, "Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, appearing on CNN's 'Late Edition,' praised the money approved by Congress as a good step that will fund one year of preparedness efforts. Still, he said the U.S. is not ready, saying additional money is needed to ensure there would be enough vaccine supplies for all Americans within six months of an initial outbreak. State and local governments also need to step up efforts, Leavitt said."

Gerberding said on CBS' Face the Nation (1/1, Schieffer) she does not know whether "it is just a matter of time" before Avian flu appears in the US, but "we've got to take the steps now to get prepared for that." She added, "Frankly, we're not as prepared as we need to be. We're certainly doing more today than we were even two years ago so we're making fast progress. But we've got a lot of work to do. We've got to get a vaccine supply that we can count on. We've got to get more and better anti- viral drugs."

Leavitt Says US Still Has Work To Do. HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt said on CNN's Late Edition (1/1, Blitzer) that the avian flu virus "continues to spread in wild birds across the world. There is no reason to believe that at some point it will stop. That means that ultimately it would find its way to the United States. We need to be prepared. … We are not as prepared as we aspire to be. We have a great deal of work to do."

Plan To Change Toxic Release Reporting Requirements Draws Fire. The Washington Post (1/3, D1, Skrzycki, 744K) reports in its "The Regulators" column, "Opposition is growing to a Bush administration plan to change the reporting requirements of" the Toxic Release Inventory, the "highly successful public information program that collects data annually on releases of toxic chemicals." The inventory "has been a roadmap for individuals and community groups interested in pinpointing where the country's most-polluting facilities are located." The business community has pushed "over the past decade to reduce the 'burden' of having to fill out a five-page form for each chemical they use every year. This form includes detailed information on the quantity of the chemical, how it is made and processed, and how much of it is released. After considering several options, the [EPA] in October proposed changes that would allow more companies to file a shorter report, known as Form A, which contains less information about their use of toxic chemicals." The EPA "dropped another bombshell at the same time, telling Congress that it is thinking about eliminating annual filing in favor of every other year. … The twin ideas prompted outrage from environmental and public-interest groups." The Post adds, "Environmental and community groups, in particular, consider the reporting program a great success. And it has become even more useful since the agency has required reports on more chemicals and from more industrial sectors, including mining and electrical utilities."

Other States Adopting California's Strict Greenhouse Gas Rules. The Washington Post (1/3, D1, Freeman, 744K) reports, "On Friday, Massachusetts joined Oregon, Connecticut and five other states in adopting California's tough greenhouse gas rules, which limit the amount of carbon dioxide and other gases that can be emitted from vehicle tailpipes. These new rules would supplement federal exhaust pollutant standards already in place. Two other states are in the process of adopting the rules. The carbon dioxide regulations are so strict, the auto industry argues, that they would cause extensive design changes to new vehicles, driving up prices and crippling new-car sales. Every major automaker that sells vehicles in the United States is suing to have the new rules overturned, even as states on the West Coast and in the Northeast are moving quickly to adopt them." The California rule "requires a 30 percent reduction in greenhouse gases by 2016. The rules are one element of a wider trend of states enacting their own energy policies to govern auto and factory emissions and appliance energy efficiency, updating older federal rules or writing new rules where none exist."

Novak Praises Romney Decision To Pull Out Of RGGI. Robert Novak (1/2) writes in his syndicated column, "Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney on Dec. 16 made a significant move that will benefit the pocketbooks of his state's consumers and perhaps boost his own Republican presidential prospects. He pulled Massachusetts out of the compact of Northeastern states requiring a reduction in power plant emissions of carbon dioxide. The Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative (RGGI) would cut the emissions by 10 percent by 2019, forcing up electricity prices because of greater dependence on increasingly expensive natural gas. … The defection of Romney, originally inclined to support RGGI, represents a major setback for the Greens." Novak adds, "Green pressure can lead politicians to make promises that they would regret. … It appears Mitt Romney will avoid that pitfall on his long uphill climb to the White House."

Government Seeks To Remove Grizzly Bears From Endangered List. NBC Nightly News (1/1, story 12, 2:20, Seigenthaler) reported, "The Federal Government has declared grizzly bears in Yellowstone recovered, clearing the way to remove it from the endangered list." NBC (O'Neil) added, "By 1975 it was clear the grizzlies needed to be put on the endangered species list." Biologist Kerry Gunther: "We've gone from a population of less than 200 to a population of 600 and increasing population. It's a great success story." O'Neil: "A sorely needed victory for the act which some in Washington want to water down. The grizzly is only on of a handful to ever be declared recovered."

Texas, Oklahoma Continue To Be Plagued By Wildfires. The CBS Evening News (1/02, story 2, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "The fires in Texas and Oklahoma now spreading to New Mexico are being fueled by the worst drought in decades. The fires killed four people last week and searchers were set to look for any victims from two small towns in Texas that burned last night. Since early November, the Oklahoma fires have destroyed some 200 buildings and at least 270,000 acres." CBS (Cowan) added, "Nearly 100 more homes were lost to flames that burned into the wee hours of the morning. Some communities like Ringgold near the Texas-Oklahoma border were erased."

NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 5, 1:50, Teague) reported, "Fire crews have spent more than a week battling grass fires that have raged across Oklahoma, Texas, and New Mexico and burned again today. Nearly 300,000 acres have been scorched so far and more than 400 homes. The weather simply won't give fire crews a break." The AP (1/3, Flynn) runs a similar report.

Damage From California Flooding Now In Hundreds Of Millions Of Dollars. The CBS Evening News (1/02, story 3, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "Back-to-back storms drenched California and caused an estimated $100 million in flood damage. Most of it is the result of rivers that have spilled out of their banks in Northern California. Now the storms are threatening the southern part of the state." CBS (Hughes) added, "The pounding rain was too much for vulnerable hillsides above Los Angeles, burned bare by this year's wild fires. Rescue workers were watching for any sign that nearby residents needed to pack up and run from the hills. The second wave of storms to hit this weekend is swamping parts of Southern California. Up to four inches of rain is expected in the valleys and eight in some mountain areas."

NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 4, 2:20, Lewis) reported, "In California's wine country, where hundreds of homes and businesses are flooded out, they're just beginning to assess the damage, estimated in the hundreds of millions of dollars." In Pasadena, "there were plenty of raindrops on roses at 117th annual Rose parade. Defying the elements, the USC marching band wore plastic ponchos and sunglasses. As a smaller-than-usual crowd of spectators watched." Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger has "issued a state of emergency in seven California counties most adversely affected by the storm."

Cato Fellows Argue Strategic Petroleum Reserve Should Be Scrapped. Jerry Taylor and Peter Van Doren, senior fellows at the Cato Institute, write in the New York Times (1/3, 1.19M), "The rise in fuel prices that followed Hurricanes Katrina and Rita has prompted many members of Congress to call for new and expanded federal reserves of crude oil, diesel fuel, home heating oil, jet fuel and propane. Proponents of stockpiling claim that if the government were to hoard those commodities when prices were low, it could unleash them on the market when supplies are tight, thus dampening price increases and stabilizing the market. But the experience in this country with the strategic petroleum reserve strongly suggests that such government-managed stockpiles are a waste of taxpayers' money. Rather than increasing the stockpile, the reserve should be emptied and closed." Economists "agree that every barrel of oil we put in the public reserve displaces oil that might otherwise have gone into private inventories. How much displacement occurs is unclear, but there is little doubt that it's significant. If the reserve is thought of as an insurance policy against high prices, the cost of the policy has been more expensive than the dangers the stockpile is meant to prevent. Americans should resist the drive to expand public stockpiles. Instead, we should sell while the selling is good."

Opponents Of ICC Said To Have Little To Stand On. The Washington Post (1/2) editorializes, "With a key federal approval expected soon for the proposed intercounty connector -- the east-west toll highway that would transverse Maryland suburbs -- the road's opponents are mounting an eleventh-hour anti-ICC campaign. Having failed over the years to sway the traffic-weary public with other arguments (environmental impact, cost, effect on traffic), the foes are focusing on how much the road will cost to use. This, too, is a losing argument."

Loyal Mdewakanton Tribe Wins Court Battle Over Minnesota Land. Indian Country Today (1/3, Melmer) reports, "Membership in a Dakota tribe is expected to more than double after an accurate list of lineal descendants of the Loyalist Mdewakanton is complied and verified, as ordered by a federal court." ICT continues, "U.S. Court of Federal Claims Judge Charles Lettow has denied a U.S. Justice Department motion to reconsider his earlier ruling that gave the descendants of the Loyalist Mdewakanton rights to land in Minnesota. … Lettow also ruled that the federal government breached its trust obligations to the Loyalist Mdewakantons and their descendants when in a 1980 congressional act it put the land into trust for three federally recognized Dakota communities - Prairie Island, Shakopee and Lower Sioux. That act violated an 1886 contract signed by Mdewakanton leader John Bluestone, which gave that land to the Mdewakanton who were descendants of those who pledged loyalty to the United States in 1862. … Previously the land was either assigned to individual loyalists or leased, with the proceeds from the lease paid to the loyalists." ICT adds, "The loyalists want the land returned to them and Mdewakanton tribal membership, with full political power, restored. Lease revenues that were given to groups other than the loyalist's lineal descendants constitutes a breach of the contractual agreement by the federal government, the plaintiffs argued. Today's lineal descendants want compensation for the lost revenues. … Lettow's latest decision rejected the federal government's claim that it didn't mismanage the trust on behalf of the lineal descendants. He also rejected the argument that the 1886 contract did not authorize a trust responsibility to the loyalists. … Lettow ordered the government to perform an accounting to determine the size of financial compensation that is owed the loyalists' descendants."

Navajos Try To Stop Arizona Uranium Rush. The Arizona Republic (1/3, Shaffer) reports, "The price of uranium has tripled in the past two years, bringing with it the possibility of another uranium rush in Arizona, the state with the richest deposits of the ore and, along with New Mexico, the worst legacy associated with its mining." The Republic continues, "Last year, 700 mining claims were filed and 100 test holes were bored into the wild, remote high desert in northern Arizona. … Scott Florence, director of the Bureau of Land Management's Arizona Strip district in St. George, Utah, said those numbers are significantly higher than any year since the frenzy of the 1980s. … 'Finding the right mine site is a real art. But it seems like everyone and their mother is trying now,' he said." The Republic adds, "Secondary supplies of uranium on the world market have virtually dried up, and China, India and Japan are clamoring for uranium for their burgeoning domestic nuclear-power industries. Uranium now fetches $36 a pound on the spot market. Four years ago, it was going for just over $7 a pound. … But not everyone is happy about the search for new mine sites. Navajo Nation President Joe Shirley Jr., stirred to action by the memory of how dangerous uranium mining can be, issued an executive order in November banning negotiations with uranium companies or uranium exploration on the three-state Navajo Nation, which was engulfed by a public health tragedy after the first wave of uranium mining began on its reservation in the 1950s. Dozens of premature deaths of Navajo miners and passed-on genetic defects have been attributed to uranium exposure."

FBI Photographer Sues Over Mistreatment Due To Tourette's Syndrome. The Legal Times (1/2, Kelley) reports, "As a photographer for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Jeffrey Bell was frequently tapped to work on high-profile cases. Between 1991 and 2000 he was deployed throughout the United States and abroad to photograph matters involving terrorism, forensics, counterintelligence, and emergency response. … But according to a lawsuit Bell, a 43-year-old with Tourette's syndrome, filed recently in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, all that changed after an incident stemming from his disorder led to retaliation from his employer. Bell's trial is expected to start this week." The Times continues, "Court papers filed by Bell's attorney, Edith Marshall of Powers Pyles Sutter & Verville, state that Bell was taking a new medication to control his Tourette's when he became involved in a verbal altercation with a co-worker. Bell explained that the outburst was a side effect of his medicine, but he claims he was treated differently from that point on because of his Tourette's, a neurological disorder that can cause involuntary tics and vocalizations as well as obsessive-compulsive tendencies and hyperactivity." The Times adds, "Bell alleges that because of his Tourette's he was regarded as a 'problem personality' and often blamed for any workplace conflict that occurred."

Doctors Said To Fear DEA Action When Prescribing Pain Medications. In an story titled "Painful Choices: Physicians Challenged By Quest To End Suffering" the Deseret (UT) Morning News (1/2, Collins, Jarvik) writes, "The perception among doctors is that the regulatory environment has become more hostile, says Micke Brown, director of advocacy for the American Pain Foundation, headquartered in Baltimore. 'Many health care providers are running scared,' especially primary care physicians, she says. 'Some are even backing away from managing people's pain.'" Pain management doctor Lynn Webster, who heads the Utah Academy of Pain, "is an opioid advocate. … He argues that the undertreatment of pain is 'still a major problem' in Utah, in part because of doctors' fears of punishment by the federal Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) and the state Division of Occupational and Professional Licensing (DOPL). … Pain experts are waiting anxiously for the DEA to clarify its interpretation of the federal law that governs prescribing controlled substances for pain. DEA said the guidance was imminent more than a year ago. But pain experts, still waiting, continue to warn colleagues to err on the side of stricter federal interpretations."

Maryland Tax Dollars Said To Be Disproportionately Tied Up In Locking Up Addicts. In the Washington Post (1/1, B8), Tara Andrews, director of Justice Maryland and Democratic candidate for the state Senate from Baltimore City, writes "By the latest count, more than 250,000 Marylanders are in need of substance-abuse treatment. Even in Montgomery County, considered the state's wealthiest county, the treatment gap is great. Yet despite population growth, state funding for treatment has declined. More than three-quarters of those in Maryland prisons report having an alcohol or drug problem, and four out of 10 entering the state's prisons every year are locked up for drug offenses. Maryland has the third-highest percentage of prison admissions for drug offenses in the country. … Maryland tax dollars are disproportionately locked up by the incarceration of drug addicts, while providers of substance-abuse treatment make do with crumbs. A shift of dollars away from incarceration and toward a dedicated fund for treatment would make a world of difference and a world of sense."

Plan Colombia Credited With Record Number Of Cocaine Seizures. Reuters (12/31) reports, "Colombia seized a record 186 tons of cocaine [in 2005] thanks to a Washington-backed program aimed at cutting imports of the illegal drug to the United States, the Colombian government said on Friday. The haul, seized using equipment and expert advice provided by 'Plan Colombia,' was 26 percent more than last year and had a U.S. street value of $4.7 billion, Defense Minister Camilo Ospina told reporters. He said the increase was possible thanks in part to more than $3 billion in mostly military aid that the United States has provided since 2000 to help fight drug-running Marxist rebels fighting a decades-old insurgency. Washington says cocaine is becoming more expensive on U.S. streets, a sign that the money, largely steered toward aerial spraying of coca bushes used to make cocaine, is making the drug less available."

IMMIGRATION:

Migrant Advocacy Group Celebrates 10 Years. The Miami Herald (1/2, Chardy) reports, "Alfredo López-Sánchez languished for months at a detention center for migrant children in Southwest Miami-Dade -- until an attorney for a local immigrant rights group realized the Guatemalan did not understand Spanish." The Herald continues, "The lawyer from the Miami-based Florida Immigrant Advocacy Center eventually found an interpreter who spoke López-Sánchez's Mayan language. … That was September 2001. A year later, López-Sánchez -- then 17 -- was free and on his way to getting a green card." The Herald adds, "Such successes have turned the Florida Immigrant Advocacy Center into a powerhouse in national advocacy for persecuted migrants too poor to hire a lawyer. … FIAC, as the group is known in the immigrant rights community, is marking its 10th anniversary today -- with a string of victories, and some defeats, in what often seems an uphill battle against ever-tougher immigration laws. It plans a 10th anniversary celebration dinner March 6. … The group began in 1996 -- two years after former House Speaker Newt Gingrich's conservative revolution swept Congress with calls to close the borders and even to shut the school door to children of undocumented immigrants. In the end, Congress amended immigration law, making it extremely difficult for any immigrant without proper papers to avoid detention or deportation -- though lawmakers dropped provisions that would have let states bar children from public schools if their parents entered the country illegally. … Ten years later, in the fallout from the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, immigration law is again facing calls from conservatives in Congress to toughen the rules for citizenship, including barring U.S.-born children of illegal immigrants from becoming automatic citizens and the deportation of migrants encountered on the streets without the right to a court review to plead their case."

Conflicting Public Attitudes On Illegal Immigration Noted. The Washington Post (1/3, A7, Balz, 744K) notes the "sometimes conflicting public attitudes" on illegal immigration. A Washington Post-ABC News poll taken in mid-December "found Americans alarmed by the federal government's failure to do more to block the flow of illegal immigration and critical of the impact of illegal immigration on the country but receptive to the aspirations of undocumented immigrants living and working in the United States. … The Post-ABC News poll found that four in five Americans think the government is not doing enough to prevent illegal immigration, with three in five saying they strongly hold that view. The same poll found that 56 percent of Americans believe that illegal immigrants have done more to hurt the country than to help it, with 37 percent saying they help the country. About three in five Republicans and a bare majority of Democrats agreed that illegal immigrants are detrimental to the country. The only groups in the poll who disagreed were people with postgraduate degrees, those with incomes exceeding $100,000 and nonwhite respondents. The Post-ABC poll did not include enough Hispanics to provide an accurate reading of their sentiment, but a Pew Hispanic Center survey last summer found that two in three Latinos said that undocumented migrants help the economy. … In the recent Post-ABC News poll, President Bush got his lowest marks on immigration, with 33 percent saying they approved of how he was handling the issue. That may largely reflect irritation over the government's failure to control the borders."

Hayworth Set To Publish An "Anti-Immigration Manifesto." Time (1/9, Allen) reports in its "Notebook" column that Rep. J.D. Hayworth "is about to publish an anti-immigration manifesto, Whatever It Takes, that should rile up right-wing radio just as the White House was hoping to gain traction for a broad immigration-reform package." In the book Hayworth "calls for deploying active-duty troops to the border and considering a 'border security fence from the Pacific Ocean to the Gulf of Mexico.'" Hayworth "contends that Bush's plan to confer temporary legal status on Mexicans working in the U.S. amounts to 'false compassion.' But Senator John McCain plans to push hard this winter for such a program. House Republican leaders say they might accept one if immigrants had to return home to apply for temporary work permits. Hayworth tells TIME that even that would be too lenient, designed to appease 'left-wing grievance mongers' and businesses that want cheap labor. Bush may have sounded as if he were running for sheriff during his recent border visits, but to convince the likes of Hayworth, he'll have to talk a lot tougher."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Argued President Should Issue "Interpretive Signing Statements." As a Justice Department lawyer in 1986, Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito made the case or presidential power, laying out a strategy under which the president would routinely issues statements about the meaning of statutes when he signs the into law. The Washington Post (1/2, A11, Lee) reports that such "'interpretive signing statements' would be a significant departure from run-of-the-mill bill signing pronouncements, which are 'often little more than a press release,' Alito wrote. The idea was to flag constitutional concerns and get courts to pay as much attention to the president's take on a law as to 'legislative intent.'" The Post adds, "The Reagan administration popularized the use of such statements and subsequent administrations continued the practice. (The courts have yet to give them much weight, though.) President Bush has been especially fond of them, issuing at least 108 in his first term, according to presidential scholar Phillip J. Cooper of Portland State University in Oregon."

Alito Said To Have An "Everyman Appeal." The New York Times(1/2, Kirkpatrick) says that according to people who have participated in Alito's rehearsals for this week's confirmation hearings say he "will never be as polished and camera-ready as Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was at his own hearings a few months ago." But two of Judge Alito's supporters who participated in the murder boards, speaking about the confidential sessions on condition of anonymity for fear of White House reprisals, said they emerged convinced that his demeanor was a political asset because it gave him an Everyman appeal." The Times adds, "Senators of both parties have said it will not be easy to follow Chief Justice Roberts," and "some Democrats said they already had much more pointed questions waiting for Judge Alito, focusing mainly on strongly worded statements that he made as lawyer in the Reagan administration about his conservative approach to the Constitution, abortion rights and other issues. Leading Democratic senators have said his responses will be a deciding factor in whether they seek to block the nomination by filibustering."

Alito Hearings Will Test Domestic Spying Program's Political Resonance. Time (1/9, Tumulty, Allen) the opening of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito's confirmation hearings this week will be the first test of the domestic spying program's "political resonance." According to Time, Alito opponents, "who had planned to put the abortion issue on center stage, are quickly retooling their strategy. … Alito's record could give his critics plenty of ammunition. The Third Circuit judge has long been an advocate of the unitary-executive concept, a constitutional interpretation that is a favorite of Bush's and Vice President Dick Cheney's, which argues that the President should have nearly total control of Executive Branch agencies and resist any incursion on that power by Congress." Time adds, "Administration officials concede that the controversy will inject a volatile new element into the confirmation debate but say Alito will resist getting drawn in."

Alito's Writings Suggest He Will Accelerate Court's Shift To The Right. U.S. News and World Report (1/9, Halloran) says the battle over Alito "shows every sign of achieving Borkian dimensions. As Alito prepares for his confirmation hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee next week, the portraits being painted of him have become ever more cartoonish, nasty, and one-dimensional. … Behind the caricatures, however, are real questions. Who, really, is Sam Alito, and what kind of a justice would he be? An analysis of Alito's writings as a Reagan administration lawyer, and of his opinions from the bench, reveals him to be a solidly conservative jurist but one who also pays deference to precedent. … His lengthy paper trail suggests he will accelerate the court's shift to the right on several important issues," including abortion, civil rights, capital punishment and federalism.

Roberts, Alito Seen As Likely Allies Of Business. Academics and business experts say Chief Justice John Roberts and Alito are likely to be allies of manufacturers and business, The AP (1/1, Cassata) reported, "One represented corporate interests as a private attorney; the other often sided with employers in lawsuits filed by workers. Beyond their decisions in individual cases, the Roberts court also has the potential to craft a consistent philosophy on business issues, something that several academics argue has been lacking in recent years since the departure of Lewis Powell in 1987. … The court's highly selective docket for the current term will give Roberts and Alito, assuming the latter is confirmed, ample opportunity to shape the court. Among the critical issues for companies are the Supreme Court's decisions in antitrust cases, government regulation of land development and the commerce clause. … Abortion and social issues dominate the public debate over the Supreme Court, but business matters make up a significant portion of the justices' work."

Interest Groups To Intensify Rhetoric In Debate Over Alito Nomination. USA Today (1/3, Kiely, Memmott, 2.31M) reports the Senate hearings on Judge Samuel Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court "are set to begin Monday. This week, groups on both sides of the debate plan to launch elaborate phone, e-mail and ad campaigns." Ralph Neas of the People for the American Way said, "There's no question there will be an acceleration of efforts." Neas "plans a wave of TV ads" in opposition to the nomination. Meanwhile, Christian Myers of Progress for America said, "It's game time now, and we're making a serious push." The "conservative group will spend $500,000 to broadcast a pro-Alito ad on cable television and in four states where senators may be undecided." Other groups, "from the conservative Focus on the Family to the liberal Leadership Council on Civil Rights, plan phone banks, e-mail blitzes and visits to newspaper editorial boards and radio hosts." But "relatively few senators will get most of the attention. One is Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, a centrist Pennsylvania Republican who will preside over Alito's confirmation hearings." Both sides are "focusing on senators whose votes will help determine whether there's enough Senate support for a filibuster." The key senators "are centrists; all say they're undecided about Alito. Several face re-election fights this year. The biggest group is 'red state Democrats.'"

The New York Times (1/3, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports that in the "final days before" the Alito hearings, "partisans on both sides are pulling out all the stops in an effort to sway public opinion. Moving beyond Judge Alito's judicial record, a coalition of liberal groups is preparing commercials attacking his integrity and credibility instead, several people involved in the effort said Monday." Conservatives, "for their part, are capitalizing on ethnic pride to rally Italian-American support for Judge Alito with public events and newspaper advertisements. The efforts are aimed particularly at the Northeastern States, where some moderate Republican senators have expressed doubts about his confirmation." The advertising campaigns "on both sides are the most visible components of a last-minute push by advocacy groups anticipating a potentially close Senate vote." People "involved in the liberal coalition, which includes People for the American Way, the legal group Alliance for Justice, the A.F.L.-C.I.O., the N.A.A.C.P., the Sierra Club and abortion rights groups, said it planned to run new commercials, beginning this week with radio and television advertisements in selected states intended to undercut Judge Alito's credibility." The sources "said the first advertisements would focus on occasional lapses from a pledge Judge Alito made at the 1990 hearings for his confirmation to the appeals court that he would recuse himself from cases involving the companies that managed his mutual fund investments, Vanguard and Smith Barney."

Alito View's On Reapportionment Cases Seen As Debatable. In a New York Times editorial observer story (1/3), Adam Cohen says, "There has been a lot of talk about the abortion views of Judge Alito, President Bush's Supreme Court nominee. But his views on the redistricting cases may be more important." Sen. Joseph Biden "said recently that Judge Alito's statements about one person one vote could do more to jeopardize his nomination than his statements about Roe v. Wade. Rejecting the one-person-one-vote principle is a radical position. If Judge Alito still holds this view today, he could lead the court to accept a very different vision of American democracy, one in which it would be far easier for powerful special interests to get a stranglehold on government."

Critics Said To Be Wrong For Seizing On Alito's Memos In Abortion, Wiretap Cases. In a New York Times op-ed (1/3), former Reagan Administration solicitor general Charles Fried says Judge Alito's "opponents have seized upon two memorandums he wrote when he was a junior lawyer in the office of the solicitor general: one on the Thornburgh case, which dealt with Roe v. Wade, and the other on Mitchell v. Forsyth, which addressed the attorney general's personal liability for wiretaps found to violate the Constitution. Determined to fit the man to the Scalito caricature with which they hope to defeat his nomination to the Supreme Court, Judge Alito's detractors ignore the context and the content of both documents." But "these were not the writings of a political operative seeking to make trouble or advance an agenda. The solicitor general takes a case to the Supreme Court only when some other part of the government - perhaps a division of the Department of Justice or another agency - recommends it." As in "every case, a junior staff member was assigned to analyze these recommendations and propose a course of action to the solicitor general. It fell to Judge Alito to write those memos." But what is "remarkable in both cases is that Judge Alito recommended against taking the position that more senior, politically appointed officials were urging the solicitor general to take before the court. In the abortion case, not only the head of the civil division but also other high-ranking officials were urging that I, as the solicitor general at the time, ask the court to overturn Roe v. Wade. The bottom line of Judge Alito's memo was that I should not do that."

Roberts Calls For Tighter Court Security, Pay Raises For Judges. US Chief Justice John Roberts yesterday called for better court security and higher salaries to ensure a diverse mix of judges on the bench. Reuters (1/2, Charles) reports that Roberts wrote in his 2005 Report on the Federal Judiciary, "I recognize that it is a bit presumptuous for me to issue this report at this time, barely three months after taking the oath as chief justice," but, "But I do not intend to start the new year by breaking with a 30-year-old tradition, and so will highlight in this report issues that are pressing and apparent." Reuters adds, "Roberts expressed concern over violence directed at judges and in courts in the past year. He mentioned the murders of a U.S. district judge's husband and mother in Chicago by an angry litigant, and a court shooting in Atlanta that left a judge, court reporter and deputy dead. … Roberts also returned to a theme that Rehnquist regularly mentioned in his annual reports: the need to raise pay for judges. … Roberts said the real pay of federal judges has declined since 1969 by almost 24 percent, while the real pay of the average American worker during the same period had increased by more than 15 percent."

Bush Team Notable For Lack Of Turnover. The Washington Times/AP (1/3) reports the loyalty of President Bush's aides have limited turnover. After "two wars, devastating strikes by terrorists and hurricanes, a bruising re-election and countless legislative battles, President Bush's team is continuing the trend -- defying history and shake-up rumors to remain almost entirely intact five years in." Only a "handful of the president's most senior aides have departed since Mr. Bush came to Washington in 2001. Though some have shifted roles, it's a familiar cast of characters at the president's side: Vice President Dick Cheney, Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr., political guru Karl Rove, Deputy Chief of Staff Joe Hagin, counselor Dan Bartlett, budget chief Joshua B. Bolten, White House Counsel Harriet Miers and press secretary Scott McClellan." Bush's Cabinet "has seen more turnover than his top-level White House staff. Still, a third of the 21 Cabinet-rank positions are held by the same person as when Mr. Bush came to Washington." David Gergen said, "I don't think there's any other president in the modern era that has seen this kind of stability."

Medicare Drug Program Gets Off To An "Uneven" Start. A somewhat negative story in the New York Times (1/3, Pear, 1.19M) says the Medicare prescription drug program "got off to an uneven start across the country" this week. The Times says that while people "who applied early and had identification cards in hand were often able to fill prescriptions through the new program," others "were stymied in their efforts to take advantage of the drug benefit, as pharmacists spent hours trying to confirm eligibility and enrollment by telephone and computer." The Times adds, "Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said he was pleased with the first days' experience. 'Many thousands of people were able to get their prescriptions filled,' he said."

Many Seniors Still Befuddled As Medicare Drug Benefit Takes Effect. ABC World News Tonight (1/1, story 2, 2:35, Harris) reported, "The beginning of 2006 means millions of senior citizens can get prescription drug benefits through Medicare. Pharmacists say tomorrow may be the busiest day of the year, with many seniors coming in with many questions about their plans. While 43 million seniors are eligible, only 1 million have signed up for what some consider the most confusing government benefits ever." ABC (Yang) added, "Medicare officials say there's still plenty of time. Enrollment ends May 15th. They're now running TV ads, encouraging people to help their moms and dads. … Medicare officials say one of the most efficient ways to sort through all the options is on the Internet. But 75% of seniors say they've never even been online."

The CBS Evening News (1/1, story 5, 2:20, Roberts) reported, "Huge fanfare and a lot of confusion are accompanying the biggest change in Medicare history. The government's new prescription drug plan which is supposed to make drugs more afford to believe millions of Americans seniors goes into effect today." CBS (Chen) added, "20 million low income Americans" are "being forced off state drug coverage programs and into the myriad of prescription plans run by private insurance companies. Supporters expect as many as 10 million more will voluntarily sign up, though only one million have so far."

Gingrich Urges GOP To Propose Lobbying Reforms. Former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich was asked on CBS' Face the Nation (1/1, Schieffer) if Republicans are in danger of suffering losses in this year's elections due to scandals tied to several GOP congressmen. Gingrich relied, "I think that this coming year…is going to be a very big year of decision for Republicans. We have to be the party of reform. We can't just be the party of pork barrel. … I'd look very seriously at completely rethinking the relationship with lobbyists. I'd require every lobbying activity to be listed on the Thomas system, the computer system people can access, so you'd know if your member of Congress, whether they went golfing, whether they had dinner. I'd make this stuff public and transparent. I'd consider not allowing fund-raisers in Washington. I think this whole system has grown, frankly, a little sick with insiders raising money for insiders to re-elect insiders to do favors for insiders. I think this is not just a Republican problem. Don't misunderstand me. But I think we are much more naturally the party of reform than the Democrats are."

Cheney, Rumsfeld Have Neighboring Estates On Maryland's Eastern Shore. A lengthy story on the front page of the Washington Post's (1/3, C1, Montgomery) Style section looks at the "expensive waterfront estates" of Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in St. Michael's, Maryland. Rumsfeld's retreat, Mount Misery and Cheney's place, Ballintober, are "are separated by two miles of narrow lanes." The Post reports, "What gives? Is a secret weekend war cabinet forming? Are yachts and duck decoys part of the plan to transform the military? Did Cheney tire of his secure undisclosed hideaway and opt to join Rummy in his serene disclosed getaway? We are probably thinking too hard. The search for obscure meaning -- that reflex for overinterpretation -- is so Western Shore. The Bay Bridge is where you lighten up and leave behind your fevered quest for the matrix behind the mask. … Cheney may be the first part-time resident with a full Secret Service detail, but the famous, the rich and the powerful of Washington (and New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh) have been setting a course for St. Michaels and the wider, watery Talbot County for generations. The area has functioned like the Adirondacks did for the swells of the Gilded Age, Newport for the robber barons and the Hamptons for Wall Street. But somehow St. Michaels…survives as an anti-Newport, a non-Nantucket, an un-Hamptons. Not overrun, overpriced, overglitzed. Not yet."

Mankiw Offers New Year's Resolutions For Lawmakers. In Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.11M), N. Gregory Mankiw, former chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, offers a list of New Year's resolutions, which "any senator, congressman or presidential wannabe is free to adopt… as his or her own." Among Mankiw's resolutions: "This year I will be straight about the budget mess. I know that the federal budget is on an unsustainable path. I know that when the baby-boom generation retires and becomes eligible for Social Security and Medicare, all hell is going to break loose. I know that the choices aren't pretty -- either large cuts in promised benefits or taxes vastly higher than anything ever experienced in U.S. history. I am going to admit these facts to the American people, and I am going to say which choice I favor." Mankiw adds, "This year I will admit that there are some good taxes. Everyone hates taxes, but the government needs to fund its operations, and some taxes can actually do some good in the process. I will tell the American people that a higher tax on gasoline is better at encouraging conservation than are heavy-handed CAFE regulations. It would not only encourage people to buy more fuel-efficient cars, but it would encourage them to drive less, such as by living closer to where they work." Mankiw also writes, "This year I will be modest about what government can do. I know that economic prosperity comes not from government programs but from entrepreneurial inspiration."

Grassley Makes Case For GOP Deficit Reduction Bill. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley writes in USA Today (1/3, 2.31M), "In such a partisanship-first environment, any fair-minded move toward a more responsible budget is surely welcomed by the taxpayers. The GOP-sponsored deficit reduction bill is that sort of initiative. It's modest, representing just one-half of 1% of what would otherwise be spent during the next five years. Its Medicaid provisions reflect what governors nationwide -- Republicans and Democrats -- asked Congress to do to help them manage the program in their states and ensure its viability for low-income pregnant women and children." Grassley adds, "The tax relief in question is also part of stemming the red ink in Washington. The tax policies passed by the Senate and House aren't new at all. They merely extend expiring tax laws so that taxpayers aren't hit with a tax increase. This legislation is needed to protect 14 million families from the alternative minimum tax meant for wealthy individuals. It includes tax breaks for higher education and teachers who buy classroom supplies. It closes tax shelter loopholes. And it includes pro-growth measures that have helped fuel our economy." Grassley concludes, "Congress needs to do a lot more to control spending and reduce the deficit, but it's wrong to dismiss a step in the right direction."

USA Today Says GOP Bill Lacks Conscience. An accompanying editorial in USA Today (1/3, 2.31M) says "it would be nice to see in Washington a new commitment to fiscal restraint and a resolve to bequeath a solvent government and robust economy to future generations. To listen to many Republican lawmakers, a move in that direction is underway. … It would be nice to see it that way, but to believe that is to believe in fairy tales. This political sleight of hand is simply too small to matter and is designed to evade the real financial predicament — runaway health care costs, unsustainable retirement benefits and tax rates receipts well below historical averages. The cowardice in that is bad enough, but the measure is also cruel. Virtually all of Congress' cuts are made to programs for the poor and the young, who lack organized lobbies. Absent congressional conscience, they are simply targets of political opportunity. And be assured conscience is lacking." USA adds, "Congress will not deserve credit until it takes on health costs, tells seniors it can't sustain a Social Security system in which one of every three adults collects benefits, and raises taxes for the wealthy back to more reasonable levels. Until then, each year will bring the nation and the federal government only closer to fiscal crisis."

West Virginia Coal Miners Trapped After Mine Explosion. Rescue crews yesterday sought desperately to reach 13 West Virginia coal miners trapped after a mine explosion in Tallmansville. The story was the lead on both CBS and NBC last night; ABC was preempted for college football last night. The CBS Evening News (1/02, lead story, 4:00, Schieffer) reported, "They are still not certain what caused it. A lightning strike is the best guess now, but before dawn this morning, there was an explosion at a coal mine in Tallmansville in central West Virginia. Tonight 13 minors are trapped there, some 160 feet underground. They have air purifying equipment but no oxygen. For most of the day, poisonous gas has kept rescue workers from trying to reach them. But late today, rescue workers did enter the mine." CBS (Orr) added, "An eight-man rescue team has just entered the mine and are now traveling a tunnel in the hill behind me going some two miles inside the hill trying to reach the miners who are trapped there. So far it's a bit grim because there's no communication with the trapped miners."

NBC Nightly News (1/2, lead story, 3:15, Holt) reported, "Tonight, a life and death drama is taking place outside a coal mine in West Virginia." NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 2, 2:45, Holt) also spoke with NBC News Robert Hager, who covered the 2002 Quecreek Mine accident, where nine miners were successfully rescued after begin trapped by a flood. Hager said, "This one looks grimmer to me, mostly because in that case, they were dealing with a flood. In this case, it's been an explosion, and an explosion does two things. It creates a lot of debris and it's blocked the shaft, and eats up oxygen." The Washington Times/AP (1/3, Smith), Washington Post (1/3, A1, Tyson, Vedantam, 744K) and New York Times (1/3, Dao, 1.19M), among other newspapers, also report the story.

Bernanke Faces Difficult Balance Sheet, Greenspan Comparisons. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Ip, 2.11M) reports that incoming Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke faces "two major stumbling blocks" as he steps into the post being vacated by outgoing chairman Alan Greenspan: "difficult comparisons" with Greenspan and

"a balance sheet with potential land mines." Bernanke's job "is complicated by a balance sheet loaded with debt and possibly overvalued assets. … 'It could be argued that Greenspan is handing Bernanke a poisoned chalice: an economy with an impressive track record, but one burdened with unprecedented financial imbalances,' Martin Barnes, editor of the Bank Credit Analyst, a forecast journal, wrote in November. 'It will be hard to rebuild household savings, reduce the current-account deficit and stabilize the housing sector without causing some economic pain.'"

Economy Expected To Grow For Fifth Straight Year, But At Slower Rate. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Gerena-Morales, Annett, 2.11M) reports, "Strong spending by businesses should power the nation's economy to a fifth straight year of expansion in 2006, according to a survey of economists' forecasts, but a softening housing market is likely to slow the overall pace of growth. For the past five years, real-estate wealth has supported the economy by providing consumers with cash to buy everything from designer kitchens to luxury vacations to new or second homes. Some economists believe that the boom has been responsible for creating more than one million American jobs since 2000." But "as home sales start to slow and the inventory of unsold homes climbs, many economists believe that home prices will rise more gradually, or even decline, delivering a jolt that causes consumers to rein in spending. That, in turn, may cause economic growth to slow." The Journal adds, "The consensus forecast of 56 economists surveyed by The Wall Street Journal is that the nation's gross domestic product -- the broadest measure of economic output -- will grow at an annual rate of 3.5% in the first half of 2006 and 3.1% in the second half. While those growth rates are considered respectable, they would fall short of the 4.1% average of the past 2½ years. … On the positive side, economists expect overall inflation to moderate this year."

Hubbard Credits Bush Tax Cuts With Helping Economy After Recession. Former Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers Glenn Hubbard said on Fox News' Special Report (1/2), "The economy is growing at a potential rate of around 3.5 percent, which is truly extraordinary. It really traces the two things, I think. One is how well financial markets work to allocate risk and capital in the country. And the other is how amazingly flexible American labor markets are. There's really no economy in the world that has capital and labor markets as efficient as this one." Asked about polls showing that President Bush is getting credit for the "revival of the economy," Hubbard said that "the president deserves credit for a set of tax policies that really helped the economy bounce back from the recession. But the underlying strength of the economy has little to do with Washington and a lot to do with the kind of institutions that helped the economy absorb technological change and absorb shocks, whether those shocks in financial markets or the real economy in your Katrina example. That is really the heart and soul of this high growth rate for the economy."

Stock Market "A Dud" In '00s. USA Today (1/3, Shell, 2.31M) reports, "This isn't your father's bull market. The '80s were great. The '90s were even better. But the '00s so far have been pretty much a dud. … It's unlikely, for example, that the Dow Jones industrial average, which declined 0.6% in 2005, will be able to come anywhere near its 228% gain in the '80s and its 318% gain in the '90s. The blue-chip barometer is actually down 6.8% since the end of 1999."

However, the New York Times (1/3, Dash, 1.19M) runs a report under the headline "After A Resilient '05, Wall St. Isn't Counting Out '06," in which it says "the economy proved more resilient than the worriers expected. Consumers continued to spend. The housing market did not collapse. Economic growth has been robust. And the stock market even had a year-end rally going - with the Dow Jones industrial average flirting with 11,000 - until it fizzled in the final weeks." So "it is not surprising that Wall Street has muted the alarms about 2006. Over all, analysts are relatively bullish in their outlooks. But concerns remain about the health of consumer spending and the effects of higher interest rates. Five Wall Street analysts who were surveyed predicted that the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, which closed 2005 at 1,248.49, would end 2006 between 1,170 and 1,400."

Recession Worries Said To Be Rising For 2006. The CBS Evening News (1/1, story 6, 2: 20, Roberts) reported, "Like a roller coaster, the stock market had some wild ups and downs in 2005, but ended up right where it started. So what's next?" CBS (Alfonsi) added, "With big business struggling, unsteady interest rates, and signs of a recession, the best some forecasters are hoping for 2006 is an average year." A lot of investors "saw less-than-strong stock returns in 2005. The Dow finished in the red for the first time since 2002. The S&P was flat and the tech-heavy Nasdaq didn't fare much better. If you consider a year marked with soaring gas prices and natural disasters, those flat numbers don't look too bad. But what was bad news in 2005 could be good news for the market in 2006."

Dallas-Area Among Regions Reporting Robust Employment Numbers. The Dallas Morning News (1/2, Kreimer) reports, "An expanding economy and a skilled labor shortage have sparked a resurgence in the recruitment of employed and unemployed workers alike, including those at the high end of the pay scale, hiring experts say. That makes this year's outlook for job seekers the best since the turn of the millennium. … The Dallas-area job market hasn't seen growth that robust since 2000, when employment rose 3.9 percent, according to Texas Workforce Commission data."

Only Some Parts Of US Said To Be Experiencing Housing Bubble. The New York Times' Paul Krugman (1/2) writes, "In spite of record home prices, housing in most of America remains surprisingly affordable, thanks to low interest rates. That fact may seem to say that there's no housing bubble. But it doesn't. … It's…worth noting that the reason housing was so expensive in 1981 and 1982 was that mortgage interest rates were extremely high. That made recovery easy, because all it took to make housing affordable again was for interest rates to return to normal levels. This time, with interest rates already low by historical standards, restoring affordability will require a big fall in housing prices."

Minimum Wage In 17 States, District Of Columbia Higher Than Federal Level. Nearly half of the US civilian labor force lives in states where the pay if higher than the minimum wage set by the federal government. The New York Times (1/2, Broder) reports, "Seventeen states and the District of Columbia have acted on their own to set minimum wages that exceed the $5.15 an hour rate set by the federal government, and this year lawmakers in dozens of the remaining states will debate raising the minimum wage. Some states that already have a higher minimum wage than the federal rate will be debating further increases and adjustments for inflation." The federal minimum wage was raised from $4.75 in 1997. Since then, "efforts in Congress to increase the amount have been stymied largely by Republican lawmakers and business groups who argued that a higher minimum wage would drive away jobs. Thwarted by Congress, labor unions and community groups have increasingly focused their efforts at raising the minimum wage on the states, where the issue has received more attention than in Republican-dominated Washington, said Bill Samuel, the legislative director of the national A.F.L.-C.I.O."

NYTimes Says Congress Should Raise Minimum Wage. An editorial in the New York Times (1/3, 1.19M) says, "The federal minimum wage has been a paltry $5.15 an hour for more than eight years. Polls show that there is strong popular support for raising it, but Congress has resisted. Unions, community groups and advocates for the poor are increasingly taking the matter directly to voters through state referendums to raise their states' minimum wages, according to an article yesterday in The Times. Their intentions are laudable, but the efforts only highlight Congress's failure to set the federal minimum wage at a reasonable level." The Times adds, "State minimum-wage referendums are not ideal. Policy matters of this kind are best handled by legislatures, and the nation would be better off with a uniform federal standard. But given where the federal minimum wage now stands, state-level initiatives are the only game in town. Those grass-roots debates may shame Congress into taking long-overdue action to help the lowest-paid workers."

WSJournal Decries NEA Use Of Members' Dues. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.11M) says "If we told you that an organization gave away more than $65 million last year to Jesse Jackson's Rainbow PUSH Coalition, the Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation, Amnesty International, AIDS Walk Washington and dozens of other such advocacy groups, you'd probably assume we were describing a liberal philanthropy. In fact, those expenditures have all turned up on the financial disclosure report of the National Education Association, the country's largest teachers union. Under new federal rules pushed through by Secretary of Labor Elaine Chao, large unions must now disclose in much more detail how they spend members' dues money." The Journal adds that "even a cursory glance at the NEA's recent filings" exposes "the union as a honey pot for left-wing political causes that have nothing to do with teachers, much less students. … It's well understood that the NEA is an arm of the Democratic National Committee. (Or is it the other way around?) But we wonder if the union's rank-and-file stand in unity behind this laundry list of left-to-liberal recipients of money that comes out of their pockets."

WSJournal Praises Yale's Refusal To Give Anarchist Professor Tenure. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.11M) editorializes, "Until recently, David Graeber was an associate professor of anthropology at Yale University, with a field specialty in Madagascar and a salary of $63,000. He is also a self-declared anarchist who has been arrested at antiglobalization rallies. Last spring, Yale denied him tenure. Mr. Graeber was outraged, suspecting the decision might have something to do with his politics." The journal adds, "One might fairly ask of Mr. Graeber why, if his anarchist convictions are sincere, he would seek to join the very employing class that he is otherwise pledged to struggle against. … In recent interviews, Mr. Graeber has given his answer: 'I'm not really an anarchist as a professor,' he told the New York Times. 'I figured I'd be a scholar in New Haven and an activist in New York.' So it turns out that even anarchists have their bourgeois ambitions. That's fair enough, but so is Yale's decision to deny Mr. Graeber tenure, and for what we suspect were not political motives. Among the qualities that characterize Ivy League faculties these days, hostility to liberal or radical politics isn't among them."

WPost Says Baltimore's Problems Predate O'Malley. An editorial in the Washington Post (1/3, A16, 744K) says, "No doubt, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley rues the day when, as a candidate for office, he pledged to reduce the number of murders in the city to 150 annually. Instead, Baltimore's murder rate has remained stubbornly high -- it has not dipped below 250 since Mr. O'Malley took office in 1999 -- and this year the numbers attest again to the ongoing bloodbath. … Now that Mr. O'Malley is trying to become governor, Baltimore's murder rate represents a natural soft target for his political foes. … The question is how much blame can be fairly apportioned to Mr. O'Malley. Under his administration, overall violent crime in Baltimore, including rapes, robberies and assaults, has dropped sharply -- more sharply, in fact, than it has in other large cities. Real estate values have soared and, probably more significantly, Baltimore has stanched the outflow of middle-class residents who fled the city for years, right through the 1990s. Mr. O'Malley's popularity in the city is broad and deep, and no one accuses him of not trying to attack the murder rate head-on." The Post adds, "Political opponents of Mr. O'Malley can make all the hay they want, but the failures in Baltimore that have contributed to the ghastly murder rampage -- including low-performing schools and inefficient parole, probation and juvenile justice systems as well as the drug scourge -- predated his time in office. At issue is how effectively has Mr. O'Malley stepped up to those problems as well. His attempts and failures to rein in the murder rate deserve scrutiny, but so do government and society at large in Maryland -- and at all levels."

New State Laws Deal With Technology, Security. The Christian Science Monitor (1/3, Scherer, 61K) reports on new state laws which will take effect this year. The Monitor reports, "A number of state legislatures have focused on the impact of technology. For example, some automobile companies are installing 'black boxes' in their more expensive models. These devices, like those in airplanes, record the direction and speed of a car, steering and braking performance, and the status of the driver's seat belt. Now, Nevada has enacted legislation that requires manufacturers to notify buyers if a car contains such a device and what the black box can record. In addition, the information in the box can be downloaded or retrieved only by the owner of the vehicle. … Many states have also become alarmed over 'security breaches,' especially by companies with credit-card or Social Security information. Six states - Connecticut, Illinois, Louisiana, Maine, Minnesota, and Nevada - are requiring companies to notify consumers if sensitive financial information has been stolen. Connecticut goes even further: Residents can "freeze" their credit reports if there has been a slip-up. New Jersey and Virginia, meanwhile, have barred making public a person's Social Security number."

Liberal Crusader Hirschkop Nears Retirement. The Legal Times (1/2, McLure) reports on the impending retirement of long-time liberal attorney Philip Hirschkop, who is "known not only for his legal prowess but his bombastic and outspoken manner. Hirschkop, now 69, is preparing to close his law offices in Old Town Alexandria, Va., marking the end of a colorful, four-decade career that made him an icon among left-wing lawyers." The Times continues, "For the past two decades, Hirschkop has served as the outside general counsel for People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, the controversial animal rights group known for its militant advocacy of vegetarianism and its proclivity for throwing pies at fur-wearing fashionistas. … But long before he hoisted PETA's standard in battle, Hirschkop had made his mark as a civil rights lawyer and as an opponent of the Vietnam War. Perhaps his most significant case was Loving v. Virginia, a landmark 1967 U.S. Supreme Court case that overturned Jim Crow-era laws banning interracial marriage — a case in which Hirschkop presented the main argument when he was just two years out of law school." The Times adds, "Since that auspicious start, he's worked for a member of the House Un-American Activities Committee, donned a Viet-Cong armband to protest the war, and stood for the free-speech rights of the American Nazi Party. In one six-year span, 17 disciplinary complaints were brought against him at the Virginia State Bar — a distinction Hirschkop bears proudly. The complaints, he says, were 'never for screwing a client, only for making public statements' about pending litigation."

Relief Agency Head Urges Donors To Choose Charities Carefully. Richard M. Walden, president of the international relief agency Operation USA, writes in the New York Times (1/3, 1.19M), "Money is the mother's milk of disaster relief. And over the last 12 months - with the Indian Ocean tsunami, the hurricanes on the Gulf Coast and the Pakistan earthquake - fund-raising records have been broken by the King Kong of relief agencies, the American Red Cross, and by many smaller organizations as well. … In late November it was reported that the American Red Cross still had $400 million of the $567 million it had collected for the tsunami since Dec. 26, 2004. Meanwhile, many of the countries hit by the waves, all of which have their own national Red Cross or Red Crescent societies, continue to beg for more help with housing, health and education programs. Why our Red Cross holds on to so much money is a mystery, but it is hardly the only agency that does so. A survey by InterAction, an umbrella group of relief agencies, found that many other charities reported spending far less than they took in last year; an average of just 42 percent of the money received by 62 relief groups providing tsunami relief has been spent." Walden adds, "With the incendiary combination of huge government contracts, Internet fund-raising and appeals based on mass disasters, the charity business has entered a new age. Americans should continue to help those in dire need, but they should also look around before sending a check or clicking the 'donate' button."

Two Rescued After Plane Crashes Near New York City. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 6, :20, Holt) reported, "A successful rescue today just north of New York City. Police and Coast Guard helicopters pulled two men out of the frigid Hudson River after their single-engine plane went down shortly after the pilot had issued a mayday call. An FAA spokesman says the men were a flight instructor and his student. Both are being treated tonight for hypothermia."

New Rules Could Lead To Increased Minimum Credit Card Payments. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 7, 2:20, Holt) reported, "Just in time for those post-holiday bills to start piling up in your mailbox, some new rules that banks are now enforcing that will lead to higher minimum credit card payments for everyone. As of now, 13% of credit card holders pay just the minimum payment each month. And if you're among them you may be in for a surprise when you open that next bill." NBC (Shamlian) added, "Too many customers are saying 'charge it' too often. At least, that's the view of banking regulators who are behind the guidelines aimed at getting people to pay more, so they can get out of debt quicker. In the past, some minimums didn't cover even the interest due. The government guidelines say payments should cover at least 1% of principal, plus interest and fees. As of this month, all banks are complying." Nessa Feddis, American Bankers Assn.: "For the consumers in the long term, it means they'll pay less interest and they'll pay the balance off more quickly." Shamlian: "It could be a painful transition. On a balance of $5,000, the payment would jump from $100 to $200 a month. But that larger minimum payment means the debt would be erased in about two and a half years instead of almost seven years."

Questions Raised About Attorney Suing Ex-Client For Former Adversary. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Davies) reports, "Don King makes a good living off boxers in the ring, and Judd Burstein has done well off Mr. King in the courtroom. … Since 1997, Mr. Burstein, a Manhattan lawyer, has scored a string of legal victories representing fighters in contract disputes against boxing's most famous promoter. In all, Mr. Burstein estimates he has cost Mr. King $25 million and pocketed $3 million to $4 million for himself." The Journal continues, "The acrimony between the two has been so intense over the years that Mr. Burstein once referred to the promoter as a 'cancer' on boxing. Mr. King described Mr. Burstein as an 'insidious insect.' … But now, Mr. Burstein finds himself in Mr. King's corner. The pugnacious attorney has switched sides and is representing the fight promoter in a lawsuit against Christopher Byrd, the International Boxing Federation heavyweight champ, whom Mr. Burstein recently represented in a suit against Mr. King. 'It's good to have him on my payroll now,' Mr. King says of Mr. Burstein." The Journal adds, "There's no rule explicitly prohibiting lawyers from representing someone they once sued. But legal experts say it's rare for an attorney to sue one person on behalf of a client and then sue the former client on behalf of the former adversary. … Complicating matters: The previous lawsuit and the current one involve a dispute over the same contract."

Texas Said To Be At Epicenter Of 2006 Congressional Races. The Dallas Morning News (1/2, Gillman) says Texas "is sure to be the epicenter of this year's congressional races, thanks to some unique factors, especially the trial of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and Democrats' efforts to leverage his ethics problems into a national wave." Unless DeLay "is convicted or the court throws out Texas' current congressional map, voters can expect spirited contests in only three Texas districts, and the campaign that officially begins today– the deadline for candidates to file paperwork to run in the March 7 primaries – probably won't alter the lineup much." DeLay "has his legal woes. Freshman Rep. Henry Cuellar, a Laredo Democrat, won the primary by just 58 votes two years ago after several bitter recounts. And Rep. Chet Edwards of Waco is a Democrat in a heavily Republican district." DeLay's district "is solidly Republican, but analysts say he's vulnerable, noting that he drew just 55 percent of the vote in winning an 11th term in 2004." Cuellar "served as Gov. Rick Perry's secretary of state and volunteered on the Bush presidential campaign, and his rivals say he's a Republican in disguise. … The district is solidly Democratic. The challenge will be to win without a runoff in April." Edwards "won his eighth term with just 51 percent. Two Republicans have spent months vying for the right to take him on in President Bush's hometown district: Iraq war veteran Van Taylor and Tucker Anderson, a former aide to Dallas Rep. Pete Sessions, a Republican."

GOP Said To Be At Disadvantage In 2006 Midterm Elections. The Washington Times (1/3, Lambro, 90K) reports President Bush and the Republicans "face a tougher midterm election landscape in 2006, due largely to the closely divided American electorate and, ironically, the gains the Republicans have made in the past decade." Few analysts "expect the Democrats to regain control of the House or Senate in November, but many think they likely will pick up seats in both chambers and cut into the Republican advantage in governorships. Republicans have a larger number of vulnerable seats to defend, particularly in Democratic-leaning 'blue' states." Political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said, "This year still looks very much like a Democratic year, and the only question is how big a year it will be for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and the Democratic Congressional Committee. … At this point, Democratic gains appear to be inevitable." The Times identifies Senate race opportunities for the Democrats in Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Ohio, and for Republicans in Minnesota, Maryland, and New Jersey. In the House, "most analysts say Democrats could pick up a half dozen seats, well below the 15-seat gain they would need to win majority control." In the state houses, Democrats "appear likely to make modest gains…where Republicans hold a 28 to 22 advantage."

Dionne Says GOP Disunity Could Hurt Showing In Midterms. In his Washington Post column (1/3, A17), E.J. Dionne says, "The 2006 elections will determine whether Rove's brilliantly constructed machine has staying power or falls apart in the face of adversity. And there was adversity in abundance during 2005." But it is "three strikes and you're out: The social-issues right can't help Bush if its support drives away too many moderates. Pro-business economics can't help if it drives away many in the middle class. And the war on terrorism doesn't help if Bush is seen as managing it badly." It is "customary in columns of this sort to say somewhere around now that the Democrats will need to come up with a plan, a message, a program, etc., etc. I'm all for such things. But in 1958, 1966 and 1978, the out party gained ground largely by exploiting the failures of the party in power and exacerbating the contradictions in its coalition. If the Democrats prosper in 2006, it will be because whatever program they come up with achieves those goals."

Schneider "Political Earthquake" Required For Democrats To Retake Congress In 2006. William Schneider said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/2), "Ever hear of the six-year itch? It's a disease presidents often get after their party has held the White House for six years. The symptoms? Big setbacks for the president's party at the polls. It happened to the Democrats in 1938 and 1966. And to the Republicans in 1958, 1974, and 1986. On the average, the president's party lost 44 House seats and seven Senate seats in those elections. Democrats need to gain just 16 seats this year to win control of the House of Representatives, and seven to take over the Senate. Piece of cake? Not exactly. Very few seats change party these days. Most House seats are safe for one party, and only three Republican senators running for re-election are from blue states." It "would take a political earthquake for the Democrats to win control of Congress this year. But you know, earthquakes have been known to happen."

Barone Also Says Democrats Are Unlikely To Retake House. Michael Barone of US News and World Report said on Fox News' Special Report (1/2), "Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to win the House, that doesn't seem very many. But if there are only 25 races that are very seriously contested, a net gain of 15 is pretty hard to achieve. So, [DCCC Chairman Rahm] Emanuel is trying to broaden the field and make some districts seriously contested that people would not have thought were in the past." Barone added that retaking the House is "a long shot for the Democrats."

Barnes Says Democrats Won't Win House Or Senate Control. Fred Barnes was asked on Fox News' Special Report (1/3) for his predictions for 2006. Barnes said, "I think Democrats will win House seats, but not the House. They'll win Senate seats, but not control of the Senate. I expect Arnold to be reelected as governor of California. And President Bush's job approval rating, which has bumped up to 50 percent in a couple of polls already. Will stay around 50 percent or higher for most of 2006." Barnes added, "The emerging star among Democratic presidential candidates is Russ Feingold, a Wisconsin senator. Among Republican presidential candidates is George Allen, the Virginia senator."

Trump Rules Out Gubernatorial Bid, Hints At Run For White House. The New York Post (1/3, Dicker, 624K) reports that Donald Trump on Monday "flatly ruled out running for governor this year -- but hinted he may go for president in 2008. Trump, in a phone call to The Post…declared, 'I'm not going to run for governor because I'm having too much fun doing what I'm doing now." While Trump "repeatedly ruled out a race for statewide office, he strongly suggested he was interested in entering the national political arena in 2008. Trump, who considered an independent run for president in 2000, pointedly noted that his decision not to run governor this year 'doesn't preclude me from doing something [political] in the future.' He then repeatedly ducked questions on whether he would consider running for the White House, repeating that he's too busy for electoral politics. But a political figure close to Trump told The Post, 'Donald is definitely interested in running for president in 2008, possibly as an independent candidate.'"

NYC Transit Strike Seen As Avoidable. In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/2) Meyer S. Frucher and Joseph M. Bress, former directors of the Governor's Office of Employee Relations for New York State, write, "New York City's transit workers are back on the job. … The city, meanwhile, lost an estimated $1 billion during a frigid holiday shopping week that saw seven million commuters stranded. There's a better way than this to get a contract, and we can institute it simply by building on existing New York state law." The authors note that Gov. Mario Cuomo "signed an amendment to the Taylor Law that specifically addressed transit negotiations, offering a binding arbitration procedure to break deadlocked talks."

Bolton Initiatives Would Give Security Council Members Enhanced Power. he Washington Post (1/2, A7, Lynch) reports John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, "said he will start the new year by reinvigorating stalled efforts to restructure management of the world body, beginning with a controversial push to seek assurances that the Security Council's five major powers will be guaranteed posts on a new Human Rights Council. Bolton said in an interview that the Bush administration wants to ensure that the United States is never again denied membership in the United Nations' principal human rights body, as it was in 2001, when Austria, France and Sweden defeated a U.S. bid for membership in the Geneva-based Human Rights Commission. … The proposal is part of a broader drive by Bolton to place the five permanent Security Council members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- at the center of U.N. decision making."

Musharraf Backs Off Pledge To Take On Madrassas. The New York Times (1/2, Masood) reports, "As the incendiary training at some of Pakistan's seminaries drew renewed focus in the weeks after the July 7 bombings in London, President Pervez Musharraf promised to bring the schools into the mainstream and expel their foreign students by the end of the year." But" his tough pledge has fizzled." Last week, "the government backed away from its deadline and said it would not use force to deport the students." The schools then "said they would resist any effort to round up the students, and on Sunday, a coalition representing the seminaries called the government's plan 'inhuman, immoral and totally illegal,' The Associated Press reported." The schools, called madrasas, "were once the Islamic equivalent of Sunday school. … Of the four suicide bombers in the London attacks, at least one had spent time at a madrasa here with connections to militant groups."

The Washington Times (1/2, Ansari) adds "Western intelligence agencies suspect that madrassas served as rendezvous points between senior al Qaeda operatives and Tanweer, Khan and other British recruits." Musharraf, however, "relented on Thursday after clerics said they would rather be incarcerated than comply with orders to expel foreigners or give their names to the authorities."

UN Asks To Interview Assad In Hariri Probe. The Financial Times (1/3, Biedermann) reports, "United Nations investigators on Monday said they want to interview Bashar al-Assad, Syria's president, and Farouq al-Shara'a, his foreign minister, in connection with the murder of Rafiq al-Hariri, Lebanon's former prime minister." The announcement "came days after Abdel-Halim Khaddam, Syria's former vice-president, indicated that Mr Assad might have been personally involved in the run-up to the murder." The UN probe "was awaiting answers from Syria after requesting to speak to Mr Assad, Mr Shara'a and others, a spokesperson for the commission said."

The New York Times (1/3, Fattah, 1.19M) says "the request compounds pressure on the Syrian government just days after a stunning public attack on the president by his former vice president raised new questions about whether the government had been complicit in the assassination." A spokesman for the United Nations investigation told The Associated Press "the commission had sent a request to interview Mr. Assad and Mr. Sharaa, among others," but "would not specify when the request was made. It was not immediately clear whether the request had any connection to the allegation by former Vice President Abdul-Halim Khaddam on Friday that Mr. Assad threatened Mr. Hariri's life months before the assassination."

Former Syrian Vice President Breaks With Assad On Hariri Probe. The Financial Times (1/2, Biedermann) reports, "Syria's former vice-president Abdel-Halim Khaddam said on Friday that he has 'full confidence' in the UN-investigation into the assassination. The UN-team, until recently led by the German prosecutor Detlev Mehlis, has implicated senior Lebanese and Syrian officials." Speaking on the Arab satellite television station al-Arabiya from Paris, "where he has been staying for the last couple of months," Khaddam "announced a break with his country's leadership. He blamed President Bashar al-Assad for a deterioration in Syria's international position. And he said that if Syria had indeed killed Mr Hariri, it could not have happened without the knowledge of Mr. Assad."

Protestors Demand To Know Fate Of Missing Lebanese. The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Shadid) reports, "In the heart of downtown Beirut…women every day…protest demanding to know the fate of their children. Many believe they languish in jails in neighboring Syria. Others are not sure. Behind them, their children's faces stare from pictures tacked to billboards, blank faces with generation-old haircuts, the dates of their disappearances reading like a war memorial yet to be built. The protest…serves as a stark reminder, organizers say, that Lebanese society has yet to confront, much less resolve, the legacy of the most cataclysmic event in its modern history -- the 1975-90 civil war. Fifteen years later, that conflict is still shrouded in silence. Under a 1991 amnesty law, all but a handful of killings were placed beyond prosecution." The Post adds, "The protest's longevity reflects the changes unleashed by the departure of Syrian troops last spring after a 29-year presence. It is a sign of new transparency in public discourse as Lebanon."

Abbas May Delay Palestinian Elections. The New York Times (1/3, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "The Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, on Monday raised for the first time the possibility of delaying legislative elections this month, saying the vote would be impossible if Israel did not allow residents of East Jerusalem to participate." Said Abbas, "We are all in agreement that Jerusalem has to be included in the election. … And if it is not included, all the factions agree that there will be no elections." But "a Hamas official in the Gaza Strip, Mahmoud Zahar, told reporters there had been no agreement to accept another delay." Hamas "agreed last summer to postpone the elections, originally scheduled for July, but has insisted on the vote's going ahead this month."

British Hostages Freed In Gaza. The Financial Times (1/2, Davi) reports, "Three Britons held hostage in the Gaza Strip were released by their kidnappers on Friday night, according to unconfirmed reports from Palestine. Human rights worker Kate Burton, 24, and her parents had been freed, Palestinian mediator Kamal Sharafi said. However, the Foreign Office in London was unable to confirm the reports." The Times adds, "Concern grew through the day over the fate of the Britons, after the Palestinian police chief earlier said there had been no demands or contacts from the unidentified hostage-takers."

Palestinian Security Officers Free Italian Hostage. The New York Times/AP (1/2) reports, "Palestinian security officers stormed a building on Sunday where an Italian hostage was being held, freeing the captive in a shootout with his kidnappers." It was "a rare show of force in a wave of kidnappings, shootouts and other violence in the Gaza Strip that has embarrassed the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, threatening to undermine his Fatah Party in Jan. 25 legislative elections and to strengthen Hamas, the Islamic militant group." The hostage, Alessandro Bernardini, an aide in the European Parliament, "was abducted early Sunday in Khan Younis." The Washington Times (1/2, Barzak) runs the same AP story.

Italian Tourists Taken Hostage In Yemen. The Washington Times (1/2, Mounassa) reports, "Yemeni tribesmen took five Italian tourists hostage yesterday -- one day after freeing a German family of five that included a former ambassador to Washington. Of the five Italians, three women refused to be released later in the day, insisting on returning to their male companions who remained in captivity, local officials said." It was "the fourth abduction of foreigners in the country in three months."

Ahmadinejad Reportedly Causing Unease Inside Iran. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Siamdoust) reports, "On the surface, little seems to have changed in the Iranian capital since President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad took office in August. … But underneath the veneer of normality, Iranians are watching as their controversial president settles into office — and their country hardens under his fundamentalist leadership." The Times goes on to report, "To both insiders and outsiders, the political face of Iran seems to have drastically changed. … Ahmadinejad, draped in a Palestinian kaffiyeh, the scarf that he has appropriated to signal his struggle against perceived injustice, has stirred international ire with virulent anti-Israel rhetoric. Meanwhile, his habit of immersing politics in sacred Islamic tradition has chafed critics within Iran." According to the Times, "But even in Iran's mostly conservative parliament, the hard-line president has found himself unable to get traction. In a first for the Islamic Republic, lawmakers turned down four of the ministers Ahmadinejad asked them to approve. It took him three months and four candidates to seat an oil minister. Some reformist legislators even agitated for hearings on the president's 'lack of political competence.'"

Krauthammer Predicts Israel Will Attack Iran This Year. Syndicated columnist Charles Krauthammer, on Fox News Sunday (1/1, Wallace), predicted, "Israel will launch a military strike on Iranian nuclear facilities. There are rumors today in German newspapers that the U.S. and NATO are talking about this. I don't imagine the U.S. or NATO will do this." Israel "will feel that the world isn't acting, and it's going to act on its own."

Sharon To Undergo Heart Surgery. The AP (1/2, Federman) reports, "Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will undergo a heart procedure Thursday to close a small hole that apparently led to his recent stroke, his office announced Sunday." Doctors "said last week that the procedure, known as a cardiac catheterization, would virtually eliminate the risk of Sharon suffering a similar stroke."

In Abrupt Reversal, Russia Restores Most Gas To Ukraine Pipeline. The Washington Post (1/3, A12, Finn, 744K) reports, "Russia retreated abruptly Monday from its confrontation with Ukraine over natural gas prices, after an uproar in West European capitals over dead-of-winter cuts in gas supplies threatened to undermine Russia's ambition to expand its highly profitable role as a strategic energy partner of the European Union." The "state-controlled Russian energy giant Gazprom" said it "would almost completely restore reductions it made Sunday in the gas it pumps into Ukrainian pipelines that connect to the rest of the continent." The New York Times (1/3, Kramer, 1.19M) adds Gazprom "officials…presented the decision not as a reversal but as a response to Ukraine's 'theft' of natural gas." But "it became clear almost immediately that the driving force in Russia's decision was the sharp criticism across Europe, including countries like Germany that are usually reliable allies."

The Financial Times (1/3, Correspondents) says "European countries on Monday suffered large cuts to their gas supplies as a bitter stand-off between Russia and Ukraine over gas prices intensified. Supplies of Russian gas to Italy fell by 25 per cent, according to Eni, the country's biggest oil and gas supplier. Deliveries of Russian gas to France dropped up to 30 per cent, Gaz de France said. Many central and eastern European countries, which depend heavily on gas from Russia, reported even larger declines."

The Wall Street Journal (1/3, White, Cummins, 2.11M) notes "the sudden crisis highlighted concerns about Europe's dependence on Russia, which supplies a quarter of the continent's gas, at a time of growing fears that the Kremlin is using energy as a political weapon." The Christian Science Monitor (1/3, Weir, 61K) runs a similar report in which it says that "with 80 percent of Russian gas exports flowing through Ukraine, wintry Europe could be hard hit." The Washington Times/Reuters (1/3, Clothier) runs a similar story.

In an analysis piece, the New York Times (1/3, Chivers, 1.19M) says for "President Vladimir V. Putin and Russia, 2006 was supposed to be a banner year. Instead, it has begun badly, and with problems of the Kremlin's own making. The Kremlin, which labored in 2005 to distance itself from the ill will that accompanied its destruction of the Yukos oil company and the bungled handling of the rigged Ukrainian presidential election in 2004, has begun the new year with a display of politics and bullying, followed by partial retreat, that is raising fresh questions about its reliability as an international energy partner."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/2, Romans) said "critics of President Putin say he's using Soviet-style tactics to bully Russia's neighbors." In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.11M) says, "Putin certainly has a flair for timing. The Russian President is assuming the chairmanship of the G-8 democratic nations in the same week that he's been attempting some Soviet-style energy extortion against Ukraine. … The Kremlin's real goal here isn't money so much as political influence over its democratic, free-thinking and formerly subservient Slavic neighbor. A year ago Ukraine's Viktor Yushchenko used his 'Orange Revolution' to defeat the Kremlin's handpicked presidential candidate and turn toward the West. The energy squeeze is Mr. Putin's attempt at revenge, notably coming less than three months before Ukraine's parliamentary elections."

David Satter, who is "affiliated" with the Hoover Institution, the Hudson Institute and Johns Hopkins, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.11M), "With Sunday's accession of Vladimir Putin to the presidency of the G-8, post-Soviet Russia has achieved a new level of recognition and prestige as a democratic state. The recognition is undeserved. Instead of being democratic or even becoming democratic, Russia is daily sinking deeper into authoritarianism and lawlessness. … The Putin regime cannot ignore the views of G-8 colleagues. This is why the West needs to use all its influence to counteract Russia's self-destructive behavior."

Winter Weather Cuts Aid To Earthquake Refugees In Pakistan. The Washington Post/AP (1/3, A14, Khan) reports Pakistani earthquake survivors "struggled Monday to keep their children warm as the bitter winter hit Kashmir, grounding helicopter aid flights and blocking roads for the second straight day. … The Pakistan meteorological office forecast continued rain and snow for the next two days and low temperatures of 21 degrees Fahrenheit in the plains and 7 degrees Fahrenheit above 5,000 feet. For the second straight day, helicopters from the United Nations, foreign militaries and Pakistan's army were not able to deliver winterized tents, clothes, food and other provisions in the quake zone because of poor visibility, said Maj. Farooq Nasir, an army spokesman. They were trying to move supplies by truck, but mudslides and snow have also made some roads impassable, he said."

New Russian Law On NGOs Seen As Stifling Democracy. NBC Nightly News (1/1, story 10, 2:20, Mendenall) reported, "This week, Russia passed a new law that tightens the Kremlin's control over nearly a half million non-governmental organizations or NGOs, many of which have been critical of the president. Like Human Rights Watch, which says the Kremlin, irked by reports of human rights abuses, could use the new law to close it down. … The law also makes it harder to operate for other prominent US organizations promoting democracy, which Putin has accused of spying and supporting political revolutions on Russia's borders in Ukraine and Georgia, something the Kremlin doesn't want to spread much to Russia's borders."

Last Alternative Russian News Outlet Beset By Turmoil. The New York Times (1/2, Kishkovsky) reports, "Recent turmoil in the news department of REN-TV, Russia's last nationwide television network with independent news programming, has caused concern among media analysts and free-speech advocates in the country. … REN-TV has been known for critical news reporting that offered an alternative to state channels' uniformly positive coverage of President Vladimir V. Putin, media analysts said. Its signal reaches more than 113 million people, although its audience share hovers around 5 percent."

Taiwan's President Calls For Increased Defense Spending. The New York Times (1/2, Bradsher) reports Taiwanese President Chen Shui-bian "called Sunday for increased arms purchases and warned against greater economic ties to mainland China, in a televised speech that silenced months of speculation that he might soon seek to improve relations across the Taiwan Strait." The Times notes, "The speech was Mr. Chen's first major policy address since his Democratic Progressive Party fared badly in islandwide municipal elections on Dec. 3. … The Nationalist Party, which favors closer relations with Beijing, did much better in those elections."

Pakistan Negotiating Purchase Of Chinese Nuclear Reactors. The Financial Times (1/3, Bokhari) reports, "Pakistan is negotiating the purchase of between six and eight nuclear power reactors from China during the next decade in the most ambitious expansion yet of the country's nuclear energy capability. … The plants are expected to be completed by 2025, with construction starting by 2015, a senior Pakistani official told the Financial Times."

Sudanese Refugees In Egypt Vulnerable Following Deadly Riot. The New York Times (1/3, Slackman, 1.19M) reports, "Hundreds of Sudanese have been released from police detention camps onto the streets of this city with no money, no place to live - and in many cases, no shoes - three days after the riot police attacked a squatter camp set up as a protest to press the United Nations to relocate the migrants to another country. … The attack officially left 26 dead, including seven small children, and many others injured." The Times adds, "So many were left dead, and the international condemnation was so embarrassing, that President Hosni Mubarak has told the attorney general to investigate. But the government's official position is that the Sudanese were to blame. Magdy Rady, the government's chief spokesman, said the Sudanese injured their own people by trampling those who collapsed, and he said they also attacked the police, injuring more than 70 officers." The Times notes, "The Sudanese were unarmed and many were barefoot. The police were wearing riot gear, including helmets with face shields, and wielded truncheons."

Korean Retailers Exert Power In China. The New York Times (1/2, Onishi) reports, "At Korea City, on the top floor of the Xidan Shopping Center, a warren of tiny shops sell hip-hop clothes, movies, music, cosmetics and other offerings in the South Korean style. To young Chinese shoppers, it seemed not to matter that some of the products, like New York Yankees caps or Japan's Astro Boy dolls, clearly have little to do with South Korea. Or that most items originated, in fact, in Chinese factories. … From clothes to hairstyle, music to television dramas, South Korea has been defining the tastes of many Chinese and other Asians for the past half decade."

Morales Election Seen As Evidence Of Castro's Growing Influence. The Washington Post's Jackson Diehl (1/2) writes, "Here's a sad but safe new year's prediction: U.S. relations with Latin America, which plunged to their lowest point in decades in 2005, will get still worse in 2006." Bolivia's Evo Morales "will probably take instruction from Chavez, Kirchner and Fidel Castro -- who at age 79 must believe he is finally seeing the emergence of the totalitarian bloc he and Che Guevara tried and failed to create in the 1960s."

Bolivia's Morales Says He Will Be America's "Worst Nightmare." Time (1/9, Padgett) reports that Bolivia's President-elect Evo Morales "won a stunning landslide in last month's election in no small part because he pledged to legalize far more cultivation of coca, which Aymara Indians like him have chewed for centuries for traditional medicinal purposes and which the U.S. has tried for decades to eradicate in Bolivia because drug traffickers use it to make cocaine. Morales impishly claims that coca-leaf extract is part of the formula of the classic American beverage Coca-Cola (a legend the company has consistently declined to comment on) and adds, 'It's not right that exporting coca is legal for Coca-Cola but not for the rest of us!' The Yankee baiting is part of Morales' stated intention to be the U.S.'s 'worst nightmare.'" The Bush Administration "has reason to be spooked. Morales' win has helped build momentum for a resurgence of leftist and often anti-U.S. candidates around Latin America. At least nine presidential races are slated for the region this year, and leftists could win at least five -- including those in the two most populous countries, Brazil and Mexico, as well as in coca producers like Peru and Ecuador. Leftists have toppled conservative governments in Uruguay and Honduras, and socialist Michelle Bachelet is favored to win Chile's presidential runoff on Jan. 15. To punctuate the situation, the radical left-wing President of oil-rich Venezuela, Hugo Chavez…is all but certain to be re-elected at year's end."

Ivory Coast Military Installation Attacked. The New York Times/AP (1/3) reports, "Gunmen attacked the main military barracks in Abidjan, Ivory Coast's largest city, on Monday, with gunfire and heavy explosions that shook the surrounding area, authorities said. The armed forces chief, Gen. Phillipe Mangou, said that the attack occurred around 6 a.m. at Camp Akuedo, and that military forces had repulsed it. There was no word on who carried out the assault."

Subsistence Farming Said To Encourage Child Labor In Ethiopia. The Washington Post (1/3, A1, Wax, 744K) reports Ethiopia "has one of the highest rates of child labor in the world," according to the UN. Nine million children "are employed, 90 percent of them in the agricultural sector. … Factors pushing children into the fields include ancient farming techniques, overworked land, the AIDS epidemic and a booming population of 74 million." The Post notes, "It is also an impoverished rural society where 85 percent of the population farms two-acre plots of land, too small to turn a profit, and nearly every plot is worked to exhaustion. Studies have shown that cultures dependent on subsistence farming also have the highest rates of child labor."

Former Political Prisoners Detail Burmese Junta's Abuses. The Washington Post (1/3, A12, Sipress, Nakashima, 744K) reports on Burmese political prisoners Min Ko Naing and Myo Myint both of whom "passed more than a third of his life in prison when both were released in 2004. Min Ko Naing, 44, remained in Burma, under scrutiny of the secret police. Myo Myint, 43, fled to a small town just over the border in Thailand. Their testimony, provided in separate interviews last month, highlights the psychological and physical abuse endured by political prisoners in Burma, which is ruled by a military junta. More than 1,100 people remain in jail for seeking democratic reform, according to Amnesty International. The two men's accounts reveal how determined they remain to press for social change despite torture inside prison walls and only the remote prospect for a shift in power outside them. Myo Myint now works with a group advocating prisoner rights. Min Ko Naing is urging the government and its opponents to set aside political differences to ease the country's deepening poverty and treat spreading disease."

Strike Follows Purge At Beijing Newspaper. The Christian Science Monitor (1/3, Marquand, 61K) reports, "An emotional strike by 100 journalists at [Beijing's] most popular and lively newspaper follows a 16-month campaign to quash a broad range of 'unapproved' public speech in areas verging on politics or society. … In the case of Beijing News, whose progressive editor Yang Bin was replaced without warning last week, Chinese authorities dealt a seemingly fatal blow to a publishing project that two years ago gave the press some freedom to experiment. Last June the paper reported on violent land disputes in Hebei province, and last month, in what may have precipitated the purge, it published tame, but independent, stories on the official coverup of a massive benzene chemical spill in the Songhua River. Last Thursday, in a gritty south Beijing neighborhood, nearly 100 reporters left the news offices. They began a short-lived strike - a rarity in China - and signed a petition asking for Mr. Yang's reinstatement."

Kirchner Seen As Moving Argentina To Left. The New York Times (1/3, Rohter, 1.19M) reports, "Just four years ago, Argentina's economy was prostrate and its politics in chaos, after a financial crisis resulted in bank deposits being frozen, the government defaulting on more than $100 billion in debt and five presidents holding office in two weeks. But on Tuesday, the country is expected to pay off the last of its debt to the International Monetary Fund and simply walk away from further negotiations with the group. … The $9.8 billion payment is an important symbolic milestone and just one of several recent signs that President Néstor Kirchner appears to be concentrating more power in his own hands and steering his government to the left. Since a midterm election victory in October, Mr. Kirchner has also moved to establish an alliance with Venezuela's populist leader, Hugo Chávez, and, as a traditional Peronist, to extend the hand of the state deeper into the economy, the judiciary and the news media."

LATimes Says North Korea Worsening Famine With Secrecy. The Los Angeles Times (1/2) editorializes, "Many third world countries would have been driven to the wall by back-to-back years of floods and drought. But North Korea, which suffered nature's disasters a decade ago, makes its problems worse with its leader's paranoid, Stalinist determination to isolate the nation from outsiders. For 10 years, the United Nations' World Food Program has done what it could to limit the number of deaths by famine, providing millions of tons of food worth more than $1 billion. When Pyongyang sometimes refused to let U.N. officials visit a province, the organization cut off the food. Its policy of 'no access, no food aid' is necessary to ensure that dictators such as North Korea's Kim Jong Il don't take the milk and grain and give it to their soldiers and trusted civil servants, rather than those who need it most. But now North Korea has forbidden private charities and the U.N. agency to deliver food. Pyongyang claims an improved harvest last year, and help from China and South Korea, will provide enough to feed its 23 million people. But outside experts are doubtful. A more likely reason for stopping food aid is to keep foreigners away and increase the already tight control by Kim's regime."

NYTimes Says Administration "Name-Calling" Against Korea Is Counter Productive. The New York Times (1/3, 1.19M) editorializes, "Calling North Korea nasty names is easy and satisfying. Negotiating is hard and frustrating. So for four years, the Bush administration put more creative energy into name-calling than into serious talks. The main result was that the North moved four years further along toward being able to threaten its neighbors with nuclear weapons. … The North can afford to take its time over resolving the nuclear issue, wasting diplomatic energy on disruptive and bullying tactics. The United States cannot afford that luxury. It makes little sense for the Bush administration to return to name-calling or to rule out high-level talks on the Patriot Act sanctions." According to the Post, "The window that briefly opened for diplomacy after John Bolton moved from nonproliferation issues to the United Nations is once again in danger of being slammed shut, reportedly at the urging of Vice President Dick Cheney and Mr. Bolton's successor in the nonproliferation job, Robert Joseph."

Today's Events In Washington 44

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Plans Focus On Iraq, Economy For 2006. In a story that runs over 2100 words highlighting political and policy opportunities for the Administration -- as well as potential pitfalls, USA Today (1/3, Jackson, Page, 2.31M) says that while past president have faced their greatest difficulties during the sixth year of their tenure, the White House is making preparations for a "better year" ahead. USA adds that for President Bush, 2005 "was a year of growing public impatience with the Iraq war, angst over record gas prices, devastation from Hurricane Katrina, the collapse of his Social Security plan and, finally, a firestorm over his decision to authorize targeted domestic spying without court warrants. Now he faces a challenge that has upended the best-laid plans of his predecessors: his sixth year in office." However, the White House "and its allies see opportunities, though, sixth year or not." Top aides "say Bush aims to travel more often and speak out more forcefully, touting the economy as underappreciated good news." To "avoid the sort of stalemate that undermined his Social Security proposal, Bush will downsize his domestic agenda, proposing changes in immigration law but shelving, at least for now, plans for a tax overhaul." White House spokesman Scott McClellan "says the basic game plan is simple: 'The economy and progress in Iraq.'" USA adds Bush's "most powerful aide, Karl Rove, has invited think-tank analysts, authors and others to the White House for ideas to help reinvigorate the president's domestic agenda." But there is "trouble on the horizon, too, and events that are outside White House control," such as in Iraq, the CIA leak investigation, and the Abramoff probe. USA then outlines the White House's planned strategy across a number of policy fronts.

The Washington Times (1/3, Sammon, 90K) reports President Bush "is planning to spend 2006 getting back to the basics of his agenda by making the case for his policies on Iraq and the economy instead of pursuing lofty new domestic initiatives." White House spokesman Trent Duffy said, "The president will begin the new year very much in the way he left 2005, which is to discuss the country's two top priorities, keeping our economy strong and growing stronger and creating jobs, and also winning the war on terrorism." The Times adds that is "not to say Mr. Bush will not reveal new initiatives in his State of the Union address, tentatively scheduled for Jan. 31. But those initiatives are expected to be more modest than his ambitious quest to reform Social Security, partly because it will be harder to enact his agenda in a congressional re-election year." Aides "hinted that Mr. Bush will try to make his tax cuts permanent, pass an immigration reform law and push for additional energy legislation, including a measure to open oil exploration in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska. Although he has not officially abandoned Social Security reform, he will spend less time promoting the long-shot initiative."

Democrats To Attack Bush, GOP On Privacy Issues. The Washington Times (1/3, Hurt, 90K) reports congressional Democrats "are drafting a strategy to attack the Bush administration and Republicans as having little regard for the privacy of Americans." Before Christmas, Senate Minority Whip Richard Durbin said, "We will initiate at the beginning of this year one of the most serious debates and discussions on Capitol Hill in our history about individual rights and liberties." The Times adds the "topic will be a major focus of the Supreme Court confirmation hearings of federal Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. as privacy rights -- the political code phrase for abortion rights -- already has become a major issue, Mr. Durbin said." Democratic leaders "then plan to keep the issue alive as they continue their opposition to key parts of the USA Patriot Act, which is set to expire in early February unless extended." But the "real payoff, Democrats say, will be the hearings into President Bush's authorization of warrantless spying on terror suspects."

Comey Opposed Parts Of NSA Domestic Spying Program. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/2, Romans) reported, "The White House is vowing to aggressively defend its program to secretly wiretap Americans in the days and weeks ahead. But this upcoming offensive comes amid new reports of serious internal debate in the Bush administration over the legality of this program." CNN (Quijano) added, "Government officials say during at least part of James Comey's tenure as deputy attorney general, he vigorously opposed parts of the National Security Agency's secret domestic surveillance program and refused to sign off on its renewal." On Sunday, President Bush "would not comment directly when asked whether he was aware of any high-level resistance to the NSA program. Instead, he again forcefully defended its use, calling it legal and necessary." CNN added that "sources have told CNN that the surveillance program was stopped in 2004 for a short time because of legal questions. Some changes were then made to the program, but it's not clear what those changes were."

Williams Says Domestic Spying Program Is Hard To Defend. Pete Williams said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/2) that the domestic surveillance program is "a hard program to defend, because we don't know the extent of it or precisely how it worked. … Now, the legal justification they make is twofold. First, they say, the president has a constitutional authority as commander-in-chief to do this. And secondly, they say, when Congress authorized the use of military force, which was right after 9/11, it gave the president whatever authority he needed to do in wartime. Intelligence gathering, the administration argued, is incident to making war and the president has authority under that law as well. That's been their legal argument.

Mitchell Says Administration Needs To Be "More Out Front" About Eavesdropping. Andrea Mitchell of NBC News said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/2), "I think [Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen] Specter is a bellwether. … Right now the administration is pressing Specter to give this up and let the intelligence community do this in secret. And he's been arguing that this needs to be the Judiciary Committee. That there are major legal issues involved. One of the things that the White House probably is still resisting, but really needs to do, is be a little bit more out front, because it's not just a handful of cases. It's at least 500 people at a time being eavesdropped upon. And in fact, there were millions and millions of calls and e-mails that were swept up in this electronic vacuum cleaner.'

Thomas Says Presidents Always Give Themselves Power In Times Of War. Evan Thomas of Newsweek said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/2) that this is "an historic moment. A couple hundred years of presidents in times of crisis reaching out, giving a lot of power to themselves. Inevitably, there's a reaction, first it starts with a bureaucracy, it's a little slow and then seeps into the public. You can trace this after Watergate, Vietnam, World War II, World War I, every time we have a war, presidents do this. Eventually there's a reaction. I think that reaction is beginning now. What's not clear is how severe it is, whether the president is going to get whapped back, but you can feel some emanations off of Capitol Hill, as often where it starts, that people are starting to say, hey, maybe the balance is a little bit out of whack here."

Bush Defends Domestic Wiretap Program. President Bush on Sunday visited San Antonio to meet with wounded Iraq veterans and staff at the Brooke Army Medical Center. That visit, however, was largely upstaged by what NBC called his "strongly worded defense" of the Administration's use of the National Security Agency to wiretap people in the US. Other reports also tended to state say Bush defended the program "strongly" or "fiercely." The President made the remarks as media reports indicated there was some dissension within the Justice Department over the legality of the program -- and as four senators backed holding hearings. The story was the lead on NBC, while CBS covered it in a full segment and ABC mentioned it briefly. Today's major newspapers also cover the story in depth.

NBC Nightly News (1/1, lead story, 2:30, Costello) reported the President said, "yet again, in a very strongly worded defense," that "if al Qaeda is trying to call someone, the government should now who and why." Bush "felt compelled again to defend the secret White House program to monitor email traffic and listen into the phone calls of as many as 500 Americans each day without court approval. Mr. Bush said only international calls to and from the US and involving known al Qaeda sympathizers were tapped." President Bush: "It seems logical to me if we know a phone number associated with al Qaeda and or an al Qaeda affiliate, and they are making phone calls, it makes sense to find out why." Costello: "The President again emphasized Congress was kept informed of the program, which was regularly reviewed by the Justice Department and found to be legal. But the New York Times reported that then-Deputy Attorney General James Comey resisted approving parts of the spying program out of concern that it wasn't legal. And Newsweek reports in a cover story that then-Attorney General John Ashcroft refused to overrule Comey, while Time magazine reports that the President even bypassed top Justice Department attorneys who normally reviewed top-secret intelligence programs."

The CBS Evening News (1/1, story 4, 2:00, Roberts) reported, "Bush again fiercely defended his domestic spying program, one that authorizes the government to monitor conversations to and from the US without a court warrant." In an "attempt to dissuade congressional hearings its legality, he says even the program's disclosure has damaged national security and in answer to criticisms about possible civil liberty violations he argues that spying is limited in scope." President Bush: "If somebody from al Qaeda is calling you, we'd like to know why. In the meantime, this program is conscious of people's civil liberties, as am I." Roberts: "Today four US Senators, including Richard Lugar, the Republican Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee said that hearings on the President's authorization of domestic spying without warrants are appropriate."

The New York Times (1/2, Lichtblau) reports Senator Arlen Specter, "a Pennsylvania Republican and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has already pledged to make hearings into the program one of his highest priorities." In a letter to Specter on Sunday, "Senator Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat who is also on the committee, said the panel should also explore 'significant concern about the legality of the program even at the very highest levels of the Department of Justice.'"

Lugar, appearing on CNN's Late Edition (1/1, Blitzer), said, "I can understand in the context of 9/11 that there may have been, in a common sense way, a reason why calls coming from the Middle East or Afghanistan to America might be intercepted, but I think the Congress quite rightly is trying to take a look at now that we're past 9/11, we're going to have to live with the war on terror for a long, long while." Asked if he advocated holding hearings on the matter, Lugar responded, "I do. I think this is an appropriate time. … I think we want to see what in the course of time really works best and the FISA Act has worked pretty well from the time of President Carter's day to the current time."

Sen. Mitch McConnell, on Fox News Sunday (1/1, Wallace), said, "Thank goodness the Justice Department is investigating to find out who has been endangering our national security by leaking this information so that our enemies now have a greater sense of what our techniques are in going after terrorists. The overwhelming majority of the American people understand that we need new techniques in the wake of 9/11 in order to protect us. … This needs to be investigated, because whoever leaked this information has done the U.S. and its national security a great disservice."

ABC World News Tonight (1/1, story 6, :20, Harris) reported, "There are reports that high-level officials at the Justice Department objected to the Administration's controversial domestic spying program." Reuters (1/2, Zakaria) notes the New York Times "reported on Sunday that James Comey, a deputy to then-Attorney General John Ashcroft, was concerned about the legality of the NSA program and refused to extend it in 2004." White House aides "then turned to Ashcroft while the attorney general was hospitalized for gallbladder surgery, the Times said." The AP (1/2, Riechmann) says Bush "didn't answer a reporter's question about whether he was aware of any resistance to the program at high levels of his administration and how that might have influenced his decision to approve it."

The New York Post (1/2, Mangan, Dicker) reports, "President Bush belittled top Justice Department official James Comey with the nickname 'Cuomo' after the former Manhattan U.S. attorney balked at allowing controversial warrantless eavesdropping to catch terrorists, a new report claims." The Post continues, "Comey acquired the nickname — which referred to New York ex-Gov. Mario Cuomo — after Bush administration officials concluded he was not a 'team player' on that and other issues, Newsweek reports. … Comey, who now is general counsel for the Lockheed Martin corporation, could not be reached for comment. … But Cuomo laughingly told The Post, 'I'll say this — Comey and Cuomo have this in common: They both agree that the president was wrong.' … The White House denied that Bush, who has a penchant for doling out nicknames, tagged Comey with the scornful sobriquet."

New York Daily News (1/2, Siemaszko) reports, "Schumer also said he will ask Specter to question top White House officials such as former Acting Attorney General Jim Comey, who reportedly opposed the secret domestic eavesdropping on legal grounds. … 'When Comey, who was one of the premier terrorism prosecutors in this country, said that he thought this program violated the law ... it calls into question the way the president and the vice president went about changing it,' Schumer said on 'Fox News Sunday.'"

Schumer, on Fox News Sunday (1/1, Wallace), commented, "The problem here is that the President thought there was a problem -- that's legitimate -- but instead of coming to people and saying 'okay, I need changes in the law,' he just changed it on his own. And today's revelations…really heighten the concerns about this. When [former Deputy Attorney General James] Comey, who was one of the premiere terrorism prosecutors in this country, said that he thought this program violated the law, when it's reported that people at the NSA -- and none of these people are left-wing liberals -- had real doubts about the program, it calls into question the way the president and vice president went about changing it."

The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Roche, Chen) says Bush "strongly defended the domestic eavesdropping program," and quotes the President saying, "If somebody from Al Qaeda is calling you, we'd like to know why. … We're at war with a bunch of coldblooded killers."

The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Rein) notes it was Bush's "third defense in two weeks of his secret domestic spying program." The Post quotes Bush saying, "This is a limited program designed to prevent attacks on the United States of America, and I repeat limited." The Post later says, "The president's first public comments of the new year after no public appearances last week offered a glimpse into how his administration intends to deflect congressional inquiries into his authorization of wiretaps on terrorism suspects -- with a vigorous defense of the program as a matter of national security."

The Washington Times (1/2, Curl) adds the President also "criticized anew the leaker who revealed the program to the New York Times, which published a front-page article about it on the day the Senate was scheduled to vote on an extension of the Patriot Act. 'There's an enemy out there. They read newspapers, they listen to what you write, they listen to what you put on the air, and they react,' said Mr. Bush, who added that the leak of the program causes great harm to national security."

NSA Surveillance Credited With Stopping Terror Attacks Post-9/11. Syndicated columnist Charles Krauthammer, appearing on Fox News Sunday (1/1, Wallace), said, "There's a great irony here. Everybody has been asking of themselves for the last four years why haven't we had a second attack. … But what we've heard over the last six months with these revelations, these so-called scandals, of the secret prisons where high-level Al Qaida have been held, the coercive interrogation which is under attack in the McCain amendment, and now the NSA eavesdropping -- we have the untold story which the administration could not tell. It knew why we had been protected. … We had a means, technological, in the NSA eavesdropping, and also other means in capturing these terrorists, of getting information. It's worked. It's held us safe."

DOJ Probes Of High-Level Leaks Seldom Meet With Success. Knight Ridder (1/2, Mondics) reports, "When President Bush defended the National Security Agency after the disclosure that it had spied on hundreds of Americans, he angrily denounced media leaks about the program, and the Justice Department has now opened a criminal probe. … But an ongoing Justice investigation of the president's own staff in an unrelated leak case and the handling of hundreds of other leak allegations each year suggest that the probe of the NSA leak - which focuses on the disclosure of classified information to The New York Times - faces huge obstacles." Knight Ridder continues, "Only two government officials have ever been convicted of leaking classified information to a news organization. Samuel L. Morison, a Navy intelligence analyst, was prosecuted for leaking three spy satellite photos to Jane's Defence Weekly in 1984; Jonathan Randel, a former Drug Enforcement Administration analyst, was convicted in 1999 of leaking confidential information about DEA investigations to a London newspaper." Knight Ridder adds, "More recently, special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald acknowledged difficulty proving that any laws governing the release of classified information were broken in the White House leak to the media of a CIA operative's identity. Fitzgerald did win an indictment Oct. 28 of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Cheney, for allegedly lying to investigators in the case. But after two years, Fitzgerald has charged no one with illegally releasing sensitive national security information - the charge that prompted the investigation. … Mark Corallo, a former Justice spokesman who is now a spokesman for Bush adviser Karl Rove in matters related to the Fitzgerald investigation, said the department typically received hundreds of requests a year from intelligence agencies to investigate leaks, and most cases went nowhere. … One reason is that the Justice Department, despite a handful of high-profile cases, has been reluctant to subpoena reporters who for reasons of confidentiality declined to testify; another is that laws governing such prosecutions require the government to show that the leaker intended to break the law - a difficult hurdle to clear."

Bush Will Begin 2006 "Preoccupied" By Domestic Spying Controversy. Time (1/9, Lacayo) reports that President Bush's 2002 Executive Order allowing the NSA to eavesdrop without a warrant on phone conversations, e-mail and other electronic communications "remained a closely guarded secret" for four years. Time adds, "Because the NSA program was so sensitive, Administration officials tell TIME, the 'lawyers' group,' an organization of fewer than half a dozen government attorneys the National Security Council convenes to review top-secret intelligence programs, was bypassed. Instead, the legal vetting was given to Alberto Gonzales, then White House counsel. In the weeks since Dec. 16, when the program was disclosed by the New York Times, it has set off a ferocious debate in Washington and around the country about how the rule of law should constrain the war on terrorism. That development ensures that the President will start the new year preoccupied for a while with a fight over whether his responsibility to prevent another attack gave him the power to push aside an act of Congress -- or, to use the terms of his harshest critics, to break the law."

In a separate story, Time (1/9, Tumulty, Allen) reports that "the revelation that his Administration has been spying in this country without warrants -- illegally, critics say -- may have put a crimp in Bush's plan to climb back on top of the agenda as the new legislative session begins. 'When Congress comes back,' warns a top G.O.P. congressional aide, 'domestic surveillance and privacy issues will be all over the front pages.' To which the President and his strategists seem to be saying, Bring it on." From the Time the story broke, the Administration "decided its strategy would be to 'overwhelm the skeptics, not back off, not change anything about the program and really home in very strongly on the fact that this is a legitimate part of presidential warmaking power,' says an adviser." GOP strategists "argue that Democrats have little leeway to attack on the issue because it could make them look weak on national security and because some of their leaders were briefed about the National Security Agency (NSA) no-warrant surveillance before it became public knowledge. Some key Democrats even defend it."

"Ferocious" Administration Infighting Delayed Domestic Spying Program For A Time. Newsweek (1/9, Thomas, Klaidman) reports, "NEWSWEEK has learned, ferocious behind-the-scenes infighting stalled for a time the administration's ambitious program of electronic spying on U.S. citizens at home and abroad." Newsweek adds, "It does not appear that President Bush -- determined to stand tall in the war on terror -- or Vice President Cheney, a staunch believer in executive power, hesitated to circumvent FISA. Asserting the broad warmaking powers conferred on the president by Article 2 of the Constitution and by a post-9/11 congressional resolution authorizing the use of force to combat global terror, Bush repeatedly approved of what the NSA calls a 'special collection program' that eavesdropped -- without warrants -- on about 500 Americans a day."

"Reassertion Of Presidential Power" Said To Be At Heart Of Spying Debate. U.S. News and World Report (1/9, Kaplan) reports, "At the heart of the debate over domestic spying is a reassertion of presidential power. Legal advisers to the president have made a case for sweeping executive authority during wartime. The White House's authority to render terrorism suspects jailed without trial and run warrantless eavesdropping, they argue, is authorized by a congressional war resolution passed after 9/11 and by the Constitution's grant of war-making power to the commander in chief. Among the prime supporters of this position is Vice President Dick Cheney, who as White House chief of staff under Gerald Ford saw Congress take back considerable amounts of executive power after the abuses of the Nixon era. But Congress and the courts may now be pushing back. Legal challenges to the administration's detention policy and the FBI's national security letters are winding their way through the courts." Likewise, Time (1/9, Lacayo) says the White House "has been developing a very robust interpretation of presidential power" to "support its aggressive conduct." Vice President Dick Cheney "in particular believes that presidential power has been unreasonably confined since the 1970s." Time adds, "Because they required the President to plainly bypass an act of Congress, the no-warrant wiretaps may be the sharpest expression yet of the Administration's willingness to expand the scope of Executive power."

Domestic Spying Efforts May Be More Widespread Than Previously Thought. U.S. News and World Report (1/9, Kaplan) reports, "A string of revelations in recent weeks suggests that domestic spying programs may be far broader than previously thought." Government officials "have offered spirited defenses" of these programs. They say these allegations of spying "have been misinterpreted and exaggerated," and they "insist that the public expects law enforcement and intelligence agencies to be aggressive in the age of terrorism. President Bush was unapologetic about the NSA's warrantless intercepts. … The FBI, too, has mounted a strong defense. No investigations are opened, officials say, unless there is 'specific information about a potential criminal or terrorist threat.' Mere mention of groups or individuals in an FBI file, agents say, does not mean they are under investigation."

Allegations Have Sparked Lawmakers Into Action. U.S. News and World Report (1/9, Kaplan) reports that "the mounting allegations of domestic spying have sparked widespread concern and prompted members of Congress to action, among them Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who chairs the Senate Judiciary Committee and who will convene hearings later this month. 'I want to know precisely what they did,' Specter said. 'How the NSA utilized their technical equipment, whose conversations they overheard, how many conversations they overheard, what they did with the material, what purported justification there was.' Democrat Rep. Robert Wexler is demanding documents on the Defense Department's secret monitoring program, part of a little-known agency called the Counterintelligence Field Activity."

Time (1/9, Lacayo) adds that "the House and Senate Intelligence Committees are almost certain to make deeper inquiries. Meanwhile, the Justice Department is launching an investigation of its own, into how word of the secret program was leaked." Justice officials "have refused to say whether the overall legality of the NSA program will also be investigated."

Bush Administration "Implored" NYTimes Editors Not To Publish Domestic Spying Story. Time (1/9, Ratnesar) reports on New York Times reporters James Risen and Eric Lichtblau, who broke the story "that the Bush Administration was running a covert domestic-spying program." It "took Risen more than a year to get the story into print -- and not before President Bush personally implored Times editors not to publish Risen and Lichtblau's account of how Bush authorized the National Security Agency to wiretap telephone and e-mail communications inside the US without court-sanctioned warrants." Time adds, "At the center of the article's backstory is Risen, who unsuccessfully pushed to publish the wiretap report last year, then took a leave to write a book, State of War: The Secret History of the CIA and the Bush Administration. It now appears he may pay a price for the disclosure: last Friday the Justice Department opened an investigation into who leaked the existence of the NSA program to the Times, raising the prospect of Risen's being compelled to reveal the identities of the 'nearly dozen' current and former officials who spoke to him about the program or face jail time for contempt of court."

Domestic Spying Debate Follows A "Predictable" Wartime Pattern. Newsweek (1/9, Thomas, Klaidman) reports in its cover story, "The current debate over national security and civil liberties is not new. It follows a predictable pattern of a democracy in wartime. … To understand the current struggle -- and judge how seriously to take the Bush and Cheney bids for power -- it is useful to compare this battle to all the balancing acts that have come before. The facts change, but the pattern varies little: In national crises, presidents reach for power." A president "will almost always choose to violate individual rights over the risk of losing a war." Newsweek adds, "Congress lies low and goes along. … Typically, in times of national peril, Congress gets swept along on a wave of patriotism. … The bureaucracy pushes back. … Though 'bureaucrat' can be a bad name, government careerists are sometimes the only ones who will uphold standards of fairness or decency. They know, too, that they can be left holding the bag if later congressional hearings look into dubious secret operations. … The public and the politicians react -- and overreact. Historically, wartime encroachments on civil liberties have spawned backlashes. … The American public may be less than sympathetic to the targets of the Bush antiterror crackdown. But if the administration is shown to have violated the civil liberties of mainstream peace groups or (heaven forbid!) members of the press, the outcry could produce an overreaction."

More Commentary. Columnist Ruth Marcus, meanwhile, writes in today's Washington Post (1/2) about Bush's domestic spying, and comments, "Perhaps, in the aftermath of Sept. 11, that's how the country wants its intelligence activities conducted." But "living on the edge inevitably risks falling off a cliff - especially if you choose to live there on your own and in secret." Marcus says "the need for legal checks, the importance of congressional oversight, the missteps that inevitably occur when the executive branch is accountable only to itself -- seem to have been ignored by all the parties involved. As Congress gears up for another needed round of hearings, the challenge is not only to discover what happened but also not to forget, again, what was already, painfully learned."

DOJ IG Finds Terror Specialists At US Attorney's Offices Failing To Coordinate. The Washington Times (1/3, Seper, 90K) reports that a report from the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General has concluded that "Intelligence specialists at the 93 US attorneys' offices assigned to identify terrorist activity and assist in prosecutions are not coordinating their efforts and lack guidance." According to the report, though the offices "have made 'valuable' individual contributions to counterterrorism efforts, their overall effectiveness needs to increase through improved coordination and guidance." The IG report "made eight recommendations to improve the use of the specialists, including identifying and providing the standard tools they should use, defining the types of results they should produce, and establishing the quality standards those results should meet. "

Former CIA Official Says Agency May Need A Decade To Build Up Anti-Terror Service. Reuters (1/2, Morgan) reports, "A former CIA counterterrorism officer who tracked Osama bin Laden through the mountains of Afghanistan says the U.S. spy agency could need a decade to build up its clandestine service for the U.S. war on terrorism." Gary Berntsen, "a decorated espionage officer who led a paramilitary unit code-named 'Jawbreaker' in the war that toppled the Taliban after the September 11 attacks," said CIA Director Porter Goss "faces an uphill battle to fill the agency's senior ranks with aggressive, seasoned operatives." Berntsen said in an interview, "He's probably more aggressive than most of the senior officers in the clandestine service. So I think he's having to pull them along a bit." Goss, he added, "is trying to improve the situation. But it's going to be tough. The rebuilding is going to take years. A decade, at least."

Experts Say Padilla Dispute Could Jeopardize Terror War. The Legal Times (1/2, Henning) reports, "This time, audacity may not pay off for Bush administration lawyers. …. Having aggressively — and in the view of their critics, arrogantly — pursued an expansive view of executive power since the start of the war on terrorism, they could see their plans derailed by an escalating skirmish over 'enemy combatant' Jose Padilla." The Times continues, "Last week was punctuated by another round, in a rancorous and highly unusual exchange between the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit and the Bush administration over the detention of Padilla, a U.S. citizen whose case is regarded as a crucial legal litmus test of anti-terrorism tactics. … In late November the government abruptly asked the appeals court to vacate a Sept. 9 decision granting President George W. Bush the right to detain indefinitely U.S. citizens as enemy combatants without charge or trial. It was a move that alienated one of the administration's most reliable judicial allies, the largely conservative 4th Circuit." The Times adds 'The administration's abandonment of its aggressive position in a case that it has touted as crucial to battling terrorists confounded outsiders and infuriated the judges who had previously given the White House a highly favorable ruling. … 'This is perhaps the most important constitutional litigation since September 11,' says Timothy Lynch, director of the Cato Institute's Project on Criminal Justice. 'They severely underestimated the reaction by the judiciary and other legal observers. Maybe they missed the forest for the trees and lost sight of how big this was, but this is going to hurt the credibility of the Justice Department in other terrorism cases.'"

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/2, McGough) reports, "It must have seemed like a good idea at the time. Fearful of another test of presidential power in the U.S. Supreme Court, the Bush administration in November decided to cut its losses and end the 3 1/2-year-long confinement of Jose Padilla as an 'enemy combatant.' .. Mr. Padilla, a Brooklyn-born convert to Islam, was arrested at Chicago's O'Hare Airport in May 2002 and was identified by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft as a participant in an al-Qaida plot to explode a radioactive 'dirty bomb' in the United States. A federal appeals court upheld his detention, but Mr. Padilla's lawyers appealed to the Supreme Court. … Then the Bush administration executed a legal U-turn. It secured an indictment of Mr. Padilla by a federal grand jury in Florida on terrorism charges unrelated to a 'dirty bomb,' announced that he would be transferred from a Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., to a civilian prison in Miami and asked the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond to vacate its decision upholding Mr. Padilla's confinement." The Post-Gazette adds, "The 4th Circuit, one of the administration's favorite tribunals, wouldn't play. It refused to vacate its order or approve of Mr. Padilla's transfer from military to civilian custody. In an opinion by Judge J. Michael Luttig, a conservative icon often mentioned as a possible Bush appointee to the Supreme Court, the 4th Circuit worried about 'an appearance that the government may be attempting to avoid consideration of our decision by the Supreme Court.' … Last week the administration shot back, demanding that the Supreme Court authorize Mr. Padilla's transfer. In a petition filed with the Supreme Court, Solicitor General Paul D. Clement fumed that 'the 4th Circuit's order defies both law and logic' and constituted an 'unwarranted attack' on President Bush's authority. Besides, Mr. Clement said, Mr. Padilla's lawyers hadn't objected to transferring their client. … It is true that in an earlier filing with the 4th Circuit, Mr. Padilla's attorneys had indicated that they wouldn't object to the transfer because they could continue to challenge Mr. Padilla's designation as an enemy combatant. But last week they took a different tack. … The battle of the briefs between the government and Mr. Padilla's lawyers turns on the proper interpretation of a federal court rule that says prisoners seeking a writ of habeas corpus -- as Mr. Padilla is doing -- ordinarily can't be transferred from one jailer to another. But the larger issue in the turf war between the 4th Circuit and the Bush administration is the same one raised in Mr. Padilla's original legal challenge: the scope of presidential power in the 'war on terror.'"

WPost Comments On Changing Government Tactics In The Padilla Case. The Washington Post (1/2) editorializes, "Just when it appeared the case of accused enemy combatant Jose Padilla couldn't get any weirder, the two parties have switched sides. In an emergency brief filed before the Supreme Court last week, the Justice Department asked the justices to step in and allow the government to transfer Mr. Padilla immediately from military to civilian custody so that he can face the criminal charges recently filed against him. This is the same Justice Department that had been arguing for 3 1/2 years that Mr. Padilla could be held without charge on President Bush's order as an al Qaeda fighter - for much of that time without even having access to his lawyers. … The government is now seeking to release Mr. Padilla from his legal limbo, and Mr. Padilla is objecting."

US Said To Be Underutilizing Arab, Muslim Community In War On Terror. Randa Fahmy Hudome, former associate deputy energy secretary in the Bush administration, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/3, A24, 2.11M) writes that while the US government "has focused on the vital national security challenges posed in the post-9/11 environment -- challenges in law enforcement, intelligence gathering and public diplomacy," there is "an untapped resource in all 50 states that can provide insight into many of these challenges -- the American Arab and Muslim community." However, "they have been underutilized on the frontlines of the global war on terror. While President Bush has appointed more Arab- and Muslim-Americans to senior positions than any previous administration, the rest of the government has been slow to follow his lead." Fahmy Hudome states, "The Department of State should create an Arab- and Muslim-American Advisory Board -- made up of experts who reflect the religious, ethnic and geographic diversity of the Middle East -- to advise the US government about issues, sensitivities, perceptions and misperceptions both here and abroad."

Administration Action On Hamadi Release Called Inadequate. Ken Stethem, brother of US Navy Diver Robert Stethem, who was murdered during the 1985 TWA hijacking, was asked on MSNBC's Scarborough Country (1/2), why he wrote to the Bush Administration complaining about the release by German authorities of Mohammed Ali Hamadi, who was convicted of the murder. Stethem said, "We're absolutely unsatisfied with the indifference and the action that they took upon Hamadi's release. … We've gotten two phone calls, one from Andrew Card, wishing us well and saying he's sorry. And then we got one from [State Department Counterterrorism Coordinator] Ambassador [Henry] Crumpton…saying basically the same thing." Stethem went on to say he has not "heard anything" from Congress, "and it's unbelievable." When asked what the Administration's response to his requests has been, Stethem said, "Nothing! We've been trying to get meetings with Condoleezza Rice in the State Department, through the Justice Department since May. And we've not been given the opportunity once. … It's incredible, just incredible to see the president soliciting support for the war on terrorism, the same week that Hamadi is released and the Administration knew about his impending release while the president was preparing that speech."

PATRIOT ACT:

White House To Step Up Defense Of Patriot Act, NSA Surveillance. The Financial Times (1/3, Daniel) reports the White House "will this week step up efforts to defend its policy on the Patriot Act as well as its controversial decision to conduct domestic surveillance on US citizens without a warrant from a judge, in the face of mounting concerns from civil liberties groups." President Bush "began the counter-offensive with a strong defence of his decision in 2001 to authorise the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on those suspected of links to al-Qaeda and of his legal authority to prosecute the war on terror." On Tuesday, Bush "will take part in a meeting on the Patriot Act, the anti-terrorism legislation that Congress failed to renew before the Christmas break. On Wednesday he will make a statement on the 'war on terror' at the Pentagon." As "part of a co-ordinated approach, Dick Cheney, vice-president, will also give a speech about terrorism."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff To Announce Changes To Homeland Security Grant Program. Several media outlets this morning are reporting on the upcoming announcement of changes to the Urban Area Security Initiative. The AP indicates that Secretary Chertoff has sought the changes, while the New York Times notes that he is prepared for some negative response. The New York Times (1/3, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "Facing cuts in antiterrorism financing, the Department of Homeland Security plans to announce today that it will evaluate new requests for money from an $800 million aid program for cities based less on politics and more on assessments of where terrorists are likely to strike and potentially cause the greatest damage, department officials say. The changes to the program, the Urban Area Security Initiative, are being driven in part by a reduction in the overall pool of money for antiterrorism efforts." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who is to announce the shift, said in a speech last month that "the changes he was considering would require an acknowledgment that the nation could not protect itself against all risks." DHS officials "would not offer predictions of what the likely outcome would be in terms of how many cities would see their grants eliminated or cut significantly." Meanwhile, "Mr. Chertoff has made clear that he expects protests when the final grant awards are announced."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/3, A4) reports, "The change…addresses both the destruction and lack of preparedness seen during Hurricane Katrina. It also reflects…Chertoff's efforts to give his department an all-hazards mission -- even though it was created as a direct result of the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks." The AP notes, "Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke would not comment on which cities will be eligible for grants this year." A longer version of the AP (1/2, Jordan) story noted, "Calls to city officials around the country and to the US Conference of Mayors for comment were not immediately returned."

Under the headline "More Cities Eligible For Urban Grants, USA Today (1/3, 2.31M) reported, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff will announce today which cities will receive part of $765 million in annual Urban Area Security Initiative grants. In past years, the grants have gone to the nation's 50 largest cities for terror-related security measures. This year, cities that risk being hit by a natural disaster or health crisis also are eligible."

DHS Issues Manual On Correspondence For Employees. In its "Verbatim" column, the Washington Post (1/3, A15, 744K) runs a portion of "a new manual for correspondence standards and procedures" sent out by Fred Schwien, the Department of Homeland Security's executive secretary. The portion is headlined, "4.3 Statement of Lateness (Note: Not in use until on or about Feb 1, 2006)," and reads, "If a component response does not meet the five-day deadline for returning correspondence to the ES, a statement of lateness is required. … Workload and component priorities are not valid excuses. As stated previously, for the DHS employee tasked with preparing an item for the Secretary or Deputy Secretary signature, there are few, if any, higher priorities."

Deadline Extended For Evacuees To Leave Hotels. Federal officials have extended the deadline for Hurricane Katrina evacuees to check out of their government-funded hotel rooms. The AP (1/3, McGill) reports that the extension comes as the feds "iron out issues arising from a class-action lawsuit. One issue: The Federal Emergency Management Agency, which inherited the program from the American Red Cross, still does not have up-to-date records on the identities of evacuees in the hotel program or where they are staying, according to court papers filed last week by government lawyers. Under a federal judge's ruling last month, FEMA is required to keep the hotel program running until Feb. 7. However, U.S. District Judge Stanwood Duval said FEMA could stop paying for hotel rooms beginning Jan. 7 — Saturday — for evacuees who have been approved or disapproved for other FEMA housing aid, such as a trailer or rental assistance. Now, the Jan. 7 date no longer holds, according to a flier being distributed to hotels in the program. It says: 'The program will continue for all evacuees in all states until further notice pending the resolution of certain issues now in litigation.'"

Residents Await Word On Neighborhood Hit By Katrina Oil Spill. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (1/3, McKay, 2.11M) reports that when the levees that protected the Chalmette, Louisiana "gave way to Hurricane Katrina on Aug. 29, about 1,800 homes were inundated with floodwaters carrying nearly 1.1 million gallons of oil from a nearby refinery. Thick black crude seeped into homes and yards. Officials sealed off the area. A private contractor hired by the refinery's owner, Murphy Oil Corp. of El Dorado, Ark., began cleaning up. But the crews left most homes and yards untouched for weeks until Murphy Oil could track down their scattered owners to seek permission to clean them, the oil company says. Four months after Katrina hit, oil remains in hundreds of homes and yards. This heavily damaged community, which remains mostly abandoned, raises acute personal and public-policy questions: How can residents displaced by Katrina determine if it's safe to return to their homes, and when? And who ultimately should decide?" The Journal notes that "neither federal nor state nor local officials have provided residents with any clear answers. Parish leaders and residents say they expected the federal Environmental Protection Agency to manage the cleanup process and determine when the neighborhood was safe. But the EPA says it's not up to it to decide whether the community should be resettled."

I-10 Repairs Cited As An Example For All Gulf Coast Rebuilding Projects. The New York Times (1/3, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports that while the repair of the twin spans of Interstate 10 over Louisiana's Lake Pontchartrain "has gone unusually right, coming in ahead of time and under budget. By cannibalizing one bridge to fix the other, and then using temporary steel spans to fix the first bridge, the State of Louisiana and the contractor were able to open one span in October and plan to have traffic flowing on the other as early as Jan. 6, nearly two weeks ahead of schedule." The Times adds that following Katrina, "one of the highest priorities was getting the Interstate open, and doing so quickly required creative thinking, dedication and no small amount of luck. … The work was financed by the Federal Highway Administration, which advised Louisiana on the project. Norman Y. Mineta, the federal transportation secretary, said through a spokeswoman that the project was 'serving as a model for the kinds of efficiencies we should try to achieve in all gulf rebuilding projects.'"

Local Gulf Coast Contractors Feel Cut Out Of Katrina Cleanup. The CBS Evening News (1/1, story 7, Roberts) reported, "In the months since Hurricane Katrina hit, Federal agencies have poured billions of dollars into the battered gulf region. But in Mississippi, Bill Whitaker heard complaints from local contractors who say few of those dollars have come their way." CBS (Whitaker) added, "Big players like Ashbritt of Pompano Beach, Florida, awarded a Federal contract worth $500 million and others like Bechtel and Halliburton subsidiary Kellog Brown and Root got contracts for tens of millions dollars more." Socrates Garrett: "And the network of good old boys were already in place." Whitaker: "Socrates Garrett's company is the biggest in Mississippi yet trucks and workers he has in place sit idle." Garrett: "If we can't work then you can bet that other smaller minority firms don't even have a chance." Whitaker: "Mississippi Congressman Thompson says his state's businesses are suffering because FEMA and the Army Corps of Engineers and other Federal agencies responsible for cleanup are playing politics." Rep. Bennie Thompson: "Those are the contracts that have gone to companies that were well connected, had the right lobbyists, contributed to the right party in power." Whitaker: "Ashbritt says it wasn't politics but hard work that won the contracts." Randal Perkins, Ashbritt: "At the end of the day if you're not qualified and capable and ready to handle the challenge given to you you're not getting the contract." Whitaker: "He says most of Ashbritt's subcontracts have gone to Mississippi companies, but Congressman Thompson says they're getting the dregs, the little jobs and little of the Federal money. Mississippi's Republican governor agrees." Gov. Haley Barbour: "We don't think there's a high enough percentage of the work going to local contractors. There's some, unquestionably, but we think there needs to be more."

Nagin Says New Orleans Could Take Three To Five Years To Regain Population. The AP (1/2) reports, "New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin yesterday said it could take three to five years to regain the city's population of nearly half a million before Hurricane Katrina. Mr. Nagin said on CBS' Face the Nation that reopening several public and private schools this month would help raise New Orleans' population to about 200,000, double the current level, as families returned with their children. Shortages of suitable housing would limit further growth over the near term, he said."

Emergency Officials Include Animal Rescue In Emergency Plans. The Washington Post (1/2, B1, Wan) reports on the "merging field of disaster planning for pets, filled with doomsday scenarios, four-legged victims and people who love them. For years, despite an estimated 69 million U.S. households with a pet, animal advocates have been relegated to the fringes of emergency planning. After Katrina, however, and the sight of people in New Orleans refusing to evacuate and in some cases dying with their pets, emergency officials are starting to take animal rescue seriously. By saving the pets, advocates said, owners can be saved as well." The Post adds, "The concept is as old as Noah's Ark, but modern pet disaster planning didn't truly begin, U.S. experts said, until after Hurricane Andrew in 1992. When Andrew tore through South Florida, it killed more than 100 animals in the Miami Metrozoo. Hundreds of others, including baboons, antelope and 500-pound Galapagos tortoises, wandered off through the rubble. Escaped horses drowned in canals. … After Andrew, the federal government created Veterinary Medical Assistance Teams, to be deployed wherever animal-threatening disasters hit. The 1992 hurricane also prompted the Humane Society to establish a department devoted to disaster planning and rescue."

Gulf Coast Seeing Puppy Boom Following Hurricane Katrina. The Washington Post (1/3, A10, Reeves, 744K) reports on a boom in the birth of puppies in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. According to the Post, "Officials say more than 6,000 pets were saved in the region after Katrina came ashore Aug. 29, and many of them were relocated to new homes elsewhere in the country. An unknown number drowned in the floodwaters or died later of injuries. But thousands of animals remain, and humane organizations are beginning to see the result of even small numbers of animals running loose for weeks in neighborhoods where fences were flattened and owners fled.'

Charleston Post & Courier Lauds FBI's Nuclear Monitoring. The Charleston (SC) Post & Courier (1/3) editorializes, "A federal program to monitor radiation levels has quietly sought to defuse one of the greatest terror threats to the nation. Radiation surveillance seeks to diminish the likelihood that terrorists could set off a so-called "dirty bomb" containing radioactive material or, worse, detonate a nuclear explosive." The P&C continues, "The program was recently reported on the Web site of U.S. News & World report, and confirmed by federal officials. It hasn't received the same media attention as electronic eavesdropping and other forms of domestic spying, though it has been criticized by some Muslim groups who feel they are being targeted." The P&C adds, "Radioactivity monitors have been installed at a variety of public locations, including ports and subways since 9/11. There should be no reluctance to use passive monitoring as broadly as is warranted. … Monitoring potential sources of radioactivity by 'sniffing the air' clearly doesn't raise the same issues of privacy as wiretapping. Keeping radioactive material out of the hands of potential terrorists is essential to national security and public safety."

WAR NEWS:

Shiites, Kurds May Drop Allawi From Coalition, Give Sunnis Role. The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Daragahi, 958K) reports, "The victors in last month's parliamentary election indicated Monday that they were prepared to cut a secular politician backed by Washington out of the new government in favor of Iraq's main Sunni Arab slate. The pro-Western politician, former interim Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, did poorly in the Dec. 15 balloting despite spending heavily on a sleek television campaign." The Times adds that "the emerging political alliance lumps together Shiites, Kurds and Islamist Sunni Arabs — and excludes secular Iraqis, hard-core Sunni Arab nationalists and those sympathetic to the Baath Party of ex-dictator Saddam Hussein."

USA Today/AP (1/3) adds "Iraq's main Sunni Arab group made an unprecedented trip north to see Kurd leaders and agreed Monday for the first time on broad outlines for a coalition government." The move "opens a way out of the political turmoil that has gripped the country since disputed parliamentary elections Dec. 15." The agreement "struck by Kurdistan regional President Massoud Barzani and representatives of the main Sunni Arab group, the Iraqi Accordance Front, could lead to a broad-based government." The Accordance Front "will be part of a future government," said Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, "a Kurd who sat in on the meetings."

The New York Times (1/3, Oppel Jr., 1.19M) also reports on the "broad framework for a coalition government," which "drew a rebuke from other Sunni Arab political leaders who accused the Sunni consensus party of violating an agreement to press ahead with claims of Sunni disenfranchisement during the vote on Dec. 15 and to not bargain on their own for a role in the new government."

Despite Poor Election Results, Chalabi Could Play Key Role. Knight Ridder (1/3, Hannah, Youssef) reports, "Even though Ahmad Chalabi apparently lost badly in last month's parliamentary election here, the former Pentagon favorite is still likely to be a big player in the next Iraqi government." The Dec. 15 vote "went largely to ethnic and sectarian coalitions at the expense of secular slates, including his, preliminary returns indicate. That could leave him without a seat in parliament." Yet "the former exile who helped spur the US-led invasion by feeding false intelligence to Washington about Saddam Hussein's alleged weapons of mass destruction, and who returned to Iraq after Saddam's fall to craft himself into a political leader, still has more cards to play. Characteristically, Chalabi, 61, could land on his feet in a high government post even though he failed to win even a minimum of votes from the Iraqi people."

Iraq Facing Fuel Crisis As Oil Minister Quits. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 8, :30, Holt) reported, "There are growing concerns tonight about an oil crisis in Iraq. Fuel prices for Iraqi citizens are way up, supplies are growing scarce and new numbers out today show Iraq's oil exports hit their lowest levels since the war. Today, Iraq's oil minister quit." The AP (1/3, Juhi) adds "Iraq's exports of oil hit their lowest level in December since the war, as the country's oil minister resigned Monday in the wake of protests and riots over soaring gas prices and lengthening lines at the pump. Only 34.4 million barrels were exported in December, or about 1.1 million barrels per day," which was "the lowest average since Iraq resumed exports after the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, according to figures released Monday." The Washington Post (1/3, A12, Hernandez, 744K) also reports the story.

Twelve Iraqis Killed In Insurgent Attacks. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 8, :30, Holt) reported, "At least 12 people, including two children, were killed in violence today.

In the worst incident, a suicide bomber rammed his car into a bus full of Iraqi policemen, killing seven and injuring 13." The CBS Evening News (1/02, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "No American deaths were reported in Iraq today but insurgent violence killed at least a dozen Iraqis."

The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Daragahi, 958K) reports the US military also "reported the deaths of four American civilian contractors involved in a motor vehicle accident on the Asad Air Base in western Iraq on Sunday. Nineteen others, including a Marine, were also injured when their bus was struck by a 7-ton truck, the military said."

Iraqi Volunteer Buries Unclaimed Bodies Of Those Slain In Violence. The CBS Evening News (1/02, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported on the "story of a remarkable man who has devoted himself to honoring the dead, no matter who they were." CBS (Alfonsi) added on Sheikh Jamal-al Sudani's effort to bury the unclaimed bodies of about 250 of those killed in insurgent attacks. Al-Sudani "and his group of volunteers aren't paid. They do this grim job, they say, solely for God's rewards." The "group drives the bodies from Baghdad to Najaf through Iraq. The final stop is the Valley Cemetery, a holy place because a number of prophets are buried there and a practical place because the loose soil makes it easy to bury so many bodies. The bodies of Sunnis, Shiites, Muslims and Christians are all carefully washed and wrap." Terrorists "want to kill him because he cares for the victim of their suicide attacks others because he buries the suicide bombers but he is no stranger to threats. He's been doing this work for 15 years."

Poll Finds Support Among Military For Bush Policies Drops To 60%.

Agence France-Presse (1/3) reports, "Support for President George W. Bush's Iraq policy has fallen among the US armed forces to just 54 percent from 63 percent a year ago, according to a poll by the magazine group Military Times. In its annual survey of the views of military personnel, the group reported on its website that support for Bush's overall policies dropped over the past year to 60 percent from 71 percent." AFP adds, "While still significantly more supportive of the president than the broad US population, the fall in support by military personnel tracks a similar decline in the president's popularity among the general public."

Murtha Says He Wouldn't Join Military Today.

Reuters (1/3) reports, "Rep. John Murtha, a key Democratic voice who favors pulling U.S. troops from Iraq, said in remarks airing on Monday that he would not join the US military today. A decorated Vietnam combat veteran who retired as a colonel after 37 years in the U.S. Marine Corps, Murtha told ABC News' 'Nightline' program that Iraq 'absolutely' was a wrong war for President George W. Bush to have launched." "Would you join (the military) today?," he was asked in an interview taped on Friday. He replied, "No." The interviewer retorted, "And I think you're saying the average guy out there who's considering recruitment is justified in saying 'I don't want to serve.'" Said Murtha, "Exactly right."

On ABC News Nightline (1/2), Murtha said the Administration "got awful lot of bad information" about the situation in Iraq because "they don't talk to Congress. … They don't listen to people with experience." When asked if President Bush "doesn't really know what's going on" in Iraq, Murtha said, "Yes, that's what happens. The President mischaracterizes things because he gets bad information." In the run-up to the Gulf War, former President Bush "would get all kinds of criticism from Democrats and Republicans, and he would patiently listen to it, and then do what he thought was right." The American public "is way ahead of this president. If they think they're fooling the public with their rhetoric, they're wrong. You can't operate that way in today's world. … The American people want to see a clear mission, they want to see an exit strategy."

Father Calls Son's Death In Iraq "A Waste." Paul E. Schroeder, managing director of a trade development firm in Cleveland, writes in the Washington Post (1/3, A17, 744K), "Early on Aug. 3, 2005, we heard that 14 Marines had been killed in Haditha, Iraq. Our son, Lance Cpl. Edward 'Augie' Schroeder II, was stationed there. At 10:45 a.m. two Marines showed up at our door. After collecting himself for what was clearly painful duty, the lieutenant colonel said, 'Your son is a true American hero.' … I am outraged at what I see as the cause of his death. For nearly three years, the Bush administration has pursued a policy that makes our troops sitting ducks. While Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that our policy is to 'clear, hold and build' Iraqi towns, there aren't enough troops to do that. … Though it hurts, I believe that his death -- and that of the other Americans who have died in Iraq -- was a waste" if "Americans stop hiding behind flag-draped hero masks and stop whispering their opposition to this war. Until then, the lives of other sons, daughters, husbands, wives, fathers and mothers may be wasted as well. This is very painful to acknowledge, and I have to live with it. So does President Bush."

Abizaid Optimistic About Turning Control Over To Iraqi Government.

USA Today (1/3, Komarow, 2.31M) reports, "The top US general in the Iraq region says he is optimistic the United States will succeed this year in turning a substantial part of the country over to Iraqi government control, moving US forces into a backup role. The ability of Iraq's military to secure the country is a key condition for the eventual withdrawal of US forces." In an interview this weekend, Gen. John Abizaid, who "was on a short visit to Iraq, prodded his subordinates to turn control of their sectors over to Iraqi forces as soon as the Iraqis are ready. U.S. commanders must overcome their reluctance to turn over control to less-experienced Iraqi forces, Abizaid said." Said Abizaid, "Look, there is always a risk in taking a chance on the people that you've come to help. … There's also a risk of condescension (where) you look at them and say, 'They're not ready.'" Abizaid, "head of US Central Command, declined to speculate on what American troop levels will be at the end of 2006."

Administration Boosts Peacekeeping, Post-War Capabilities. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, King Jr., Jaffe, 2.11M) reports, "The difficulties of rebuilding Iraq after toppling Saddam Hussein have taught President Bush a painful lesson: Aftermaths can be tougher than wars. Now the administration is trying to recalibrate the military and foreign service to better handle postwar developments in future conflicts. For the first time, the Pentagon has declared that, along with battling foes, the ability to foster stability and reconstruction is one of its core missions." The Administration also "planted the seed for a corps of trained nation builders in 2004 when it created an Office of the Coordinator for Reconstruction and Stabilization in the State Department. The 55-person shop is staffed largely by officials on loan from the Defense Department, the Central Intelligence Agency and other agencies. It tries to anticipate the next global hot spot -- be it Sudan or North Korea -- and prepares to deploy as the main US postwar coordinator wherever a need might arise." However, "with finances tight, Congress isn't rushing to budget the money. One senior Pentagon official says he has heard objections from both Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill. Their worry: elevating the importance of nation-building will, over time, divert funds from the nation's ability to wage all-out war and leave the military less prepared to counter an unexpected major threat from a country such as China. And legislators in both parties are wary of more Iraq-style adventures."

Budget Request To Include No New Iraq Rebuilding Funds.

The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports, "The US and its key foreign allies are likely to fall short of their funding pledges to help rebuild Iraq, as violence in the war-torn country absorbs contributions and deters nations from making new ones. T he reconstruction shortfall may total one-third of promised funds, adding to the challenges for Iraq's next government." The White House and "some US lawmakers have made clear that this year they want Iraqi security forces to take the lead in combating the insurgency, laying the groundwork for a gradual US military withdrawal." The new year also "marks a turning point in the administration's goal to rebuild Iraq -- an effort that has had mixed success." The Journal adds, "The $18.4 billion US rebuilding program was established with a three-year term that expires in the fall, and lawmakers -- mindful of contractor overcharges, corruption and security issues that have surfaced -- have made clear that they are unwilling to authorize a follow-up program. The budget request for Fiscal Year 2007 that the White House sends Congress next month will include no new Iraq rebuilding money, according to an official familiar with the matter. News that the White House won't seek Iraq reconstruction funds for fiscal 2007 was reported earlier by the Washington Post."

Book Claims CIA Ignored Information That Iraq Had No WMD.

The AP (1/3) reports, "A new book on the government's secret anti-terrorism operations describes how the CIA recruited an Iraqi-American anesthesiologist in 2002 to obtain information from her brother, who was a figure in Saddam Hussein's nuclear program." Dr. Sawsan Alhaddad of Cleveland "made the dangerous trip to Iraq on the CIA's behalf. The book said her brother was stunned by her questions about the nuclear program because -- he said -- it had been dead for a decade." New York Times reporter James Risen "uses the anecdote to illustrate how the CIA ignored information that Iraq no longer had weapons of mass destruction. His book, 'State of War: The Secret History of the CIA and the Bush Administration' describes secret operations of the Bush administration's war on terrorism." The major revelation in the book "has already been the subject of extensive reporting by Risen's newspaper: the National Security Agency's eavesdropping of Americans' conversations without obtaining warrants from a special court." The book said Dr. Alhaddad "flew home in mid-September 2002 and had a series of meetings with CIA analysts. She relayed her brother's information that there was no nuclear program. A CIA operative later told Dr. Alhaddad's husband that the agency believed her brother was lying."

Clinton Administration Said Saddam Was Reconstituting His WMD. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (1/3, 90K) excerpts the State Department's Daily Press Briefing of November 10, 1998 in which then-Assistant Secretary of State James Rubin said, "[T]his can't go on indefinitely; that if Saddam [Hussein] continues to block UNSCOM and we do not respond, he will be able to reconstitute his weapons of mass destruction in a matter of months, not a matter of years. This is a dangerous situation; this is why we have considered it a grave situation. If we fail to act, he will feel emboldened to threaten the region further, armed, possibly, with the most dangerous kinds of weapons."

Saddam Says He Prefers To Be Shot If Sentenced To Death.

The Washington Times (1/3,

Martin, 90K) reports, "Saddam Hussein has told his lawyers that he wants to be shot by firing squad, not hanged, if sentenced to death during his murder trial, which resumes later this month in Baghdad." Saddam "maintains that he is still commander in chief of Iraq's armed forces -- and that a firing squad is 'the right way' to execute a military leader."

US Teen Returns Home From Winter Vacation Trip To Baghdad. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 11, 1:50, Holt) reported 16-year-old Farris Hassan is "returned home last night from his ill-advised solo journey to Iraq. And it's not just his mom who wants answers." NBC (Sanders) added, "Maybe it's a sign of the times when a 16-year-old tells his family he's more nervous about facing the US media than traveling to a war zone. But he may have good reason after his arrival at Miami International Airport last night. He certainly appeared self-assured late this afternoon." Farris Hassan: "Yes. Right now, I came back and I'm pretty tired and I'm preparing my statement this time." Sanders: "Today, it was Farris' day off. He says he'll talk the details about his trip tomorrow." Hassan "reportedly told selected friends he gone to Iraq to witness democracy in progress. But after talking to the Associated Press there, the US Embassy told him he couldn't make any more statements." USA Today (1/3, Koch, 2.31M) and New York Times/AP (1/3), among others, also report the story.

Magazine Notes Iraq War Game Staging Ground In Louisiana. The Washington Post (1/3, C1, Carlson, 744K) reports Harper's magazine "has found a big, heartwarming silver lining inside that gloomy old Global War on Terrorism. Here it is: Our government has hired a bunch of poor souls who lost their arms and legs in accidents and has rigged them up with bags of fake blood so they can play wounded civilians in war games down at Fort Polk, La." Cubic, "the defense contractor that produces these games, has also hired 250 Arabic-speaking immigrants at $220 a day as 'Cultural Role Players' in the war games. They've also hired hundreds of local Louisianans to play random Arab civilians, plus 'dozens of scriptwriters' to come up with realistic scenarios for the war games." Wells Tower, "author of this jaw-droppingly bizarre article," said, "The military spends an average of $9 million staging each 3 1/2 -week mission rehearsal exercise," which "works out to about $117 million a year." That "doesn't include the $49 million spent constructing the state-of-the-art fake city of Suliyah, which contains 29 buildings."

US Giving NATO, Allies Growing Role In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (1/3, A1, Witte, 744K) reports, "Four years into a mammoth reconstruction effort here that has been largely led, funded and secured by Americans, the United States is showing a growing willingness to cede those jobs to others. The most dramatic example will come by this summer, when the US military officially hands over control of the volatile southern region -- plagued by persistent attacks from Islamic militias -- to an international force led by the NATO alliance." The United States "will cut its troop strength by 2,500, even though it is not clear how aggressively NATO troops will pursue insurgents, who have shown no sign of relenting." The Post ads, "At the same time, the U.S. government is increasingly allowing Western allies, or Afghans themselves, to take on the tasks of rebuilding a country that has suffered more than two decades of fighting and remains beset by poverty, drugs and insurgency."

Bush Awards Purple Hearts To Soldiers Wounded In Iraq. The Houston Chronicle (1/2, Hedges) reports, "President Bush's first official act of the new year was pinning Purple Hearts on US soldiers wounded in Iraq, a signal that for the White House, 2006 would be another year dominated by the war." The President "gave the military award to nine soldiers during a private session today with veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan and some family members at the Brooke Army Medical Center." The soldiers "were among more than 2,300 wounded service members treated there since the beginning of the two wars, and Bush took note of their plight as he restated his reasons for the unpopular Iraq war." Said Bush, "There's horrible consequences to war -- that's what you see in this building. … On the other hand, we also see (soldiers) who say, 'I'd like to go back in, Mr. President, what we're doing is the right thing,' because many of these troops understand that by defeating the enemy there, we don't have to face them here. And they understand that by helping the country and the Middle East become a democracy, we are, in fact, laying the foundation for future peace."

The AP (1/2, Riechmann) says the President "boarded the Marine One presidential helicopter before dawn on his ranch in Crawford and flew more than an hour to Randolph Air Force Base. His motorcade drove to Brooke Army Medical Center, a 224-bed hospital at nearby Fort Sam Houston, to meet with about 50 injured members of various branches of the armed forces and their families." Said Bush, "This hospital is full of healers and compassionate people that care deeply about our men and women in uniform. … It's also full of courageous young soldiers and marines, airmen. I'm just overwhelmed by the great strength of character of not only those who have been wounded but of their loved ones as well."

Reuters (1/2) adds Bush "returned to Washington later in the day to tackle his agenda for 2006, another year in which the Iraq war is expected to be a dominating factor with critics calling for US troops to withdraw." The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Chen) also mentions Bush's visit.

As 2006 Begins, Bush's Focus Is On Economy, Iraq, War On Terror. According to the AP (1/2, Riechmann), President Bush is starting 2006 trumpeting upturns in the US economy, defending US actions in Iraq and challenging critics of his policies in the war on terror. The AP adds, "White House officials hope this week sets the tone for its top priorities as Bush visits the Pentagon on Wednesday to discuss the war on terror and then flies to Chicago on Friday to try to convince Americans that the economy is on solid footing." On Sunday, Bush visited wounded US troops in San Antonio, and this week, he will use "the backdrop of the White House to meet with a bipartisan group of former secretaries of state and defense to discuss terrorism and Iraq and to surround himself with U.S. attorneys to pressure lawmakers to renew the Patriot Act."

Brownstein Compares Bush, Polk Presidencies. Ron Brownstein writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/2), "The president whom George W. Bush may resemble most is not his biological father, George H.W. Bush, or even Ronald Reagan, who often seems his ideological father, but James K. Polk, a dynamic and willful leader few discuss anymore. … Polk may be the only predecessor who matched Bush's determination to drive massive change on a minute margin of victory. Polk won by fewer than 38,000 votes of 2.7 million cast. Over four tumultuous years, he pursued an ambitious, highly partisan agenda that offered little to those who had voted against him. Sound familiar? … It's worth considering Polk's record not because Americans will take up arms against each other anytime soon — although you might never know that from listening to talk radio — but because it suggests that a president who slights the need to build national consensus can seed long-term problems that aren't immediately apparent amid short-term successes."

Bush Will Not Ask Congress For Additional Iraq Reconstruction Funding.

The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Knickmeyer), in a front-page article, reports that the Bush administration "does not intend to seek any new funds for Iraq reconstruction in the budget request going before Congress in February, officials say. The decision signals the winding down of an $18.4 billion US rebuilding effort in which roughly half of the money was eaten away by the insurgency, a buildup of Iraq's criminal justice system and the investigation and trial of Saddam Hussein. … US officials in Baghdad have made clear, other foreign donors and the fledgling Iraqi government will have to take up what authorities say is tens of billions of dollars of work yet to be done merely to bring reliable electricity, water and other services to Iraq's 26 million people."

Army Officer Shows Off Baghdad Reconstruction Projects. The Washington Post (1/2, A10, Knickmeyer) traveled around Baghdad with Maj. John Hudson of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers on a tour his "Prides and joys," the many reconstruction projects going on in the city. At "an Army Corps of Engineers office in the Green Zone -- the fortified site of much of the Iraqi government -- Hudson, in flak jacket and helmet, spread his hands lovingly on a map of Baghdad. 'Two youth centers. Two fire stations -- those are in some of your poorer neighborhoods. Baghdad highway patrol. A facility for the SWAT team. A new perimeter wall for Doura,' a power plant in Baghdad's insurgency-ridden south. A checkpoint on a southern road into the city. An electrical substation. … The projects are among 90 under his domain and among 3,600 projects in an $18.4 billion reconstruction package for Iraq due to peak, and be completed, this year." The Post adds, "Hudson will return to Colorado Springs around March. Money for the U.S. reconstruction package here is scheduled to run out around the end of the year. International donors largely have not kept their pledges to pick up the tab for reconstruction. Iraqis have balked at the painful economic reforms necessary to win foreign loans to do the work. Insurgents want to destroy it all. Civil war would do the same."

New Maryland US Attorney Restructures Staff, Targets Violent Crime.

The Baltimore Sun (1/2, Dolan) reports, "Maryland's top federal prosecutor is both expanding his office and reorganizing his staff to emphasize a commitment to fighting violent crime." The Sun continues, "Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said he would start this month by restructuring his criminal division. It's part of an effort, he said, to coordinate better with local and federal law enforcement agents. … 'I had a meeting with the FBI's public corruption unit, and there was a real question of where that responsibility lay in our office,' Rosenstein said. 'It's a question of accountability.' The Sun adds, "Starting this year, federal prosecutors handling criminal cases in Baltimore will be required to focus on either terrorism and national security, fraud and public corruption, violent crime, drugs or major crimes - a catch-all section including civil rights violations and child pornography. They'll be expected to stay in their subjects for at least two years, Rosenstein said. … The division's managers have all been asked to reapply for their jobs, he added. … Five months into the job, the moves come as Rosenstein has established a reputation as a genial and intense leader known for his thoroughness and his prolific e-mails to his staff. … James Wyda, the federal public defender for Maryland, praised Rosenstein for his new hires and complimented the quality of his staff. … But Wyda also cautioned that Rosenstein is early in his tenure. He said Rosenstein would be judged, in part, on how he handles the substantial number of capital murder cases that have been transferred into the federal system in Maryland."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Attorneys For CA Defendants Claim US Misusing Sarbanes-Oxley. The Legal Times (1/2, Perrotta) reports, "Attorneys representing two former executives of Computer Associates, the Long Island, N.Y., company caught up in a massive accounting scandal, argued last week that federal prosecutors are misusing a criminal statute revised as part of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, possibly leading to severe prison sentences — up to 20 years — that were not intended by federal legislators." The Times continues, "The dispute involves the prosecution of Sanjay Kumar, the former chairman and CEO of Computer Associates, and Stephen Richards, a former sales executive, on various fraud and obstruction charges. Federal prosecutors accuse both men of lying to the government and lying to their company's outside counsel, Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz, which was conducting an internal investigation of the company's accounting practices." The Times adds, "Kumar and Richards are in a fight over the meaning of a federal criminal statute that was amended as part of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. … While defense attorneys argue that the SOX revisions have created a narrow statute that applies only to physical evidence, such as documents, the government contends it reaches beyond that to include any conduct that could obstruct an official proceeding."

Milberg Weiss Worried About Indicted Attorney's Actions. The California Recorder (1/3, Scheck) reports, "Nearly 12 years ago, an internal memo from the Southern California firm Best Best & Krieger expressed concerns that it was acting as a conduit for legally questionable payments from the plaintiff firm Milberg Weiss to Seymour Lazar, the lead plaintiff in dozens of securities class actions." The Recorder continues, "The memo, filed in court by prosecutors last week, expresses particular worry about the Best firm recording payments from the firm then known as Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach to Lazar as firm income, which would then be secretly credited to Lazar for future legal services. … 'To us it just smells bad,' the memo says, 'and probably would to an investigator.'" The Recorder adds, "That concern came to fruition in June, when Lazar and his attorney, Paul Selzer -- a former partner at the Best firm -- were indicted by a Los Angeles federal grand jury for allegedly taking more than $2 million in illegal kickbacks from Milberg Weiss. … The L.A. U.S. Attorney's Office has spent the past five years probing whether Milberg Weiss -- which split in 2004 when star partner William Lerach broke off to form his own San Diego-based firm -- paid illegal kickbacks to lead plaintiffs in class actions. … After several years of investigation with few public developments, the Lazar and Selzer indictments were widely seen as an effort to force the two defendants to testify against Milberg Weiss and its partners. … Prosecutors have also given immunity to at least two other former clients who say they received kickbacks from the firm via other attorneys. Lawyers familiar with the case say their allegations are similar to those detailed in the Lazar indictment."

NYTimes Bemoans Inflated Corporate Executive Pay. The New York Times (1/2) editorializes, "It would be nice to see corporate America put more effort - and money - into quality control and fair living wages for workers and less into exorbitant pay packages and bonuses for corporate chieftains. We remain hopeful."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Plea Bargain Could Be Announced Today. The CBS Evening News (1/02, story 4, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "In Washington, law enforcement sources told CBS News tonight that a plea bargain deal involving Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff could be announced as early as tomorrow. We are told that the deal could implicate lawmakers who allegedly took illegal gifts from him. Abramoff has already been charged in connection with a corruption case in Florida. His attorneys had no immediate comment."

Abramoff Under Pressure To Take Plea Deal. With Abramoff under pressure from Federal authorities to accept a plea bargain, many Washington observers expect the arrangement would lead to the implication of several members of Congress. ABC World News Tonight (1/1, story 5, 2:15, Harris) reported Federal officials are "investigating what's likely to be one of the biggest influence-pedaling scandals in history. The potential that Abramoff is cooperating is making some people in Congress very nervous. ABC's Geoff Morrell has that story." ABC (Morrell) added prosecutors believe Abramoff "used that money to bribe members of Congress and are now pressuring him to name names." Melanie Sloan, former Federal prosecutor: "I think people are going to be amazed when they learn the extent of the bribery that Jack Abramoff was involved with members of Congress." Morrell: "Tonight, the only lawmaker known to be under scrutiny is Bob Ney of Ohio. But several others are scrambling to distance themselves from Abramoff. Montana Sen. Conrad Burns, who raked in nearly $60,000 from the disgraced lobbyist, now says 'I hope Abramoff goes to jail and we never see him again. I wish he had never been born.'" Sloan: "I think by the time this is over, this is going to be the biggest congressional scandal in history."

Abramoff Plea Would "Send Shockwaves Through Washington." U.S. News and World Report (1/9, Brush) reports that Abramoff is "reportedly close to cutting his own deal with federal investigators, a development that would send shock waves through Washington. Abramoff's testimony could implicate lawmakers in a vast influence-peddling case, and those once friendly with the man known as 'Casino Jack' are now ducking for cover." Abramoff "is reportedly close to an agreement with prosecutors that might include cooperation with investigators looking into his lobbying tactics. A spokesman for Abramoff declined to comment." Lawmakers "are scrambling to return campaign contributions. According to the Center for Responsive Politics, 210 federal lawmakers have received donations to their campaigns or political action committees from either Abramoff or his clients, since 1999; most big recipients were Republicans. Republican Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana, who's up for re-election this year, has returned $150,000, saying the donations 'served to undermine the public's confidence in its government.' … Sen. Max Baucus, a Montana Democrat, is returning roughly $19,000. Sen. Byron Dorgan, a North Dakota Democrat and ranking member of the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, which is investigating Abramoff, is returning $67,000. Rep. Denny Rehberg, a Montana Republican, returned $18,000 to Indian tribes and donated to charity the $2,000 he received directly from Abramoff."

Congressional Hearings To Add Drama To Conflicts With White House. The Christian Science Monitor (1/3, Chaddock, 61K) reports Congress "is gearing up for the most dramatic slate of hearings since the Clinton impeachment fracas." The "high-profile probes underscore efforts by Congress to reclaim power from a war-time White House. And they could reshape this fall's midterm elections." Lawmakers "on both sides of the aisle set in motion an aggressive oversight agenda, ranging from secret prisons and the treatment of detainees under US control, to the president's authorization of domestic eavesdropping without a warrant." In addition, "more members of Congress find themselves under scrutiny," as Abramoff "and his former associates work out plea agreements promising cooperation in a widening bribery investigation on Capitol Hill. Former House majority leader Tom DeLay, meanwhile, will face charges of money laundering in court later this month." The "scrutiny on - and from - Congress is a sharp turnaround for a Republican-controlled body that came to power extolling ethics, and one that has been deferential to the Bush presidency about its conduct in the war on terrorism." A "major reason for the new posture on Capitol Hill is the willingness of GOP moderates to challenge the Bush administration's war policies."

Maryland Tech Firm Owner To Plead Guilty To Bribing DC School Officials. The Legal Times (1/2, Kelley) reports, "The owner of a Maryland-based technology firm is expected to plead guilty this week to bribing District of Columbia Public School officials in exchange for contracts." The Times continues, "On Dec. 7 the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia charged Charles Wiggins, the owner of Wiggins Telecommunications in Temple Hills, Md., with one felony count of bribing public officials. Within a week of being charged, Wiggins agreed to plead guilty and cooperate." The Times adds, "Wiggins' attorney, Sidney Friedman of Baltimore, says he is not authorized to comment on the deal reached with prosecutors. Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Butler, who is handling the prosecution, could not be reached for comment. … In charging documents, the prosecution alleges that from early 2001 through 2003, Wiggins doled out nearly $50,000 in bribes to a DCPS office manager and an elementary school principal. The two school officials, who so far are identified only as 'Individual 1' and 'Individual 2' in court documents, allegedly gave Wiggins preferential treatment in exchange for receiving a cut of the profits generated by his DCPS contracts."

Prince George's County Community No Longer Immune From Violence. The Washington Post (1/3, Thomas-Lester) reports, "Three miles beyond the Capital Beltway, Woodmore South seems far removed from the violence and fear that has infested some Prince George's County neighborhoods. … The upscale subdivision, with its rolling green lawns along wide and winding roads, reflects what draws many residents to the county: a chance for a classic suburban life in a community where most neighbors and political leaders are African American. … But consider the past several months: In June, a Woodmore South boy was beaten at nearby Six Flags America, and a teenage girl was shot after leaving a neighborhood graduation party. At one nearby shopping mall, a young man was beaten to death in early November. At another, a District man was shot Dec. 10. Earlier that day, an argument at a popular restaurant led to a fatal shooting a few blocks away." The Post continues, "The county and its incorporated cities recorded 173 homicides in 2005 -- surpassing the record 154 set during the crack epidemic in 1991 -- and a car was stolen every half hour. Although most of the crime remains concentrated inside the Beltway, residents in such suburban enclaves as Mitchellville, Bowie and Fort Washington are going through an upheaval, psychic and otherwise. … Some residents, who fled crime in the District a generation ago, are considering leaving Prince George's. Others, still drawn by the appeal of one of the nation's largest black, middle-class communities, are staying put -- but fortifying their homes and hiring off-duty police officers. … Some have lost faith in a county police department stretched thin by rapid growth: In November, Bowie voters decided overwhelmingly to set up their own department, and College Park residents gave their City Council the option." The Post notes, "Just as telling and troubling, the rise in crime has fueled perceptions among some middle-income residents that their low-income neighbors from the District or elsewhere in the county are preying on their prosperity."

Grant Seeking More FBI Agents To Fight Corruption In Chicago. The Chicago Sun Times (1/2, Korecki) reports, "If you're a government employee or contractor and you thought last year was a bad time to be corrupt in Chicago, you better look out in 2006. While the Chicago FBI just added a third public corruption squad in September to make the unit the largest in the country -- it still isn't enough. FBI Special Agent in Charge Robert Grant said he and U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald have asked Washington, D.C., for more resources to help root out public fraud. 'We asked headquarters to give us more bodies,' Grant told the Chicago Sun-Times. … Though new corruption cases continue to hit the Dirksen federal courthouse at a brisk pace, 'there are areas we want to explore that we haven't even gotten to yet,' Grant said." The Sun Times notes, "Grant wouldn't say how many additional agents he's seeking. But he said he thinks Chicago has a good chance of getting the boost in manpower because public corruption has become a bureau priority nationally and 'they know we're doing such a good job here.'" The AP (1/3) posts a truncated version of the Sun Times story.

Ryan, Warner Expected To Take Stand. The Chicago Sun Times (1/3, Korecki) reports, "In all, jurors have endured testimony from nearly 50 witnesses in the 13 weeks since George Ryan's public corruption trial began. But there's still one person who could drastically reshape their impressions: the former governor himself. And he may have that opportunity, because it seems likely that Ryan will take the stand in his own defense. Lawyers representing Ryan and his co-defendant Lawrence Warner said last week they expect to put their clients on the stand after the prosecution rests this month." Ryan attorney Dan Webb and Warner lawyer Ed Genson "said they'll make a final decision when the prosecution rests, which is expected mid-month. Neither would go into the tactical reasoning of doing something that defense lawyers typically avoid.

Tennessee State Trooper Transferred For Own Safety After Helping FBI Probe. The Knoxville News (1/2, Stambaugh) reports, "A Tennessee Highway Patrol trooper was recently transferred from Cocke County to keep him out of harm's way after his cooperation with the FBI was revealed during legal proceedings, court records show." Trooper Kevin Kimbrough "is one of at least three local lawmen who have been secretly recording their conversations with other officers at the behest of federal and state authorities as part of a four-year probe into public corruption and organized crime." The News notes, "The probe has relied heavily on undercover officers, informants and wiretaps in Tennessee, North Carolina, Georgia and Florida. Thus far, seven Cocke County lawmen have been arrested, two illegal cockfighting compounds have been uncovered, two brothels have been shut down and more than 150 people have faced criminal charges."

Indicted Lawmakers Vow To Attend Ethics Special Session. The AP (1/2) reports, "Two Tennessee Democratic senators facing federal bribery charges say they will attend a special session on ethics this month despite calls from Republican leaders that they not." Sens. Ward Crutchfield and Kathryn Bowers "are among five current or former lawmakers indicted on bribery and extortion charges in an FBI investigation that focused on a bogus company called E-Cycle Management." Sen. Jim Bryson "has written a letter to both Crutchfield and Bowers urging them not to participate in the special session. 'What I hope not to do, but will do if I have to, is present a resolution to the Senate, urging them not to attend,' Bryson said." The Tennessean (1/1, de la Cruz) notes, "Bowers supports many proposals in the ethics bill that will be the focal point of the session but does not like the ban on cash contributions, she said last week. At the same time, cash transactions have been at the heart of the public corruption case. A cash payment is what snared Bowers in the bribery sting."

Reform Provision Would Ban Cash Contributions. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (1/2, Locker) reports, "It was one of the eye-popping aspects of the FBI's 'Tennessee Waltz' bribery investigation: a handful of state legislators accepting hundreds of dollars in cash from undercover FBI agents posing as business executives. The acceptance of cash by some of the legislators was perfectly legal: It was properly disclosed as a campaign contribution on their campaign-finance reports, was within the $1,000 limit on individual contributions, and was not, they said, payment for legislative action. … But campaign contributions in cash will be banned if the sweeping ethics reform bill legislators will consider in a special session starting Jan. 10 is approved. Contributions will be by check, money order or some form other than cash."

Chat Room Solicitation Leads To Kansas Man's Arrested For Child Porn. The AP (1/2) reports, "Law enforcement officers in two states used high-tech tools to crack what they believe is the largest child porn case in Wichita history." Steven Craig Perrine "was charged last week with possession and distribution of child pornography after investigators said they searched his home and found more than 16,000 sexually explicit images involving children. … Authorities said the case began Sept. 9, when a Leetsdale, Pa., man visited an Internet chatroom and began talking to someone using the screen name 'Stevedragonslayer,'" who "asked if he wanted to see a 'hot video,' FBI Special Agent Rebecca Martin wrote in an affidavit. The video showed naked girls who looked younger than 10 walking around a bathroom, Martin wrote." The Pennsylvania man, James Vanlandingham, reported the incident to state authorities; and, The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (12/31, Ayad, 261K) notes, "With only a screen name to aid his search," Pennsylvania State Police Computer Crimes Task Force Officer Reginald Humbert "located IP addresses…with subpoenas of Yahoo! Inc. and Cox Communications Inc. that led FBI investigators and the Sedwick-Witchita County Exploited and Missing Child Unit straight to the two computers Mr. Perrine was using."

Detectives In DC Nightclub Slaying Probe Under Investigation. The Washington Post (1/3, B1, Cauvin) reports, "The witness didn't know what to think. … A few days earlier, she had seen a dying man dragged off the dance floor at a popular Northwest Washington nightclub. Now two homicide detectives wanted her to change her story, she said. Instead of saying that the man in the black shirt was stabbing the victim, she was told she should make it seem as though it was the man in the white shirt." The Post continues, "So she did, she later testified. … 'I was confused,' the witness said, 'but I figured that it's their job. They know what they're doing. I guess they got it under control.'" The Post adds, "In fact, the investigation into the Feb. 13 death of Terrence Brown at Club U was about to spin out of control. The two detectives, hoping to pursue murder charges against a suspect, apparently wanted the woman -- and two other witnesses -- to revise their accounts to point to their suspect and reflect the medical examiner's conclusion that the 31-year-old Brown died from a deep stab wound. Everything fell apart when prosecutors grew suspicious. … Nearly a year later, Brown's killing remains unsolved, clouded and complicated by an investigation into the detectives' conduct. Recently filed documents in D.C. Superior Court provide the most complete picture yet of how the high-profile case was derailed. They depict the detectives as determined to close the case even though the evidence and witnesses' statements suggested that the suspect they had in their sights could not have inflicted the fatal wound. … The theory didn't fly, and it was the two detectives, Erick Brown and Milagros Morales, who wound up in trouble. Brown, 40, was taken off the case almost immediately, and Morales, 41, was removed several days later. They have been stripped of their badges and guns and are under investigation by prosecutors and the police internal affairs unit." The Post notes, "It is a remarkable turn for both. Brown, a police officer for 15 years, is a onetime homicide detective of the year, according to David Schertler, a defense attorney for both detectives, and law enforcement officials. Morales, a police officer for 20 years, was once an investigator for internal affairs, the unit that investigates police corruption, Schertler and the officials said. … Schertler said they did nothing wrong. 'The detectives strongly disagree with the characterization that they tried to pressure or coerce any witness into saying anything that wasn't true,' he said."

Executions, Death Sentences Becoming More Rare In The US. The Washington Post (1/2, A11, Lane) reports, "As 2005 gives way to 2006, the death penalty remains a major item of business on the Supreme Court's docket. In addition to a steady flow of stay-of-execution applications, the court has four capital punishment cases to decide. … Yet in one important sense, this activity is misleading: The justices may be busy with death penalty cases, but capital punishment is on the wane in the United States." The Post notes, "In the year just completed, 60 convicted killers were executed. That is a drop of 39 percent from the recent peak of 98 in 1999. … Perhaps more significant, death sentences are dwindling. In 2005, there were 96 new death sentences, according to the center. This is down 70 percent from 1996."

Tennessee Case Seen As First Test Of Roberts' Influence On Death Penalty Cases. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Savage) reports, "The major death penalty case before the Supreme Court this year reads like a 'whodunit,' as one judge put it. But if there is doubt about who did it, should the defendant be on death row? … Though they might not solve the murder mystery, the case should give an early clue on whether the high court, now led by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., is willing to overturn a death sentence if an inmate's guilt is in doubt." In the case from Tennessee, "The justices will now decide whether to make it easier to reopen old cases when new evidence — including DNA testing -- raises real doubts about the defendant's guilt."

DC Region Homicides Rose In 2005. The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Klein) reports, "The Washington region saw a rise in bloodshed in 2005, largely fueled by a spike in slayings in the D.C. suburbs, most dramatically in Prince George's County. … Across the region, there were 466 homicides in 2005, compared with 420 in 2004 -- a rise of about 11 percent. About half of those slayings have been solved. It was the first time the District has recorded fewer than 200 homicides in consecutive years since the mid-1980s. At the same time, the total in Prince George's climbed from 148 to 173, a grim record for the county."

WPost Calls Bush Record On Pardons "Dismal." An editorial in the Washington Post (1/3, A16, 744K) says that although President Bush is "a big fan of presidential power," he "still has not exercised his veto," and he "prefers to forget that Article II of the Constitution gives him the 'Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offenses against the United States.' Mr. Bush, who famously proclaims himself a 'compassionate conservative,' has shown mercy fewer times than any president in recent history (though he has granted more pardons than President Bill Clinton had at the comparable point in his presidency). He has granted clemency less than a fifth the number of times of presidents Jimmy Carter, Ronald Reagan or Gerald Ford, who served not even a full term in office." The Post adds that Bush's record on pardons "dismal" and "a far cry from the manner in which the Framers of the Constitution envisioned the power."

CIVIL LAW:

DC Appeals Court Institutes Mediation Program For Civil Appeals. The Legal Times (1/2, Broida) reports, "In a continuing effort to reduce the backlog of cases at the D.C. Court of Appeals, the court has instituted a one-year appellate mediation program for civil appeals." The Times continues, "Starting this week, all parties who are represented by counsel will be required to attend alternative dispute mediation sessions to see if their appeal can be settled without being brought before the court." The Times adds, "The yearlong pilot program is an outgrowth of a similar limited mediation program that was successfully tried at the court this summer. … Ed Schwab, head of the appellate division of the D.C. Attorney General's Office, says his office had a positive experience with the program. He cited one case that was settled within three hours. 'So we were quite happy,' he says. … But Schwab cautions that not every case can be settled, especially those that don't involve money. In some cases, citizens will be seeking a remedy for a government action, and in cases like those, mediation may not work. Nevertheless, he says, 'Anytime you can settle, I think it is a good idea.'"

WPost Says Drug Safety Disputes Should Not Be Decided In Court. An editorial in the Washington Post (1/2, A12) says, "The New England Journal of Medicine's recent retraction of a 2000 article that helped establish the popularity of Vioxx, the controversial painkiller, should give doctors, hospitals and journal authors reason to think harder about how drug safety information is processed. The retraction, published last month, stated that the article's authors -- including scientists in the employ of Merck & Co., which makes Vioxx -- knew in advance of publication that 20 out of more than 2,000 patients taking part in a study of Vioxx suffered from heart attacks after taking the drug, not 17 as the article reported. They left out the information, they say, on the grounds that the three heart attacks in question occurred after the study had technically ended. But as a result, the level of heart attack risk associated with Vioxx appeared in the article to be slightly lower than it should have been." The revelation "raises legitimate questions about the relationship between scientists, who are often paid by drug companies, and medical journals, which should do a better job of stating authors' conflicts of interest. It should also lead doctors who prescribe drugs and are ultimately responsible for understanding their side effects to read such journals with greater skepticism. It does not, however, alter our view that the courts are the wrong place to resolve disputes about drug safety. … Scientific judgments about the risks and advantages of drugs are not black and white -- which is why they are best made by scientists and by the regulatory agency that employs them, not by jurors through the lens of hindsight."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

High Court To Hear Two Fourth Amendment Cases This Month. The Supreme Court will hear two Fourth Amendment cases this month. The Washington Times (1/2, Taylor) reports, "Hudson v. Michigan, which the justices will hear when the court reconvenes Jan. 9, questions whether police violated the Fourth Amendment 'knock and announce rule' when they burst into a suspected cocaine dealer's home in Detroit. The following week, the justices will consider rules pertaining to searches conducted with special 'anticipatory' warrants, which become operative only after 'triggering events' indicate probable cause."

District Of Columbia Activists Seek Approval For Gay Marriages. The Washington Post (1/2, B1, Weiss) reports, "The D.C. Council is considering measures that would amount to the greatest expansion of rights for same-sex couples in a decade. But for some in the District's large and influential gay community, the package of tax and inheritance benefits is perhaps most notable for what it is not: a move to legalize gay marriage. With Massachusetts having legalized gay marriage and other states coming close, some gay activists are saying that now is the time to push for full marriage rights in the District." The Post notes Sen. Sam Brownback "warned that the city would trigger a sharp backlash from Congress if it pursued gay marriage."

Democrats' Approach To Religion Seen As Wrongheaded. In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/2) Joseph Loconte, a research fellow in religion at the Heritage Foundation, writes, "Nancy Pelosi…sounded like an Old Testament prophet recently when she denounced the Republican budget for its 'injustice and immorality' and urged her colleagues to cast their no votes 'as an act of worship' during this religious season. This, apparently, is what the Democrats had in mind when they vowed after President Bush's re-election to reclaim religious voters for their party. … A look at the tactics and theology of the religious left, however, suggests that this is exactly what American politics does not need. If Democrats give religious progressives a stronger voice, they'll only replicate the misdeeds of the religious right. For starters, we'll see more attempts to draw a direct line from the Bible to a political agenda."

Many Counties Remain In Turmoil Over New Voting Technology. The Los Angeles Times (1/3, Levey, 958K) reports that California and other states "are embroiled in a contentious debate over how voters should cast their ballots." With "electronic machines under attack as unreliable and vulnerable to hackers, there is little consensus about what the new technology should look like. That has left many counties nationwide in turmoil as they struggle with unproven technology while state regulations remain in flux and the federal government offers minimal guidance." The Times adds, "Congress in 2002 passed the Help America Vote Act, pledging nearly $4 billion to help states upgrade their voting systems. The same year, California passed its own $200-million bond for the same purpose. The flood of money fueled a nationwide spending spree on high-tech machines that were expected to revolutionize vote counting. But the machines often have not proved as reliable as hoped. And while states and counties rushed to buy them, elections officials struggled to regulate how machines should record votes and safeguard results."

Voting Act Puts County Registrars In Bind. The Sacramento Bee (1/2, Yamamura) reports, "Mikel Haas is running out of time and patience, but he says he'll give it one more month before he really starts to panic. … With an April 11 special election fast approaching, the San Diego County registrar of voters still doesn't have any California-certified machines to meet the requirements of the 2002 U.S. Help America Vote Act." The Bee continues, "Most counties in California - and many across the country - officially fell out of compliance Sunday with rules mandating that election systems be accessible to voters with disabilities. But the San Diego County special election puts Haas at the head of the line when it comes to compliance. … While the legal deadline has passed, Secretary of State Bruce McPherson has tried to assure county officials and voters that California will resolve its Help America Vote Act issues by the June primary, the first statewide election with federal races. … But McPherson has not certified any new accessible voting machines since August, making some registrars nervous and others downright angry." The Bee adds, "McPherson's spokeswoman, Jennifer Kerns, said that at least six election systems are 'in the pipeline' and that McPherson is confident multiple options will be available for the June primary. … But registrars like Haas are torn. They say they respect McPherson's need to put controversial equipment through a battery of tests. But they also face the practical need of having to run an election in a matter of months."

Timing Of Evolution Sticker Petitions Still In Dispute. The Fulton County (GA) Daily Report (1/2, Land) reports, "Federal appeals judges are still wrestling with factual inconsistencies over how a petition -- pushed by Marjorie Rogers, a self-described 'six-day biblical creationist' -- affected the Cobb County, Ga., school board's decision to amend new science textbooks with stickers questioning the validity of evolution." The Report continues, "A panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last month heard the school board's appeal of a federal judge's 2005 decision that the stickers, which say that evolution is 'a theory, not a fact,' amounted to an unconstitutional endorsement of religion. Selman v. Cobb County School District, 390 F. Supp 2d 1286. (The 11th Circuit case is No. 05-10341-1.) … During the arguments, judges sounded highly skeptical of the ruling by U.S. District Judge Clarence Cooper. They also upbraided Jeffrey O. Bramlett, the lawyer for the plaintiffs challenging the stickers, for making statements about the timeline of the case that 11th Circuit Judge Edward E. Carnes called 'just wrong.'" The Report adds, "Carnes demanded that Bramlett provide a written explanation of his assertions that the stickers had been placed in the textbooks as a result of Rogers' petition drive. … Bramlett's claims had been called into question by Cobb County's attorney, Ernest Linwood Gunn IV, whose brief said the petition had not been circulated until four months after the disclaimers were inserted into the books. … On Dec. 22, a week after the argument, Bramlett filed a 127-page response that said there were two petitions -

- one by Rogers, with more than 2,300 signatures delivered to the school board before the books were purchased, and a smaller petition delivered after the sticker plan was implemented. … The day the 11th Circuit received Bramlett's response, the court issued a one-page letter to Gunn instructing him, by today, to provide 'any evidence regarding the timing of any petitions that may have been filed with the School Board.'"

Federal Workforce Trails Private Sector In Hiring Hispanics. Under the headline, "Hispanics Underrepresented In The Federal Workforce," the Washington Post (1/3, A16, Fears, 744K) reports, "Hispanics represent 7 percent of employees in federal government when the group's population is growing faster than all others. The five-percentage-point gap between Hispanics working in the public and private domains translates to thousands of jobs and billions of dollars in potential pay, according to a coalition of Hispanic federal employees. The private sector tracks with the 13 percent of Hispanics in the general population, 40 million people, not including an estimated 11 million undocumented workers living in the country illegally." The Post adds, "The consequences are felt nationwide, Hispanic advocates say. The government suffers from a shortage of Spanish-speaking workers who could help non-English speakers navigate Social Security and other federal documents. In the chaotic aftermath of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, the government discovered that it could not effectively communicate with displaced immigrants, legal and undocumented."

ANTITRUST:

Columnist Predicts Mergers For Coming Year. In a column for New York Magazine (1/2), James Cramer writes, "The start of the year is a time for crystal-ball gazing. Sure, I could give you the standard fare, the typical Wall Street gibberish that you will hear in a virtual 24-hour loop for the next few weeks: untried Fed chairman, big-budget deficits, uncertain presidential leadership, a peak in real estate, an end to the interest-rate-tightening cycle. Know what? You know all that already. I'd rather tell you about some things that could happen that could make you some huge money in 2006. I can't guarantee any of them will come to pass, but if they do, well, remember your friend Cramer tipped you to them." Cramer continues, "Citigroup Will Merge With Goldman Sachs … For the past few years, Citigroup has been in the doghouse with regulators. Now new honcho Chuck Prince, a buttoned-down lawyer, has eliminated the cowboys and stopped the culture of trying to sell anything to customers as long as it had a big fee. That may soon give him the green light to make an acquisition. Citigroup has been taking a huge backseat to other players as it gets its ethical house in order. An acquisition could make Citigroup dominant again worldwide." Cramer adds, "Comcast Will Buy CBS … In 2004, when Comcast made its aborted offer for Disney—something that Comcast actually thought that Disney wanted, when nothing could have been further from the truth—I figured that win or lose, Comcast would remain a key, if not the key, player in the distribution of television programming in this country. But Intel, Broadcom, Qualcomm, Apple, Microsoft, Texas Instruments, Motorola, Nokia, Dell, and Marvell Technology Group all have another agenda, which is to make a new device that makes your phone calls, gets you on the Internet (wirelessly), and downloads TV programming, sans commercials, when you want, on the channel you want it. Late in 2006, we're bound to see one or more of these great tech companies unveil a product that will allow you to purchase, download, and watch anything that you want, from sports programs to movies to television shows to video games. The device will smash the current cable paradigm and will make all those stocks worth owning once again, as they were in the year just past." Cramer continues, "Pfizer And Bristol-Myers Squibb Will Merge, And Merck Will Snap Up Schering-Plough … My crystal ball sees no end to the turmoil afflicting the pharmaceutical industry. With the government as the biggest payer in the system, courtesy of the changes in Medicare, the drug companies will be forced to discount drugs well below where they thought they might have to. That combination of price squeeze and endless overhead will force Bristol-Myers and Pfizer to merge, and Merck and Schering-Plough will get together."

Arizona Questions Competition Problems With Development Deal. The Arizona Republic (1/2, Alltucker) reports, "State regulators want to scrutinize Cox Communications' role in arranging a special deal that effectively prevented rivals from seeking customers in a massive new-home development in Peoria." The Republic continues, "A new report by the Arizona Corporation Commission suggests there is "clear and convincing evidence" that in December 2003 a deal was struck between Cox Communications and a private developer to curb competition for phone, cable and high-speed Internet services at the 17,000-home Vistancia community. … The Corporation Commission wants to hold a public hearing to examine the deal and discuss potential fines against Cox." The Republic adds, "Although the arrangement was proposed by the developer, Shea Sunbelt, state regulators said Cox was an "active participant," with 15 employees helping write and revise terms of the deal. … The arrangement came to light after a tiny telephone company, Accipiter Communications, filed a complaint with state regulators alleging it was shut out of Vistancia. The arrangement also triggered an investigation by the federal Department of Justice's antitrust division."

Columnist Decries Government-Sanctioned Monopolies. In a column for the Orange County Register (1/2), Tibor R. Machan writes, "In Silverado Canyon, there is a tiny post office where each weekday we pick up our mail. One or two of the people who work there are, unfortunately, quite often absent because of illness or something else and, more often than not, the mail now doesn't get distributed until late in the afternoon. The Postal Service says they have to have the mail out by 5 p.m. but it used to be in our boxes by 10:30 a.m. or even earlier, until recently. … OK, so there has been more mail this time of year, but here is how that eventuality should play out. The post office should either hire more people so the mail gets out earlier or an alternative mail service should appear on the scene and offer competing first-class delivery service." Machan continues, "That latter alternative, of course, is illegal. Competition in first-class mail delivery is against the law, nevermind the demand. Accordingly, the post office can keep being later and later with mail distribution and does not have to hire any extra help since no one's about to come in and take the business from them. … This is but one of the relatively innocuous results of the monopoly in first-class mail service. Other monopolies are far more insidious. Take the New York Metropolitan Transit Authority, which last month was struck by the public-employee union to which all its workers belong. … " When there's a strike in a free market, people often have other vendors from whom they can receive service. There is usually competition, so that if Chrysler's autoworkers go on strike, there are Ford, Toyota, General Motors and other carmakers still in business." Machan adds, "Just why the American public is mostly passive about the many monopolies protected or operated by government is a mystery to me - one reason might be is that the government schools do not explain in their economics classes just how unnecessary and unjust such monopolies are, seeing that the schools themselves are a case in point. But perhaps with some voices making a bit of noise about the situation others will catch on and in time we can get a system in which my little post office would either shape up or find itself competing with an alternative mail-delivery agency."

Homeowners' Web Site In Wisconsin Competes With Realtors. The New York Times (1/3, Bailey) reports, "Across the country, the National Association of Realtors and the 6 percent commission that most of its members charge to sell a house are under assault by government officials, consumer advocates, lawyers and ambitious entrepreneurs. But the most effective challenge so far emanates from a spare bedroom in the modest home here of Christie Miller." The Times continues, "Ms. Miller, 38, a former social worker who favors fuzzy slippers, and her cousin, Mary Clare Murphy, 51, operate what real estate professionals believe to be the largest for-sale-by-owner Web site in the country." The Times adds, "They have turned Madison, a city of 208,000 known for its liberal politics, into one of the most active for-sale-by-owner markets in the country. And their success suggests that, in challenging the Realtor association's dominance of home sales, they may have hit on a winning formula that has eluded many other upstarts. Their site, FsboMadison.com (pronounced FIZZ-boh) holds a nearly 20 percent share of the Dane County market for residential real estate listings. … The site, which charges just $150 to list a home and throws in a teal blue yard sign, draws more Internet traffic than the traditional multiple listing service controlled by real estate agents." The Times notes, "Madison is home to the University of Wisconsin and a city where the percentage of residents who graduated from college is twice the national level. It is also a hotbed of antibusiness sentiment, which turns out to be the perfect place for a free-market real estate revolution. Bucking the system is a civic pastime here. … Elsewhere, the Justice Department, free-market scholars, plaintiffs' lawyers and countless entrepreneurs are vowing to make real estate more competitive and to bring down sales commissions. To do that, they advocate forcing the Realtors' association to share control of its established listing services. Those critics seem to view the listings as an unassailable monopoly. … And who can blame them? Those 800-plus local listing services, controlled by local branches of the Realtors' association, help dole out about $60 billion a year in commissions to real estate agents and the firms that employ them. Despite numerous attacks, the association has been remarkably successful to date at protecting its turf. Through lobbying, litigation and legislation, the Realtors' group has managed to keep control of the crucial listings."

Unlikely Alliance Develops Between Rivals Sony, Samsung. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Dvorak, Ramstad) reports, "For years, Samsung Electronics Co.'s key mission was to unseat rival Sony Corp. as the world's top electronics maker. Long seen as a South Korean underdog, Samsung has in the past few years surpassed its Japanese rival in market capitalization, revenue and profits. In television sets, Sony's traditional stronghold, Samsung now jockeys with Sony and a handful of top players for the No. 1 share of sales globally." The Journal continues, "But the relationship between Sony's Hiroshi Murayama and Samsung's Jang Insik tells a different story. The two engineers symbolize how the two companies have increasingly come to depend on each other since 2003. That's when Sony, looking for a source of panels for its new flat-panel TV line, asked to become a partner in a $2 billion factory Samsung was building to produce liquid-crystal displays." The Journal adds, "Messrs. Jang and Murayama phone each other from their bases in South Korea and Japan respectively several times a day and visit in person every month to discuss how to make better panels. Mr. Murayama persuaded Mr. Jang and his bosses to speed their development of key technologies, and Samsung let Mr. Murayama use some of those technologies in Sony's TV panels even before its own products. Sony's TVs that use those new panels ended up outselling Samsung's LCD sets by more than three to one this fall in major U.S. retailers. … But Samsung is still keen to work with Sony because it's getting a crash course in how to improve LCD panels, which it had mostly used in computer monitors and cellphones, in the important TV segment. … The unlikely alliance shows just how tangled the connections have become between consumer-electronics companies as competition in the industry intensifies. … The same trend is happening across Asian electronics makers, which have traditionally prided themselves on doing as much as they could in-house, from the design of their gadgets to the technology that goes into them."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Health Officials Note Progress In Preparations For Bird Flu Epidemic. Health officials said yesterday that the US is making progress in preparing for a bird flu epidemic. This includes measures to close schools and quarantine the sick. However, the AP (1/2, Yen) reports that vaccine supplies remain inadequate. Julie Gerberding, director of the national Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said on CBS' Face the Nation, "We've got a lot of work to do." Citing "'bottlenecks' in vaccine production and the delivery of health care if there's an outbreak," Gerberding added, "We've got to get more and better anti-viral drugs. And we've got to have every single link in our public health system as strong as it can be so it can detect this problem." The AP adds, "Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, appearing on CNN's 'Late Edition,' praised the money approved by Congress as a good step that will fund one year of preparedness efforts. Still, he said the U.S. is not ready, saying additional money is needed to ensure there would be enough vaccine supplies for all Americans within six months of an initial outbreak. State and local governments also need to step up efforts, Leavitt said."

Gerberding said on CBS' Face the Nation (1/1, Schieffer) she does not know whether "it is just a matter of time" before Avian flu appears in the US, but "we've got to take the steps now to get prepared for that." She added, "Frankly, we're not as prepared as we need to be. We're certainly doing more today than we were even two years ago so we're making fast progress. But we've got a lot of work to do. We've got to get a vaccine supply that we can count on. We've got to get more and better anti- viral drugs."

Leavitt Says US Still Has Work To Do. HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt said on CNN's Late Edition (1/1, Blitzer) that the avian flu virus "continues to spread in wild birds across the world. There is no reason to believe that at some point it will stop. That means that ultimately it would find its way to the United States. We need to be prepared. … We are not as prepared as we aspire to be. We have a great deal of work to do."

Plan To Change Toxic Release Reporting Requirements Draws Fire. The Washington Post (1/3, D1, Skrzycki, 744K) reports in its "The Regulators" column, "Opposition is growing to a Bush administration plan to change the reporting requirements of" the Toxic Release Inventory, the "highly successful public information program that collects data annually on releases of toxic chemicals." The inventory "has been a roadmap for individuals and community groups interested in pinpointing where the country's most-polluting facilities are located." The business community has pushed "over the past decade to reduce the 'burden' of having to fill out a five-page form for each chemical they use every year. This form includes detailed information on the quantity of the chemical, how it is made and processed, and how much of it is released. After considering several options, the [EPA] in October proposed changes that would allow more companies to file a shorter report, known as Form A, which contains less information about their use of toxic chemicals." The EPA "dropped another bombshell at the same time, telling Congress that it is thinking about eliminating annual filing in favor of every other year. … The twin ideas prompted outrage from environmental and public-interest groups." The Post adds, "Environmental and community groups, in particular, consider the reporting program a great success. And it has become even more useful since the agency has required reports on more chemicals and from more industrial sectors, including mining and electrical utilities."

Other States Adopting California's Strict Greenhouse Gas Rules. The Washington Post (1/3, D1, Freeman, 744K) reports, "On Friday, Massachusetts joined Oregon, Connecticut and five other states in adopting California's tough greenhouse gas rules, which limit the amount of carbon dioxide and other gases that can be emitted from vehicle tailpipes. These new rules would supplement federal exhaust pollutant standards already in place. Two other states are in the process of adopting the rules. The carbon dioxide regulations are so strict, the auto industry argues, that they would cause extensive design changes to new vehicles, driving up prices and crippling new-car sales. Every major automaker that sells vehicles in the United States is suing to have the new rules overturned, even as states on the West Coast and in the Northeast are moving quickly to adopt them." The California rule "requires a 30 percent reduction in greenhouse gases by 2016. The rules are one element of a wider trend of states enacting their own energy policies to govern auto and factory emissions and appliance energy efficiency, updating older federal rules or writing new rules where none exist."

Novak Praises Romney Decision To Pull Out Of RGGI. Robert Novak (1/2) writes in his syndicated column, "Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney on Dec. 16 made a significant move that will benefit the pocketbooks of his state's consumers and perhaps boost his own Republican presidential prospects. He pulled Massachusetts out of the compact of Northeastern states requiring a reduction in power plant emissions of carbon dioxide. The Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative (RGGI) would cut the emissions by 10 percent by 2019, forcing up electricity prices because of greater dependence on increasingly expensive natural gas. … The defection of Romney, originally inclined to support RGGI, represents a major setback for the Greens." Novak adds, "Green pressure can lead politicians to make promises that they would regret. … It appears Mitt Romney will avoid that pitfall on his long uphill climb to the White House."

Government Seeks To Remove Grizzly Bears From Endangered List. NBC Nightly News (1/1, story 12, 2:20, Seigenthaler) reported, "The Federal Government has declared grizzly bears in Yellowstone recovered, clearing the way to remove it from the endangered list." NBC (O'Neil) added, "By 1975 it was clear the grizzlies needed to be put on the endangered species list." Biologist Kerry Gunther: "We've gone from a population of less than 200 to a population of 600 and increasing population. It's a great success story." O'Neil: "A sorely needed victory for the act which some in Washington want to water down. The grizzly is only on of a handful to ever be declared recovered."

Texas, Oklahoma Continue To Be Plagued By Wildfires. The CBS Evening News (1/02, story 2, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "The fires in Texas and Oklahoma now spreading to New Mexico are being fueled by the worst drought in decades. The fires killed four people last week and searchers were set to look for any victims from two small towns in Texas that burned last night. Since early November, the Oklahoma fires have destroyed some 200 buildings and at least 270,000 acres." CBS (Cowan) added, "Nearly 100 more homes were lost to flames that burned into the wee hours of the morning. Some communities like Ringgold near the Texas-Oklahoma border were erased."

NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 5, 1:50, Teague) reported, "Fire crews have spent more than a week battling grass fires that have raged across Oklahoma, Texas, and New Mexico and burned again today. Nearly 300,000 acres have been scorched so far and more than 400 homes. The weather simply won't give fire crews a break." The AP (1/3, Flynn) runs a similar report.

Damage From California Flooding Now In Hundreds Of Millions Of Dollars. The CBS Evening News (1/02, story 3, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "Back-to-back storms drenched California and caused an estimated $100 million in flood damage. Most of it is the result of rivers that have spilled out of their banks in Northern California. Now the storms are threatening the southern part of the state." CBS (Hughes) added, "The pounding rain was too much for vulnerable hillsides above Los Angeles, burned bare by this year's wild fires. Rescue workers were watching for any sign that nearby residents needed to pack up and run from the hills. The second wave of storms to hit this weekend is swamping parts of Southern California. Up to four inches of rain is expected in the valleys and eight in some mountain areas."

NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 4, 2:20, Lewis) reported, "In California's wine country, where hundreds of homes and businesses are flooded out, they're just beginning to assess the damage, estimated in the hundreds of millions of dollars." In Pasadena, "there were plenty of raindrops on roses at 117th annual Rose parade. Defying the elements, the USC marching band wore plastic ponchos and sunglasses. As a smaller-than-usual crowd of spectators watched." Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger has "issued a state of emergency in seven California counties most adversely affected by the storm."

Cato Fellows Argue Strategic Petroleum Reserve Should Be Scrapped. Jerry Taylor and Peter Van Doren, senior fellows at the Cato Institute, write in the New York Times (1/3, 1.19M), "The rise in fuel prices that followed Hurricanes Katrina and Rita has prompted many members of Congress to call for new and expanded federal reserves of crude oil, diesel fuel, home heating oil, jet fuel and propane. Proponents of stockpiling claim that if the government were to hoard those commodities when prices were low, it could unleash them on the market when supplies are tight, thus dampening price increases and stabilizing the market. But the experience in this country with the strategic petroleum reserve strongly suggests that such government-managed stockpiles are a waste of taxpayers' money. Rather than increasing the stockpile, the reserve should be emptied and closed." Economists "agree that every barrel of oil we put in the public reserve displaces oil that might otherwise have gone into private inventories. How much displacement occurs is unclear, but there is little doubt that it's significant. If the reserve is thought of as an insurance policy against high prices, the cost of the policy has been more expensive than the dangers the stockpile is meant to prevent. Americans should resist the drive to expand public stockpiles. Instead, we should sell while the selling is good."

Opponents Of ICC Said To Have Little To Stand On. The Washington Post (1/2) editorializes, "With a key federal approval expected soon for the proposed intercounty connector -- the east-west toll highway that would transverse Maryland suburbs -- the road's opponents are mounting an eleventh-hour anti-ICC campaign. Having failed over the years to sway the traffic-weary public with other arguments (environmental impact, cost, effect on traffic), the foes are focusing on how much the road will cost to use. This, too, is a losing argument."

Loyal Mdewakanton Tribe Wins Court Battle Over Minnesota Land. Indian Country Today (1/3, Melmer) reports, "Membership in a Dakota tribe is expected to more than double after an accurate list of lineal descendants of the Loyalist Mdewakanton is complied and verified, as ordered by a federal court." ICT continues, "U.S. Court of Federal Claims Judge Charles Lettow has denied a U.S. Justice Department motion to reconsider his earlier ruling that gave the descendants of the Loyalist Mdewakanton rights to land in Minnesota. … Lettow also ruled that the federal government breached its trust obligations to the Loyalist Mdewakantons and their descendants when in a 1980 congressional act it put the land into trust for three federally recognized Dakota communities - Prairie Island, Shakopee and Lower Sioux. That act violated an 1886 contract signed by Mdewakanton leader John Bluestone, which gave that land to the Mdewakanton who were descendants of those who pledged loyalty to the United States in 1862. … Previously the land was either assigned to individual loyalists or leased, with the proceeds from the lease paid to the loyalists." ICT adds, "The loyalists want the land returned to them and Mdewakanton tribal membership, with full political power, restored. Lease revenues that were given to groups other than the loyalist's lineal descendants constitutes a breach of the contractual agreement by the federal government, the plaintiffs argued. Today's lineal descendants want compensation for the lost revenues. … Lettow's latest decision rejected the federal government's claim that it didn't mismanage the trust on behalf of the lineal descendants. He also rejected the argument that the 1886 contract did not authorize a trust responsibility to the loyalists. … Lettow ordered the government to perform an accounting to determine the size of financial compensation that is owed the loyalists' descendants."

Navajos Try To Stop Arizona Uranium Rush. The Arizona Republic (1/3, Shaffer) reports, "The price of uranium has tripled in the past two years, bringing with it the possibility of another uranium rush in Arizona, the state with the richest deposits of the ore and, along with New Mexico, the worst legacy associated with its mining." The Republic continues, "Last year, 700 mining claims were filed and 100 test holes were bored into the wild, remote high desert in northern Arizona. … Scott Florence, director of the Bureau of Land Management's Arizona Strip district in St. George, Utah, said those numbers are significantly higher than any year since the frenzy of the 1980s. … 'Finding the right mine site is a real art. But it seems like everyone and their mother is trying now,' he said." The Republic adds, "Secondary supplies of uranium on the world market have virtually dried up, and China, India and Japan are clamoring for uranium for their burgeoning domestic nuclear-power industries. Uranium now fetches $36 a pound on the spot market. Four years ago, it was going for just over $7 a pound. … But not everyone is happy about the search for new mine sites. Navajo Nation President Joe Shirley Jr., stirred to action by the memory of how dangerous uranium mining can be, issued an executive order in November banning negotiations with uranium companies or uranium exploration on the three-state Navajo Nation, which was engulfed by a public health tragedy after the first wave of uranium mining began on its reservation in the 1950s. Dozens of premature deaths of Navajo miners and passed-on genetic defects have been attributed to uranium exposure."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Photographer Sues Over Mistreatment Due To Tourette's Syndrome. The Legal Times (1/2, Kelley) reports, "As a photographer for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Jeffrey Bell was frequently tapped to work on high-profile cases. Between 1991 and 2000 he was deployed throughout the United States and abroad to photograph matters involving terrorism, forensics, counterintelligence, and emergency response. … But according to a lawsuit Bell, a 43-year-old with Tourette's syndrome, filed recently in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, all that changed after an incident stemming from his disorder led to retaliation from his employer. Bell's trial is expected to start this week." The Times continues, "Court papers filed by Bell's attorney, Edith Marshall of Powers Pyles Sutter & Verville, state that Bell was taking a new medication to control his Tourette's when he became involved in a verbal altercation with a co-worker. Bell explained that the outburst was a side effect of his medicine, but he claims he was treated differently from that point on because of his Tourette's, a neurological disorder that can cause involuntary tics and vocalizations as well as obsessive-compulsive tendencies and hyperactivity." The Times adds, "Bell alleges that because of his Tourette's he was regarded as a 'problem personality' and often blamed for any workplace conflict that occurred."

Doctors Said To Fear DEA Action When Prescribing Pain Medications. In an story titled "Painful Choices: Physicians Challenged By Quest To End Suffering" the Deseret (UT) Morning News (1/2, Collins, Jarvik) writes, "The perception among doctors is that the regulatory environment has become more hostile, says Micke Brown, director of advocacy for the American Pain Foundation, headquartered in Baltimore. 'Many health care providers are running scared,' especially primary care physicians, she says. 'Some are even backing away from managing people's pain.'" Pain management doctor Lynn Webster, who heads the Utah Academy of Pain, "is an opioid advocate. … He argues that the undertreatment of pain is 'still a major problem' in Utah, in part because of doctors' fears of punishment by the federal Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) and the state Division of Occupational and Professional Licensing (DOPL). … Pain experts are waiting anxiously for the DEA to clarify its interpretation of the federal law that governs prescribing controlled substances for pain. DEA said the guidance was imminent more than a year ago. But pain experts, still waiting, continue to warn colleagues to err on the side of stricter federal interpretations."

Maryland Tax Dollars Said To Be Disproportionately Tied Up In Locking Up Addicts. In the Washington Post (1/1, B8), Tara Andrews, director of Justice Maryland and Democratic candidate for the state Senate from Baltimore City, writes "By the latest count, more than 250,000 Marylanders are in need of substance-abuse treatment. Even in Montgomery County, considered the state's wealthiest county, the treatment gap is great. Yet despite population growth, state funding for treatment has declined. More than three-quarters of those in Maryland prisons report having an alcohol or drug problem, and four out of 10 entering the state's prisons every year are locked up for drug offenses. Maryland has the third-highest percentage of prison admissions for drug offenses in the country. … Maryland tax dollars are disproportionately locked up by the incarceration of drug addicts, while providers of substance-abuse treatment make do with crumbs. A shift of dollars away from incarceration and toward a dedicated fund for treatment would make a world of difference and a world of sense."

Plan Colombia Credited With Record Number Of Cocaine Seizures. Reuters (12/31) reports, "Colombia seized a record 186 tons of cocaine [in 2005] thanks to a Washington-backed program aimed at cutting imports of the illegal drug to the United States, the Colombian government said on Friday. The haul, seized using equipment and expert advice provided by 'Plan Colombia,' was 26 percent more than last year and had a U.S. street value of $4.7 billion, Defense Minister Camilo Ospina told reporters. He said the increase was possible thanks in part to more than $3 billion in mostly military aid that the United States has provided since 2000 to help fight drug-running Marxist rebels fighting a decades-old insurgency. Washington says cocaine is becoming more expensive on U.S. streets, a sign that the money, largely steered toward aerial spraying of coca bushes used to make cocaine, is making the drug less available."

IMMIGRATION:

Migrant Advocacy Group Celebrates 10 Years. The Miami Herald (1/2, Chardy) reports, "Alfredo López-Sánchez languished for months at a detention center for migrant children in Southwest Miami-Dade -- until an attorney for a local immigrant rights group realized the Guatemalan did not understand Spanish." The Herald continues, "The lawyer from the Miami-based Florida Immigrant Advocacy Center eventually found an interpreter who spoke López-Sánchez's Mayan language. … That was September 2001. A year later, López-Sánchez -- then 17 -- was free and on his way to getting a green card." The Herald adds, "Such successes have turned the Florida Immigrant Advocacy Center into a powerhouse in national advocacy for persecuted migrants too poor to hire a lawyer. … FIAC, as the group is known in the immigrant rights community, is marking its 10th anniversary today -- with a string of victories, and some defeats, in what often seems an uphill battle against ever-tougher immigration laws. It plans a 10th anniversary celebration dinner March 6. … The group began in 1996 -- two years after former House Speaker Newt Gingrich's conservative revolution swept Congress with calls to close the borders and even to shut the school door to children of undocumented immigrants. In the end, Congress amended immigration law, making it extremely difficult for any immigrant without proper papers to avoid detention or deportation -- though lawmakers dropped provisions that would have let states bar children from public schools if their parents entered the country illegally. … Ten years later, in the fallout from the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, immigration law is again facing calls from conservatives in Congress to toughen the rules for citizenship, including barring U.S.-born children of illegal immigrants from becoming automatic citizens and the deportation of migrants encountered on the streets without the right to a court review to plead their case."

Conflicting Public Attitudes On Illegal Immigration Noted. The Washington Post (1/3, A7, Balz, 744K) notes the "sometimes conflicting public attitudes" on illegal immigration. A Washington Post-ABC News poll taken in mid-December "found Americans alarmed by the federal government's failure to do more to block the flow of illegal immigration and critical of the impact of illegal immigration on the country but receptive to the aspirations of undocumented immigrants living and working in the United States. … The Post-ABC News poll found that four in five Americans think the government is not doing enough to prevent illegal immigration, with three in five saying they strongly hold that view. The same poll found that 56 percent of Americans believe that illegal immigrants have done more to hurt the country than to help it, with 37 percent saying they help the country. About three in five Republicans and a bare majority of Democrats agreed that illegal immigrants are detrimental to the country. The only groups in the poll who disagreed were people with postgraduate degrees, those with incomes exceeding $100,000 and nonwhite respondents. The Post-ABC poll did not include enough Hispanics to provide an accurate reading of their sentiment, but a Pew Hispanic Center survey last summer found that two in three Latinos said that undocumented migrants help the economy. … In the recent Post-ABC News poll, President Bush got his lowest marks on immigration, with 33 percent saying they approved of how he was handling the issue. That may largely reflect irritation over the government's failure to control the borders."

Hayworth Set To Publish An "Anti-Immigration Manifesto." Time (1/9, Allen) reports in its "Notebook" column that Rep. J.D. Hayworth "is about to publish an anti-immigration manifesto, Whatever It Takes, that should rile up right-wing radio just as the White House was hoping to gain traction for a broad immigration-reform package." In the book Hayworth "calls for deploying active-duty troops to the border and considering a 'border security fence from the Pacific Ocean to the Gulf of Mexico.'" Hayworth "contends that Bush's plan to confer temporary legal status on Mexicans working in the U.S. amounts to 'false compassion.' But Senator John McCain plans to push hard this winter for such a program. House Republican leaders say they might accept one if immigrants had to return home to apply for temporary work permits. Hayworth tells TIME that even that would be too lenient, designed to appease 'left-wing grievance mongers' and businesses that want cheap labor. Bush may have sounded as if he were running for sheriff during his recent border visits, but to convince the likes of Hayworth, he'll have to talk a lot tougher."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Argued President Should Issue "Interpretive Signing Statements." As a Justice Department lawyer in 1986, Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito made the case or presidential power, laying out a strategy under which the president would routinely issues statements about the meaning of statutes when he signs the into law. The Washington Post (1/2, A11, Lee) reports that such "'interpretive signing statements' would be a significant departure from run-of-the-mill bill signing pronouncements, which are 'often little more than a press release,' Alito wrote. The idea was to flag constitutional concerns and get courts to pay as much attention to the president's take on a law as to 'legislative intent.'" The Post adds, "The Reagan administration popularized the use of such statements and subsequent administrations continued the practice. (The courts have yet to give them much weight, though.) President Bush has been especially fond of them, issuing at least 108 in his first term, according to presidential scholar Phillip J. Cooper of Portland State University in Oregon."

Alito Said To Have An "Everyman Appeal." The New York Times(1/2, Kirkpatrick) says that according to people who have participated in Alito's rehearsals for this week's confirmation hearings say he "will never be as polished and camera-ready as Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was at his own hearings a few months ago." But two of Judge Alito's supporters who participated in the murder boards, speaking about the confidential sessions on condition of anonymity for fear of White House reprisals, said they emerged convinced that his demeanor was a political asset because it gave him an Everyman appeal." The Times adds, "Senators of both parties have said it will not be easy to follow Chief Justice Roberts," and "some Democrats said they already had much more pointed questions waiting for Judge Alito, focusing mainly on strongly worded statements that he made as lawyer in the Reagan administration about his conservative approach to the Constitution, abortion rights and other issues. Leading Democratic senators have said his responses will be a deciding factor in whether they seek to block the nomination by filibustering."

Alito Hearings Will Test Domestic Spying Program's Political Resonance. Time (1/9, Tumulty, Allen) the opening of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito's confirmation hearings this week will be the first test of the domestic spying program's "political resonance." According to Time, Alito opponents, "who had planned to put the abortion issue on center stage, are quickly retooling their strategy. … Alito's record could give his critics plenty of ammunition. The Third Circuit judge has long been an advocate of the unitary-executive concept, a constitutional interpretation that is a favorite of Bush's and Vice President Dick Cheney's, which argues that the President should have nearly total control of Executive Branch agencies and resist any incursion on that power by Congress." Time adds, "Administration officials concede that the controversy will inject a volatile new element into the confirmation debate but say Alito will resist getting drawn in."

Alito's Writings Suggest He Will Accelerate Court's Shift To The Right. U.S. News and World Report (1/9, Halloran) says the battle over Alito "shows every sign of achieving Borkian dimensions. As Alito prepares for his confirmation hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee next week, the portraits being painted of him have become ever more cartoonish, nasty, and one-dimensional. … Behind the caricatures, however, are real questions. Who, really, is Sam Alito, and what kind of a justice would he be? An analysis of Alito's writings as a Reagan administration lawyer, and of his opinions from the bench, reveals him to be a solidly conservative jurist but one who also pays deference to precedent. … His lengthy paper trail suggests he will accelerate the court's shift to the right on several important issues," including abortion, civil rights, capital punishment and federalism.

Roberts, Alito Seen As Likely Allies Of Business. Academics and business experts say Chief Justice John Roberts and Alito are likely to be allies of manufacturers and business, The AP (1/1, Cassata) reported, "One represented corporate interests as a private attorney; the other often sided with employers in lawsuits filed by workers. Beyond their decisions in individual cases, the Roberts court also has the potential to craft a consistent philosophy on business issues, something that several academics argue has been lacking in recent years since the departure of Lewis Powell in 1987. … The court's highly selective docket for the current term will give Roberts and Alito, assuming the latter is confirmed, ample opportunity to shape the court. Among the critical issues for companies are the Supreme Court's decisions in antitrust cases, government regulation of land development and the commerce clause. … Abortion and social issues dominate the public debate over the Supreme Court, but business matters make up a significant portion of the justices' work."

Interest Groups To Intensify Rhetoric In Debate Over Alito Nomination. USA Today (1/3, Kiely, Memmott, 2.31M) reports the Senate hearings on Judge Samuel Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court "are set to begin Monday. This week, groups on both sides of the debate plan to launch elaborate phone, e-mail and ad campaigns." Ralph Neas of the People for the American Way said, "There's no question there will be an acceleration of efforts." Neas "plans a wave of TV ads" in opposition to the nomination. Meanwhile, Christian Myers of Progress for America said, "It's game time now, and we're making a serious push." The "conservative group will spend $500,000 to broadcast a pro-Alito ad on cable television and in four states where senators may be undecided." Other groups, "from the conservative Focus on the Family to the liberal Leadership Council on Civil Rights, plan phone banks, e-mail blitzes and visits to newspaper editorial boards and radio hosts." But "relatively few senators will get most of the attention. One is Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, a centrist Pennsylvania Republican who will preside over Alito's confirmation hearings." Both sides are "focusing on senators whose votes will help determine whether there's enough Senate support for a filibuster." The key senators "are centrists; all say they're undecided about Alito. Several face re-election fights this year. The biggest group is 'red state Democrats.'"

The New York Times (1/3, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports that in the "final days before" the Alito hearings, "partisans on both sides are pulling out all the stops in an effort to sway public opinion. Moving beyond Judge Alito's judicial record, a coalition of liberal groups is preparing commercials attacking his integrity and credibility instead, several people involved in the effort said Monday." Conservatives, "for their part, are capitalizing on ethnic pride to rally Italian-American support for Judge Alito with public events and newspaper advertisements. The efforts are aimed particularly at the Northeastern States, where some moderate Republican senators have expressed doubts about his confirmation." The advertising campaigns "on both sides are the most visible components of a last-minute push by advocacy groups anticipating a potentially close Senate vote." People "involved in the liberal coalition, which includes People for the American Way, the legal group Alliance for Justice, the A.F.L.-C.I.O., the N.A.A.C.P., the Sierra Club and abortion rights groups, said it planned to run new commercials, beginning this week with radio and television advertisements in selected states intended to undercut Judge Alito's credibility." The sources "said the first advertisements would focus on occasional lapses from a pledge Judge Alito made at the 1990 hearings for his confirmation to the appeals court that he would recuse himself from cases involving the companies that managed his mutual fund investments, Vanguard and Smith Barney."

Alito View's On Reapportionment Cases Seen As Debatable. In a New York Times editorial observer story (1/3), Adam Cohen says, "There has been a lot of talk about the abortion views of Judge Alito, President Bush's Supreme Court nominee. But his views on the redistricting cases may be more important." Sen. Joseph Biden "said recently that Judge Alito's statements about one person one vote could do more to jeopardize his nomination than his statements about Roe v. Wade. Rejecting the one-person-one-vote principle is a radical position. If Judge Alito still holds this view today, he could lead the court to accept a very different vision of American democracy, one in which it would be far easier for powerful special interests to get a stranglehold on government."

Critics Said To Be Wrong For Seizing On Alito's Memos In Abortion, Wiretap Cases. In a New York Times op-ed (1/3), former Reagan Administration solicitor general Charles Fried says Judge Alito's "opponents have seized upon two memorandums he wrote when he was a junior lawyer in the office of the solicitor general: one on the Thornburgh case, which dealt with Roe v. Wade, and the other on Mitchell v. Forsyth, which addressed the attorney general's personal liability for wiretaps found to violate the Constitution. Determined to fit the man to the Scalito caricature with which they hope to defeat his nomination to the Supreme Court, Judge Alito's detractors ignore the context and the content of both documents." But "these were not the writings of a political operative seeking to make trouble or advance an agenda. The solicitor general takes a case to the Supreme Court only when some other part of the government - perhaps a division of the Department of Justice or another agency - recommends it." As in "every case, a junior staff member was assigned to analyze these recommendations and propose a course of action to the solicitor general. It fell to Judge Alito to write those memos." But what is "remarkable in both cases is that Judge Alito recommended against taking the position that more senior, politically appointed officials were urging the solicitor general to take before the court. In the abortion case, not only the head of the civil division but also other high-ranking officials were urging that I, as the solicitor general at the time, ask the court to overturn Roe v. Wade. The bottom line of Judge Alito's memo was that I should not do that."

Roberts Calls For Tighter Court Security, Pay Raises For Judges. US Chief Justice John Roberts yesterday called for better court security and higher salaries to ensure a diverse mix of judges on the bench. Reuters (1/2, Charles) reports that Roberts wrote in his 2005 Report on the Federal Judiciary, "I recognize that it is a bit presumptuous for me to issue this report at this time, barely three months after taking the oath as chief justice," but, "But I do not intend to start the new year by breaking with a 30-year-old tradition, and so will highlight in this report issues that are pressing and apparent." Reuters adds, "Roberts expressed concern over violence directed at judges and in courts in the past year. He mentioned the murders of a U.S. district judge's husband and mother in Chicago by an angry litigant, and a court shooting in Atlanta that left a judge, court reporter and deputy dead. … Roberts also returned to a theme that Rehnquist regularly mentioned in his annual reports: the need to raise pay for judges. … Roberts said the real pay of federal judges has declined since 1969 by almost 24 percent, while the real pay of the average American worker during the same period had increased by more than 15 percent."

Bush Team Notable For Lack Of Turnover. The Washington Times/AP (1/3) reports the loyalty of President Bush's aides have limited turnover. After "two wars, devastating strikes by terrorists and hurricanes, a bruising re-election and countless legislative battles, President Bush's team is continuing the trend -- defying history and shake-up rumors to remain almost entirely intact five years in." Only a "handful of the president's most senior aides have departed since Mr. Bush came to Washington in 2001. Though some have shifted roles, it's a familiar cast of characters at the president's side: Vice President Dick Cheney, Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr., political guru Karl Rove, Deputy Chief of Staff Joe Hagin, counselor Dan Bartlett, budget chief Joshua B. Bolten, White House Counsel Harriet Miers and press secretary Scott McClellan." Bush's Cabinet "has seen more turnover than his top-level White House staff. Still, a third of the 21 Cabinet-rank positions are held by the same person as when Mr. Bush came to Washington." David Gergen said, "I don't think there's any other president in the modern era that has seen this kind of stability."

Medicare Drug Program Gets Off To An "Uneven" Start. A somewhat negative story in the New York Times (1/3, Pear, 1.19M) says the Medicare prescription drug program "got off to an uneven start across the country" this week. The Times says that while people "who applied early and had identification cards in hand were often able to fill prescriptions through the new program," others "were stymied in their efforts to take advantage of the drug benefit, as pharmacists spent hours trying to confirm eligibility and enrollment by telephone and computer." The Times adds, "Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said he was pleased with the first days' experience. 'Many thousands of people were able to get their prescriptions filled,' he said."

Many Seniors Still Befuddled As Medicare Drug Benefit Takes Effect. ABC World News Tonight (1/1, story 2, 2:35, Harris) reported, "The beginning of 2006 means millions of senior citizens can get prescription drug benefits through Medicare. Pharmacists say tomorrow may be the busiest day of the year, with many seniors coming in with many questions about their plans. While 43 million seniors are eligible, only 1 million have signed up for what some consider the most confusing government benefits ever." ABC (Yang) added, "Medicare officials say there's still plenty of time. Enrollment ends May 15th. They're now running TV ads, encouraging people to help their moms and dads. … Medicare officials say one of the most efficient ways to sort through all the options is on the Internet. But 75% of seniors say they've never even been online."

The CBS Evening News (1/1, story 5, 2:20, Roberts) reported, "Huge fanfare and a lot of confusion are accompanying the biggest change in Medicare history. The government's new prescription drug plan which is supposed to make drugs more afford to believe millions of Americans seniors goes into effect today." CBS (Chen) added, "20 million low income Americans" are "being forced off state drug coverage programs and into the myriad of prescription plans run by private insurance companies. Supporters expect as many as 10 million more will voluntarily sign up, though only one million have so far."

Gingrich Urges GOP To Propose Lobbying Reforms. Former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich was asked on CBS' Face the Nation (1/1, Schieffer) if Republicans are in danger of suffering losses in this year's elections due to scandals tied to several GOP congressmen. Gingrich relied, "I think that this coming year…is going to be a very big year of decision for Republicans. We have to be the party of reform. We can't just be the party of pork barrel. … I'd look very seriously at completely rethinking the relationship with lobbyists. I'd require every lobbying activity to be listed on the Thomas system, the computer system people can access, so you'd know if your member of Congress, whether they went golfing, whether they had dinner. I'd make this stuff public and transparent. I'd consider not allowing fund-raisers in Washington. I think this whole system has grown, frankly, a little sick with insiders raising money for insiders to re-elect insiders to do favors for insiders. I think this is not just a Republican problem. Don't misunderstand me. But I think we are much more naturally the party of reform than the Democrats are."

Cheney, Rumsfeld Have Neighboring Estates On Maryland's Eastern Shore. A lengthy story on the front page of the Washington Post's (1/3, C1, Montgomery) Style section looks at the "expensive waterfront estates" of Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in St. Michael's, Maryland. Rumsfeld's retreat, Mount Misery and Cheney's place, Ballintober, are "are separated by two miles of narrow lanes." The Post reports, "What gives? Is a secret weekend war cabinet forming? Are yachts and duck decoys part of the plan to transform the military? Did Cheney tire of his secure undisclosed hideaway and opt to join Rummy in his serene disclosed getaway? We are probably thinking too hard. The search for obscure meaning -- that reflex for overinterpretation -- is so Western Shore. The Bay Bridge is where you lighten up and leave behind your fevered quest for the matrix behind the mask. … Cheney may be the first part-time resident with a full Secret Service detail, but the famous, the rich and the powerful of Washington (and New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh) have been setting a course for St. Michaels and the wider, watery Talbot County for generations. The area has functioned like the Adirondacks did for the swells of the Gilded Age, Newport for the robber barons and the Hamptons for Wall Street. But somehow St. Michaels…survives as an anti-Newport, a non-Nantucket, an un-Hamptons. Not overrun, overpriced, overglitzed. Not yet."

Mankiw Offers New Year's Resolutions For Lawmakers. In Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.11M), N. Gregory Mankiw, former chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, offers a list of New Year's resolutions, which "any senator, congressman or presidential wannabe is free to adopt… as his or her own." Among Mankiw's resolutions: "This year I will be straight about the budget mess. I know that the federal budget is on an unsustainable path. I know that when the baby-boom generation retires and becomes eligible for Social Security and Medicare, all hell is going to break loose. I know that the choices aren't pretty -- either large cuts in promised benefits or taxes vastly higher than anything ever experienced in U.S. history. I am going to admit these facts to the American people, and I am going to say which choice I favor." Mankiw adds, "This year I will admit that there are some good taxes. Everyone hates taxes, but the government needs to fund its operations, and some taxes can actually do some good in the process. I will tell the American people that a higher tax on gasoline is better at encouraging conservation than are heavy-handed CAFE regulations. It would not only encourage people to buy more fuel-efficient cars, but it would encourage them to drive less, such as by living closer to where they work." Mankiw also writes, "This year I will be modest about what government can do. I know that economic prosperity comes not from government programs but from entrepreneurial inspiration."

Grassley Makes Case For GOP Deficit Reduction Bill. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley writes in USA Today (1/3, 2.31M), "In such a partisanship-first environment, any fair-minded move toward a more responsible budget is surely welcomed by the taxpayers. The GOP-sponsored deficit reduction bill is that sort of initiative. It's modest, representing just one-half of 1% of what would otherwise be spent during the next five years. Its Medicaid provisions reflect what governors nationwide -- Republicans and Democrats -- asked Congress to do to help them manage the program in their states and ensure its viability for low-income pregnant women and children." Grassley adds, "The tax relief in question is also part of stemming the red ink in Washington. The tax policies passed by the Senate and House aren't new at all. They merely extend expiring tax laws so that taxpayers aren't hit with a tax increase. This legislation is needed to protect 14 million families from the alternative minimum tax meant for wealthy individuals. It includes tax breaks for higher education and teachers who buy classroom supplies. It closes tax shelter loopholes. And it includes pro-growth measures that have helped fuel our economy." Grassley concludes, "Congress needs to do a lot more to control spending and reduce the deficit, but it's wrong to dismiss a step in the right direction."

USA Today Says GOP Bill Lacks Conscience. An accompanying editorial in USA Today (1/3, 2.31M) says "it would be nice to see in Washington a new commitment to fiscal restraint and a resolve to bequeath a solvent government and robust economy to future generations. To listen to many Republican lawmakers, a move in that direction is underway. … It would be nice to see it that way, but to believe that is to believe in fairy tales. This political sleight of hand is simply too small to matter and is designed to evade the real financial predicament — runaway health care costs, unsustainable retirement benefits and tax rates receipts well below historical averages. The cowardice in that is bad enough, but the measure is also cruel. Virtually all of Congress' cuts are made to programs for the poor and the young, who lack organized lobbies. Absent congressional conscience, they are simply targets of political opportunity. And be assured conscience is lacking." USA adds, "Congress will not deserve credit until it takes on health costs, tells seniors it can't sustain a Social Security system in which one of every three adults collects benefits, and raises taxes for the wealthy back to more reasonable levels. Until then, each year will bring the nation and the federal government only closer to fiscal crisis."

OTHER NEWS:

West Virginia Coal Miners Trapped After Mine Explosion. Rescue crews yesterday sought desperately to reach 13 West Virginia coal miners trapped after a mine explosion in Tallmansville. The story was the lead on both CBS and NBC last night; ABC was preempted for college football last night. The CBS Evening News (1/02, lead story, 4:00, Schieffer) reported, "They are still not certain what caused it. A lightning strike is the best guess now, but before dawn this morning, there was an explosion at a coal mine in Tallmansville in central West Virginia. Tonight 13 minors are trapped there, some 160 feet underground. They have air purifying equipment but no oxygen. For most of the day, poisonous gas has kept rescue workers from trying to reach them. But late today, rescue workers did enter the mine." CBS (Orr) added, "An eight-man rescue team has just entered the mine and are now traveling a tunnel in the hill behind me going some two miles inside the hill trying to reach the miners who are trapped there. So far it's a bit grim because there's no communication with the trapped miners."

NBC Nightly News (1/2, lead story, 3:15, Holt) reported, "Tonight, a life and death drama is taking place outside a coal mine in West Virginia." NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 2, 2:45, Holt) also spoke with NBC News Robert Hager, who covered the 2002 Quecreek Mine accident, where nine miners were successfully rescued after begin trapped by a flood. Hager said, "This one looks grimmer to me, mostly because in that case, they were dealing with a flood. In this case, it's been an explosion, and an explosion does two things. It creates a lot of debris and it's blocked the shaft, and eats up oxygen." The Washington Times/AP (1/3, Smith), Washington Post (1/3, A1, Tyson, Vedantam, 744K) and New York Times (1/3, Dao, 1.19M), among other newspapers, also report the story.

Bernanke Faces Difficult Balance Sheet, Greenspan Comparisons. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Ip, 2.11M) reports that incoming Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke faces "two major stumbling blocks" as he steps into the post being vacated by outgoing chairman Alan Greenspan: "difficult comparisons" with Greenspan and "a balance sheet with potential land mines." Bernanke's job "is complicated by a balance sheet loaded with debt and possibly overvalued assets. … 'It could be argued that Greenspan is handing Bernanke a poisoned chalice: an economy with an impressive track record, but one burdened with unprecedented financial imbalances,' Martin Barnes, editor of the Bank Credit Analyst, a forecast journal, wrote in November. 'It will be hard to rebuild household savings, reduce the current-account deficit and stabilize the housing sector without causing some economic pain.'"

Economy Expected To Grow For Fifth Straight Year, But At Slower Rate. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Gerena-Morales, Annett, 2.11M) reports, "Strong spending by businesses should power the nation's economy to a fifth straight year of expansion in 2006, according to a survey of economists' forecasts, but a softening housing market is likely to slow the overall pace of growth. For the past five years, real-estate wealth has supported the economy by providing consumers with cash to buy everything from designer kitchens to luxury vacations to new or second homes. Some economists believe that the boom has been responsible for creating more than one million American jobs since 2000." But "as home sales start to slow and the inventory of unsold homes climbs, many economists believe that home prices will rise more gradually, or even decline, delivering a jolt that causes consumers to rein in spending. That, in turn, may cause economic growth to slow." The Journal adds, "The consensus forecast of 56 economists surveyed by The Wall Street Journal is that the nation's gross domestic product -- the broadest measure of economic output -- will grow at an annual rate of 3.5% in the first half of 2006 and 3.1% in the second half. While those growth rates are considered respectable, they would fall short of the 4.1% average of the past 2½ years. … On the positive side, economists expect overall inflation to moderate this year."

Hubbard Credits Bush Tax Cuts With Helping Economy After Recession. Former Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers Glenn Hubbard said on Fox News' Special Report (1/2), "The economy is growing at a potential rate of around 3.5 percent, which is truly extraordinary. It really traces the two things, I think. One is how well financial markets work to allocate risk and capital in the country. And the other is how amazingly flexible American labor markets are. There's really no economy in the world that has capital and labor markets as efficient as this one." Asked about polls showing that President Bush is getting credit for the "revival of the economy," Hubbard said that "the president deserves credit for a set of tax policies that really helped the economy bounce back from the recession. But the underlying strength of the economy has little to do with Washington and a lot to do with the kind of institutions that helped the economy absorb technological change and absorb shocks, whether those shocks in financial markets or the real economy in your Katrina example. That is really the heart and soul of this high growth rate for the economy."

Stock Market "A Dud" In '00s. USA Today (1/3, Shell, 2.31M) reports, "This isn't your father's bull market. The '80s were great. The '90s were even better. But the '00s so far have been pretty much a dud. … It's unlikely, for example, that the Dow Jones industrial average, which declined 0.6% in 2005, will be able to come anywhere near its 228% gain in the '80s and its 318% gain in the '90s. The blue-chip barometer is actually down 6.8% since the end of 1999."

However, the New York Times (1/3, Dash, 1.19M) runs a report under the headline "After A Resilient '05, Wall St. Isn't Counting Out '06," in which it says "the economy proved more resilient than the worriers expected. Consumers continued to spend. The housing market did not collapse. Economic growth has been robust. And the stock market even had a year-end rally going - with the Dow Jones industrial average flirting with 11,000 - until it fizzled in the final weeks." So "it is not surprising that Wall Street has muted the alarms about 2006. Over all, analysts are relatively bullish in their outlooks. But concerns remain about the health of consumer spending and the effects of higher interest rates. Five Wall Street analysts who were surveyed predicted that the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, which closed 2005 at 1,248.49, would end 2006 between 1,170 and 1,400."

Recession Worries Said To Be Rising For 2006. The CBS Evening News (1/1, story 6, 2: 20, Roberts) reported, "Like a roller coaster, the stock market had some wild ups and downs in 2005, but ended up right where it started. So what's next?" CBS (Alfonsi) added, "With big business struggling, unsteady interest rates, and signs of a recession, the best some forecasters are hoping for 2006 is an average year." A lot of investors "saw less-than-strong stock returns in 2005. The Dow finished in the red for the first time since 2002. The S&P was flat and the tech-heavy Nasdaq didn't fare much better. If you consider a year marked with soaring gas prices and natural disasters, those flat numbers don't look too bad. But what was bad news in 2005 could be good news for the market in 2006."

Dallas-Area Among Regions Reporting Robust Employment Numbers. The Dallas Morning News (1/2, Kreimer) reports, "An expanding economy and a skilled labor shortage have sparked a resurgence in the recruitment of employed and unemployed workers alike, including those at the high end of the pay scale, hiring experts say. That makes this year's outlook for job seekers the best since the turn of the millennium. … The Dallas-area job market hasn't seen growth that robust since 2000, when employment rose 3.9 percent, according to Texas Workforce Commission data."

Only Some Parts Of US Said To Be Experiencing Housing Bubble. The New York Times' Paul Krugman (1/2) writes, "In spite of record home prices, housing in most of America remains surprisingly affordable, thanks to low interest rates. That fact may seem to say that there's no housing bubble. But it doesn't. … It's…worth noting that the reason housing was so expensive in 1981 and 1982 was that mortgage interest rates were extremely high. That made recovery easy, because all it took to make housing affordable again was for interest rates to return to normal levels. This time, with interest rates already low by historical standards, restoring affordability will require a big fall in housing prices."

Minimum Wage In 17 States, District Of Columbia Higher Than Federal Level. Nearly half of the US civilian labor force lives in states where the pay if higher than the minimum wage set by the federal government. The New York Times (1/2, Broder) reports, "Seventeen states and the District of Columbia have acted on their own to set minimum wages that exceed the $5.15 an hour rate set by the federal government, and this year lawmakers in dozens of the remaining states will debate raising the minimum wage. Some states that already have a higher minimum wage than the federal rate will be debating further increases and adjustments for inflation." The federal minimum wage was raised from $4.75 in 1997. Since then, "efforts in Congress to increase the amount have been stymied largely by Republican lawmakers and business groups who argued that a higher minimum wage would drive away jobs. Thwarted by Congress, labor unions and community groups have increasingly focused their efforts at raising the minimum wage on the states, where the issue has received more attention than in Republican-dominated Washington, said Bill Samuel, the legislative director of the national A.F.L.-C.I.O."

NYTimes Says Congress Should Raise Minimum Wage. An editorial in the New York Times (1/3, 1.19M) says, "The federal minimum wage has been a paltry $5.15 an hour for more than eight years. Polls show that there is strong popular support for raising it, but Congress has resisted. Unions, community groups and advocates for the poor are increasingly taking the matter directly to voters through state referendums to raise their states' minimum wages, according to an article yesterday in The Times. Their intentions are laudable, but the efforts only highlight Congress's failure to set the federal minimum wage at a reasonable level." The Times adds, "State minimum-wage referendums are not ideal. Policy matters of this kind are best handled by legislatures, and the nation would be better off with a uniform federal standard. But given where the federal minimum wage now stands, state-level initiatives are the only game in town. Those grass-roots debates may shame Congress into taking long-overdue action to help the lowest-paid workers."

WSJournal Decries NEA Use Of Members' Dues. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.11M) says "If we told you that an organization gave away more than $65 million last year to Jesse Jackson's Rainbow PUSH Coalition, the Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation, Amnesty International, AIDS Walk Washington and dozens of other such advocacy groups, you'd probably assume we were describing a liberal philanthropy. In fact, those expenditures have all turned up on the financial disclosure report of the National Education Association, the country's largest teachers union. Under new federal rules pushed through by Secretary of Labor Elaine Chao, large unions must now disclose in much more detail how they spend members' dues money." The Journal adds that "even a cursory glance at the NEA's recent filings" exposes "the union as a honey pot for left-wing political causes that have nothing to do with teachers, much less students. … It's well understood that the NEA is an arm of the Democratic National Committee. (Or is it the other way around?) But we wonder if the union's rank-and-file stand in unity behind this laundry list of left-to-liberal recipients of money that comes out of their pockets."

WSJournal Praises Yale's Refusal To Give Anarchist Professor Tenure. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.11M) editorializes, "Until recently, David Graeber was an associate professor of anthropology at Yale University, with a field specialty in Madagascar and a salary of $63,000. He is also a self-declared anarchist who has been arrested at antiglobalization rallies. Last spring, Yale denied him tenure. Mr. Graeber was outraged, suspecting the decision might have something to do with his politics." The journal adds, "One might fairly ask of Mr. Graeber why, if his anarchist convictions are sincere, he would seek to join the very employing class that he is otherwise pledged to struggle against. … In recent interviews, Mr. Graeber has given his answer: 'I'm not really an anarchist as a professor,' he told the New York Times. 'I figured I'd be a scholar in New Haven and an activist in New York.' So it turns out that even anarchists have their bourgeois ambitions. That's fair enough, but so is Yale's decision to deny Mr. Graeber tenure, and for what we suspect were not political motives. Among the qualities that characterize Ivy League faculties these days, hostility to liberal or radical politics isn't among them."

WPost Says Baltimore's Problems Predate O'Malley. An editorial in the Washington Post (1/3, A16, 744K) says, "No doubt, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley rues the day when, as a candidate for office, he pledged to reduce the number of murders in the city to 150 annually. Instead, Baltimore's murder rate has remained stubbornly high -- it has not dipped below 250 since Mr. O'Malley took office in 1999 -- and this year the numbers attest again to the ongoing bloodbath. … Now that Mr. O'Malley is trying to become governor, Baltimore's murder rate represents a natural soft target for his political foes. … The question is how much blame can be fairly apportioned to Mr. O'Malley. Under his administration, overall violent crime in Baltimore, including rapes, robberies and assaults, has dropped sharply -- more sharply, in fact, than it has in other large cities. Real estate values have soared and, probably more significantly, Baltimore has stanched the outflow of middle-class residents who fled the city for years, right through the 1990s. Mr. O'Malley's popularity in the city is broad and deep, and no one accuses him of not trying to attack the murder rate head-on." The Post adds, "Political opponents of Mr. O'Malley can make all the hay they want, but the failures in Baltimore that have contributed to the ghastly murder rampage -- including low-performing schools and inefficient parole, probation and juvenile justice systems as well as the drug scourge -- predated his time in office. At issue is how effectively has Mr. O'Malley stepped up to those problems as well. His attempts and failures to rein in the murder rate deserve scrutiny, but so do government and society at large in Maryland -- and at all levels."

New State Laws Deal With Technology, Security. The Christian Science Monitor (1/3, Scherer, 61K) reports on new state laws which will take effect this year. The Monitor reports, "A number of state legislatures have focused on the impact of technology. For example, some automobile companies are installing 'black boxes' in their more expensive models. These devices, like those in airplanes, record the direction and speed of a car, steering and braking performance, and the status of the driver's seat belt. Now, Nevada has enacted legislation that requires manufacturers to notify buyers if a car contains such a device and what the black box can record. In addition, the information in the box can be downloaded or retrieved only by the owner of the vehicle. … Many states have also become alarmed over 'security breaches,' especially by companies with credit-card or Social Security information. Six states - Connecticut, Illinois, Louisiana, Maine, Minnesota, and Nevada - are requiring companies to notify consumers if sensitive financial information has been stolen. Connecticut goes even further: Residents can "freeze" their credit reports if there has been a slip-up. New Jersey and Virginia, meanwhile, have barred making public a person's Social Security number."

Liberal Crusader Hirschkop Nears Retirement. The Legal Times (1/2, McLure) reports on the impending retirement of long-time liberal attorney Philip Hirschkop, who is "known not only for his legal prowess but his bombastic and outspoken manner. Hirschkop, now 69, is preparing to close his law offices in Old Town Alexandria, Va., marking the end of a colorful, four-decade career that made him an icon among left-wing lawyers." The Times continues, "For the past two decades, Hirschkop has served as the outside general counsel for People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, the controversial animal rights group known for its militant advocacy of vegetarianism and its proclivity for throwing pies at fur-wearing fashionistas. … But long before he hoisted PETA's standard in battle, Hirschkop had made his mark as a civil rights lawyer and as an opponent of the Vietnam War. Perhaps his most significant case was Loving v. Virginia, a landmark 1967 U.S. Supreme Court case that overturned Jim Crow-era laws banning interracial marriage — a case in which Hirschkop presented the main argument when he was just two years out of law school." The Times adds, "Since that auspicious start, he's worked for a member of the House Un-American Activities Committee, donned a Viet-Cong armband to protest the war, and stood for the free-speech rights of the American Nazi Party. In one six-year span, 17 disciplinary complaints were brought against him at the Virginia State Bar — a distinction Hirschkop bears proudly. The complaints, he says, were 'never for screwing a client, only for making public statements' about pending litigation."

Relief Agency Head Urges Donors To Choose Charities Carefully. Richard M. Walden, president of the international relief agency Operation USA, writes in the New York Times (1/3, 1.19M), "Money is the mother's milk of disaster relief. And over the last 12 months - with the Indian Ocean tsunami, the hurricanes on the Gulf Coast and the Pakistan earthquake - fund-raising records have been broken by the King Kong of relief agencies, the American Red Cross, and by many smaller organizations as well. … In late November it was reported that the American Red Cross still had $400 million of the $567 million it had collected for the tsunami since Dec. 26, 2004. Meanwhile, many of the countries hit by the waves, all of which have their own national Red Cross or Red Crescent societies, continue to beg for more help with housing, health and education programs. Why our Red Cross holds on to so much money is a mystery, but it is hardly the only agency that does so. A survey by InterAction, an umbrella group of relief agencies, found that many other charities reported spending far less than they took in last year; an average of just 42 percent of the money received by 62 relief groups providing tsunami relief has been spent." Walden adds, "With the incendiary combination of huge government contracts, Internet fund-raising and appeals based on mass disasters, the charity business has entered a new age. Americans should continue to help those in dire need, but they should also look around before sending a check or clicking the 'donate' button."

Two Rescued After Plane Crashes Near New York City. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 6, :20, Holt) reported, "A successful rescue today just north of New York City. Police and Coast Guard helicopters pulled two men out of the frigid Hudson River after their single-engine plane went down shortly after the pilot had issued a mayday call. An FAA spokesman says the men were a flight instructor and his student. Both are being treated tonight for hypothermia."

New Rules Could Lead To Increased Minimum Credit Card Payments. NBC Nightly News (1/2, story 7, 2:20, Holt) reported, "Just in time for those post-holiday bills to start piling up in your mailbox, some new rules that banks are now enforcing that will lead to higher minimum credit card payments for everyone. As of now, 13% of credit card holders pay just the minimum payment each month. And if you're among them you may be in for a surprise when you open that next bill." NBC (Shamlian) added, "Too many customers are saying 'charge it' too often. At least, that's the view of banking regulators who are behind the guidelines aimed at getting people to pay more, so they can get out of debt quicker. In the past, some minimums didn't cover even the interest due. The government guidelines say payments should cover at least 1% of principal, plus interest and fees. As of this month, all banks are complying." Nessa Feddis, American Bankers Assn.: "For the consumers in the long term, it means they'll pay less interest and they'll pay the balance off more quickly." Shamlian: "It could be a painful transition. On a balance of $5,000, the payment would jump from $100 to $200 a month. But that larger minimum payment means the debt would be erased in about two and a half years instead of almost seven years."

Questions Raised About Attorney Suing Ex-Client For Former Adversary. The Wall Street Journal (1/3, Davies) reports, "Don King makes a good living off boxers in the ring, and Judd Burstein has done well off Mr. King in the courtroom. … Since 1997, Mr. Burstein, a Manhattan lawyer, has scored a string of legal victories representing fighters in contract disputes against boxing's most famous promoter. In all, Mr. Burstein estimates he has cost Mr. King $25 million and pocketed $3 million to $4 million for himself." The Journal continues, "The acrimony between the two has been so intense over the years that Mr. Burstein once referred to the promoter as a 'cancer' on boxing. Mr. King described Mr. Burstein as an 'insidious insect.' … But now, Mr. Burstein finds himself in Mr. King's corner. The pugnacious attorney has switched sides and is representing the fight promoter in a lawsuit against Christopher Byrd, the International Boxing Federation heavyweight champ, whom Mr. Burstein recently represented in a suit against Mr. King. 'It's good to have him on my payroll now,' Mr. King says of Mr. Burstein." The Journal adds, "There's no rule explicitly prohibiting lawyers from representing someone they once sued. But legal experts say it's rare for an attorney to sue one person on behalf of a client and then sue the former client on behalf of the former adversary. … Complicating matters: The previous lawsuit and the current one involve a dispute over the same contract."

Texas Said To Be At Epicenter Of 2006 Congressional Races. The Dallas Morning News (1/2, Gillman) says Texas "is sure to be the epicenter of this year's congressional races, thanks to some unique factors, especially the trial of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and Democrats' efforts to leverage his ethics problems into a national wave." Unless DeLay "is convicted or the court throws out Texas' current congressional map, voters can expect spirited contests in only three Texas districts, and the campaign that officially begins today– the deadline for candidates to file paperwork to run in the March 7 primaries – probably won't alter the lineup much." DeLay "has his legal woes. Freshman Rep. Henry Cuellar, a Laredo Democrat, won the primary by just 58 votes two years ago after several bitter recounts. And Rep. Chet Edwards of Waco is a Democrat in a heavily Republican district." DeLay's district "is solidly Republican, but analysts say he's vulnerable, noting that he drew just 55 percent of the vote in winning an 11th term in 2004." Cuellar "served as Gov. Rick Perry's secretary of state and volunteered on the Bush presidential campaign, and his rivals say he's a Republican in disguise. … The district is solidly Democratic. The challenge will be to win without a runoff in April." Edwards "won his eighth term with just 51 percent. Two Republicans have spent months vying for the right to take him on in President Bush's hometown district: Iraq war veteran Van Taylor and Tucker Anderson, a former aide to Dallas Rep. Pete Sessions, a Republican."

GOP Said To Be At Disadvantage In 2006 Midterm Elections. The Washington Times (1/3, Lambro, 90K) reports President Bush and the Republicans "face a tougher midterm election landscape in 2006, due largely to the closely divided American electorate and, ironically, the gains the Republicans have made in the past decade." Few analysts "expect the Democrats to regain control of the House or Senate in November, but many think they likely will pick up seats in both chambers and cut into the Republican advantage in governorships. Republicans have a larger number of vulnerable seats to defend, particularly in Democratic-leaning 'blue' states." Political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said, "This year still looks very much like a Democratic year, and the only question is how big a year it will be for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and the Democratic Congressional Committee. … At this point, Democratic gains appear to be inevitable." The Times identifies Senate race opportunities for the Democrats in Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Ohio, and for Republicans in Minnesota, Maryland, and New Jersey. In the House, "most analysts say Democrats could pick up a half dozen seats, well below the 15-seat gain they would need to win majority control." In the state houses, Democrats "appear likely to make modest gains…where Republicans hold a 28 to 22 advantage."

Dionne Says GOP Disunity Could Hurt Showing In Midterms. In his Washington Post column (1/3, A17), E.J. Dionne says, "The 2006 elections will determine whether Rove's brilliantly constructed machine has staying power or falls apart in the face of adversity. And there was adversity in abundance during 2005." But it is "three strikes and you're out: The social-issues right can't help Bush if its support drives away too many moderates. Pro-business economics can't help if it drives away many in the middle class. And the war on terrorism doesn't help if Bush is seen as managing it badly." It is "customary in columns of this sort to say somewhere around now that the Democrats will need to come up with a plan, a message, a program, etc., etc. I'm all for such things. But in 1958, 1966 and 1978, the out party gained ground largely by exploiting the failures of the party in power and exacerbating the contradictions in its coalition. If the Democrats prosper in 2006, it will be because whatever program they come up with achieves those goals."

Schneider "Political Earthquake" Required For Democrats To Retake Congress In 2006. William Schneider said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/2), "Ever hear of the six-year itch? It's a disease presidents often get after their party has held the White House for six years. The symptoms? Big setbacks for the president's party at the polls. It happened to the Democrats in 1938 and 1966. And to the Republicans in 1958, 1974, and 1986. On the average, the president's party lost 44 House seats and seven Senate seats in those elections. Democrats need to gain just 16 seats this year to win control of the House of Representatives, and seven to take over the Senate. Piece of cake? Not exactly. Very few seats change party these days. Most House seats are safe for one party, and only three Republican senators running for re-election are from blue states." It "would take a political earthquake for the Democrats to win control of Congress this year. But you know, earthquakes have been known to happen."

Barone Also Says Democrats Are Unlikely To Retake House. Michael Barone of US News and World Report said on Fox News' Special Report (1/2), "Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to win the House, that doesn't seem very many. But if there are only 25 races that are very seriously contested, a net gain of 15 is pretty hard to achieve. So, [DCCC Chairman Rahm] Emanuel is trying to broaden the field and make some districts seriously contested that people would not have thought were in the past." Barone added that retaking the House is "a long shot for the Democrats."

Barnes Says Democrats Won't Win House Or Senate Control. Fred Barnes was asked on Fox News' Special Report (1/3) for his predictions for 2006. Barnes said, "I think Democrats will win House seats, but not the House. They'll win Senate seats, but not control of the Senate. I expect Arnold to be reelected as governor of California. And President Bush's job approval rating, which has bumped up to 50 percent in a couple of polls already. Will stay around 50 percent or higher for most of 2006." Barnes added, "The emerging star among Democratic presidential candidates is Russ Feingold, a Wisconsin senator. Among Republican presidential candidates is George Allen, the Virginia senator."

Trump Rules Out Gubernatorial Bid, Hints At Run For White House.

The New York Post (1/3, Dicker, 624K) reports that Donald Trump on Monday "flatly ruled out running for governor this year -- but hinted he may go for president in 2008. Trump, in a phone call to The Post…declared, 'I'm not going to run for governor because I'm having too much fun doing what I'm doing now." While Trump "repeatedly ruled out a race for statewide office, he strongly suggested he was interested in entering the national political arena in 2008. Trump, who considered an independent run for president in 2000, pointedly noted that his decision not to run governor this year 'doesn't preclude me from doing something [political] in the future.' He then repeatedly ducked questions on whether he would consider running for the White House, repeating that he's too busy for electoral politics. But a political figure close to Trump told The Post, 'Donald is definitely interested in running for president in 2008, possibly as an independent candidate.'"

NYC Transit Strike Seen As Avoidable.

In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/2) Meyer S. Frucher and Joseph M. Bress, former directors of the Governor's Office of Employee Relations for New York State, write, "New York City's transit workers are back on the job. … The city, meanwhile, lost an estimated $1 billion during a frigid holiday shopping week that saw seven million commuters stranded. There's a better way than this to get a contract, and we can institute it simply by building on existing New York state law." The authors note that Gov. Mario Cuomo "signed an amendment to the Taylor Law that specifically addressed transit negotiations, offering a binding arbitration procedure to break deadlocked talks."

Bolton Initiatives Would Give Security Council Members Enhanced Power.

he Washington Post (1/2, A7, Lynch) reports John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, "said he will start the new year by reinvigorating stalled efforts to restructure management of the world body, beginning with a controversial push to seek assurances that the Security Council's five major powers will be guaranteed posts on a new Human Rights Council. Bolton said in an interview that the Bush administration wants to ensure that the United States is never again denied membership in the United Nations' principal human rights body, as it was in 2001, when Austria, France and Sweden defeated a U.S. bid for membership in the Geneva-based Human Rights Commission. … The proposal is part of a broader drive by Bolton to place the five permanent Security Council members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- at the center of U.N. decision making."

Musharraf Backs Off Pledge To Take On Madrassas.

The New York Times (1/2, Masood) reports, "As the incendiary training at some of Pakistan's seminaries drew renewed focus in the weeks after the July 7 bombings in London, President Pervez Musharraf promised to bring the schools into the mainstream and expel their foreign students by the end of the year." But" his tough pledge has fizzled." Last week, "the government backed away from its deadline and said it would not use force to deport the students." The schools then "said they would resist any effort to round up the students, and on Sunday, a coalition representing the seminaries called the government's plan 'inhuman, immoral and totally illegal,' The Associated Press reported." The schools, called madrasas, "were once the Islamic equivalent of Sunday school. … Of the four suicide bombers in the London attacks, at least one had spent time at a madrasa here with connections to militant groups."

The Washington Times (1/2, Ansari) adds "Western intelligence agencies suspect that madrassas served as rendezvous points between senior al Qaeda operatives and Tanweer, Khan and other British recruits." Musharraf, however, "relented on Thursday after clerics said they would rather be incarcerated than comply with orders to expel foreigners or give their names to the authorities."

UN Asks To Interview Assad In Hariri Probe. The Financial Times (1/3, Biedermann) reports, "United Nations investigators on Monday said they want to interview Bashar al-Assad, Syria's president, and Farouq al-Shara'a, his foreign minister, in connection with the murder of Rafiq al-Hariri, Lebanon's former prime minister." The announcement "came days after Abdel-Halim Khaddam, Syria's former vice-president, indicated that Mr Assad might have been personally involved in the run-up to the murder." The UN probe "was awaiting answers from Syria after requesting to speak to Mr Assad, Mr Shara'a and others, a spokesperson for the commission said."

The New York Times (1/3, Fattah, 1.19M) says "the request compounds pressure on the Syrian government just days after a stunning public attack on the president by his former vice president raised new questions about whether the government had been complicit in the assassination." A spokesman for the United Nations investigation told The Associated Press "the commission had sent a request to interview Mr. Assad and Mr. Sharaa, among others," but "would not specify when the request was made. It was not immediately clear whether the request had any connection to the allegation by former Vice President Abdul-Halim Khaddam on Friday that Mr. Assad threatened Mr. Hariri's life months before the assassination."

Former Syrian Vice President Breaks With Assad On Hariri Probe. The Financial Times (1/2, Biedermann) reports, "Syria's former vice-president Abdel-Halim Khaddam said on Friday that he has 'full confidence' in the UN-investigation into the assassination. The UN-team, until recently led by the German prosecutor Detlev Mehlis, has implicated senior Lebanese and Syrian officials." Speaking on the Arab satellite television station al-Arabiya from Paris, "where he has been staying for the last couple of months," Khaddam "announced a break with his country's leadership. He blamed President Bashar al-Assad for a deterioration in Syria's international position. And he said that if Syria had indeed killed Mr Hariri, it could not have happened without the knowledge of Mr. Assad."

Protestors Demand To Know Fate Of Missing Lebanese. The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Shadid) reports, "In the heart of downtown Beirut…women every day…protest demanding to know the fate of their children. Many believe they languish in jails in neighboring Syria. Others are not sure. Behind them, their children's faces stare from pictures tacked to billboards, blank faces with generation-old haircuts, the dates of their disappearances reading like a war memorial yet to be built. The protest…serves as a stark reminder, organizers say, that Lebanese society has yet to confront, much less resolve, the legacy of the most cataclysmic event in its modern history -- the 1975-90 civil war. Fifteen years later, that conflict is still shrouded in silence. Under a 1991 amnesty law, all but a handful of killings were placed beyond prosecution." The Post adds, "The protest's longevity reflects the changes unleashed by the departure of Syrian troops last spring after a 29-year presence. It is a sign of new transparency in public discourse as Lebanon."

Abbas May Delay Palestinian Elections. The New York Times (1/3, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "The Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, on Monday raised for the first time the possibility of delaying legislative elections this month, saying the vote would be impossible if Israel did not allow residents of East Jerusalem to participate." Said Abbas, "We are all in agreement that Jerusalem has to be included in the election. … And if it is not included, all the factions agree that there will be no elections." But "a Hamas official in the Gaza Strip, Mahmoud Zahar, told reporters there had been no agreement to accept another delay." Hamas "agreed last summer to postpone the elections, originally scheduled for July, but has insisted on the vote's going ahead this month."

British Hostages Freed In Gaza. The Financial Times (1/2, Davi) reports, "Three Britons held hostage in the Gaza Strip were released by their kidnappers on Friday night, according to unconfirmed reports from Palestine. Human rights worker Kate Burton, 24, and her parents had been freed, Palestinian mediator Kamal Sharafi said. However, the Foreign Office in London was unable to confirm the reports." The Times adds, "Concern grew through the day over the fate of the Britons, after the Palestinian police chief earlier said there had been no demands or contacts from the unidentified hostage-takers."

Palestinian Security Officers Free Italian Hostage. The New York Times/AP (1/2) reports, "Palestinian security officers stormed a building on Sunday where an Italian hostage was being held, freeing the captive in a shootout with his kidnappers." It was "a rare show of force in a wave of kidnappings, shootouts and other violence in the Gaza Strip that has embarrassed the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, threatening to undermine his Fatah Party in Jan. 25 legislative elections and to strengthen Hamas, the Islamic militant group." The hostage, Alessandro Bernardini, an aide in the European Parliament, "was abducted early Sunday in Khan Younis." The Washington Times (1/2, Barzak) runs the same AP story.

Italian Tourists Taken Hostage In Yemen. The Washington Times (1/2, Mounassa) reports, "Yemeni tribesmen took five Italian tourists hostage yesterday -- one day after freeing a German family of five that included a former ambassador to Washington. Of the five Italians, three women refused to be released later in the day, insisting on returning to their male companions who remained in captivity, local officials said." It was "the fourth abduction of foreigners in the country in three months."

Ahmadinejad Reportedly Causing Unease Inside Iran. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Siamdoust) reports, "On the surface, little seems to have changed in the Iranian capital since President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad took office in August. … But underneath the veneer of normality, Iranians are watching as their controversial president settles into office — and their country hardens under his fundamentalist leadership." The Times goes on to report, "To both insiders and outsiders, the political face of Iran seems to have drastically changed. … Ahmadinejad, draped in a Palestinian kaffiyeh, the scarf that he has appropriated to signal his struggle against perceived injustice, has stirred international ire with virulent anti-Israel rhetoric. Meanwhile, his habit of immersing politics in sacred Islamic tradition has chafed critics within Iran." According to the Times, "But even in Iran's mostly conservative parliament, the hard-line president has found himself unable to get traction. In a first for the Islamic Republic, lawmakers turned down four of the ministers Ahmadinejad asked them to approve. It took him three months and four candidates to seat an oil minister. Some reformist legislators even agitated for hearings on the president's 'lack of political competence.'"

Krauthammer Predicts Israel Will Attack Iran This Year. Syndicated columnist Charles Krauthammer, on Fox News Sunday (1/1, Wallace), predicted, "Israel will launch a military strike on Iranian nuclear facilities. There are rumors today in German newspapers that the U.S. and NATO are talking about this. I don't imagine the U.S. or NATO will do this." Israel "will feel that the world isn't acting, and it's going to act on its own."

Sharon To Undergo Heart Surgery. The AP (1/2, Federman) reports, "Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will undergo a heart procedure Thursday to close a small hole that apparently led to his recent stroke, his office announced Sunday." Doctors "said last week that the procedure, known as a cardiac catheterization, would virtually eliminate the risk of Sharon suffering a similar stroke."

In Abrupt Reversal, Russia Restores Most Gas To Ukraine Pipeline. The Washington Post (1/3, A12, Finn, 744K) reports, "Russia retreated abruptly Monday from its confrontation with Ukraine over natural gas prices, after an uproar in West European capitals over dead-of-winter cuts in gas supplies threatened to undermine Russia's ambition to expand its highly profitable role as a strategic energy partner of the European Union." The "state-controlled Russian energy giant Gazprom" said it "would almost completely restore reductions it made Sunday in the gas it pumps into Ukrainian pipelines that connect to the rest of the continent." The New York Times (1/3, Kramer, 1.19M) adds Gazprom "officials…presented the decision not as a reversal but as a response to Ukraine's 'theft' of natural gas." But "it became clear almost immediately that the driving force in Russia's decision was the sharp criticism across Europe, including countries like Germany that are usually reliable allies."

The Financial Times (1/3, Correspondents) says "European countries on Monday suffered large cuts to their gas supplies as a bitter stand-off between Russia and Ukraine over gas prices intensified. Supplies of Russian gas to Italy fell by 25 per cent, according to Eni, the country's biggest oil and gas supplier. Deliveries of Russian gas to France dropped up to 30 per cent, Gaz de France said. Many central and eastern European countries, which depend heavily on gas from Russia, reported even larger declines."

The Wall Street Journal (1/3, White, Cummins, 2.11M) notes "the sudden crisis highlighted concerns about Europe's dependence on Russia, which supplies a quarter of the continent's gas, at a time of growing fears that the Kremlin is using energy as a political weapon." The Christian Science Monitor (1/3, Weir, 61K) runs a similar report in which it says that "with 80 percent of Russian gas exports flowing through Ukraine, wintry Europe could be hard hit." The Washington Times/Reuters (1/3, Clothier) runs a similar story.

In an analysis piece, the New York Times (1/3, Chivers, 1.19M) says for "President Vladimir V. Putin and Russia, 2006 was supposed to be a banner year. Instead, it has begun badly, and with problems of the Kremlin's own making. The Kremlin, which labored in 2005 to distance itself from the ill will that accompanied its destruction of the Yukos oil company and the bungled handling of the rigged Ukrainian presidential election in 2004, has begun the new year with a display of politics and bullying, followed by partial retreat, that is raising fresh questions about its reliability as an international energy partner."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/2, Romans) said "critics of President Putin say he's using Soviet-style tactics to bully Russia's neighbors." In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.11M) says, "Putin certainly has a flair for timing. The Russian President is assuming the chairmanship of the G-8 democratic nations in the same week that he's been attempting some Soviet-style energy extortion against Ukraine. … The Kremlin's real goal here isn't money so much as political influence over its democratic, free-thinking and formerly subservient Slavic neighbor. A year ago Ukraine's Viktor Yushchenko used his 'Orange Revolution' to defeat the Kremlin's handpicked presidential candidate and turn toward the West. The energy squeeze is Mr. Putin's attempt at revenge, notably coming less than three months before Ukraine's parliamentary elections."

David Satter, who is "affiliated" with the Hoover Institution, the Hudson Institute and Johns Hopkins, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/3, 2.11M), "With Sunday's accession of Vladimir Putin to the presidency of the G-8, post-Soviet Russia has achieved a new level of recognition and prestige as a democratic state. The recognition is undeserved. Instead of being democratic or even becoming democratic, Russia is daily sinking deeper into authoritarianism and lawlessness. … The Putin regime cannot ignore the views of G-8 colleagues. This is why the West needs to use all its influence to counteract Russia's self-destructive behavior."

Winter Weather Cuts Aid To Earthquake Refugees In Pakistan. The Washington Post/AP (1/3, A14, Khan) reports Pakistani earthquake survivors "struggled Monday to keep their children warm as the bitter winter hit Kashmir, grounding helicopter aid flights and blocking roads for the second straight day. … The Pakistan meteorological office forecast continued rain and snow for the next two days and low temperatures of 21 degrees Fahrenheit in the plains and 7 degrees Fahrenheit above 5,000 feet. For the second straight day, helicopters from the United Nations, foreign militaries and Pakistan's army were not able to deliver winterized tents, clothes, food and other provisions in the quake zone because of poor visibility, said Maj. Farooq Nasir, an army spokesman. They were trying to move supplies by truck, but mudslides and snow have also made some roads impassable, he said."

New Russian Law On NGOs Seen As Stifling Democracy. NBC Nightly News (1/1, story 10, 2:20, Mendenall) reported, "This week, Russia passed a new law that tightens the Kremlin's control over nearly a half million non-governmental organizations or NGOs, many of which have been critical of the president. Like Human Rights Watch, which says the Kremlin, irked by reports of human rights abuses, could use the new law to close it down. … The law also makes it harder to operate for other prominent US organizations promoting democracy, which Putin has accused of spying and supporting political revolutions on Russia's borders in Ukraine and Georgia, something the Kremlin doesn't want to spread much to Russia's borders."

Last Alternative Russian News Outlet Beset By Turmoil. The New York Times (1/2, Kishkovsky) reports, "Recent turmoil in the news department of REN-TV, Russia's last nationwide television network with independent news programming, has caused concern among media analysts and free-speech advocates in the country. … REN-TV has been known for critical news reporting that offered an alternative to state channels' uniformly positive coverage of President Vladimir V. Putin, media analysts said. Its signal reaches more than 113 million people, although its audience share hovers around 5 percent."

Taiwan's President Calls For Increased Defense Spending. The New York Times (1/2, Bradsher) reports Taiwanese President Chen Shui-bian "called Sunday for increased arms purchases and warned against greater economic ties to mainland China, in a televised speech that silenced months of speculation that he might soon seek to improve relations across the Taiwan Strait." The Times notes, "The speech was Mr. Chen's first major policy address since his Democratic Progressive Party fared badly in islandwide municipal elections on Dec. 3. … The Nationalist Party, which favors closer relations with Beijing, did much better in those elections."

Pakistan Negotiating Purchase Of Chinese Nuclear Reactors. The Financial Times (1/3, Bokhari) reports, "Pakistan is negotiating the purchase of between six and eight nuclear power reactors from China during the next decade in the most ambitious expansion yet of the country's nuclear energy capability. … The plants are expected to be completed by 2025, with construction starting by 2015, a senior Pakistani official told the Financial Times."

Sudanese Refugees In Egypt Vulnerable Following Deadly Riot. The New York Times (1/3, Slackman, 1.19M) reports, "Hundreds of Sudanese have been released from police detention camps onto the streets of this city with no money, no place to live - and in many cases, no shoes - three days after the riot police attacked a squatter camp set up as a protest to press the United Nations to relocate the migrants to another country. … The attack officially left 26 dead, including seven small children, and many others injured." The Times adds, "So many were left dead, and the international condemnation was so embarrassing, that President Hosni Mubarak has told the attorney general to investigate. But the government's official position is that the Sudanese were to blame. Magdy Rady, the government's chief spokesman, said the Sudanese injured their own people by trampling those who collapsed, and he said they also attacked the police, injuring more than 70 officers." The Times notes, "The Sudanese were unarmed and many were barefoot. The police were wearing riot gear, including helmets with face shields, and wielded truncheons."

Korean Retailers Exert Power In China. The New York Times (1/2, Onishi) reports, "At Korea City, on the top floor of the Xidan Shopping Center, a warren of tiny shops sell hip-hop clothes, movies, music, cosmetics and other offerings in the South Korean style. To young Chinese shoppers, it seemed not to matter that some of the products, like New York Yankees caps or Japan's Astro Boy dolls, clearly have little to do with South Korea. Or that most items originated, in fact, in Chinese factories. … From clothes to hairstyle, music to television dramas, South Korea has been defining the tastes of many Chinese and other Asians for the past half decade."

Morales Election Seen As Evidence Of Castro's Growing Influence. The Washington Post's Jackson Diehl (1/2) writes, "Here's a sad but safe new year's prediction: U.S. relations with Latin America, which plunged to their lowest point in decades in 2005, will get still worse in 2006." Bolivia's Evo Morales "will probably take instruction from Chavez, Kirchner and Fidel Castro -- who at age 79 must believe he is finally seeing the emergence of the totalitarian bloc he and Che Guevara tried and failed to create in the 1960s."

Bolivia's Morales Says He Will Be America's "Worst Nightmare." Time (1/9, Padgett) reports that Bolivia's President-elect Evo Morales "won a stunning landslide in last month's election in no small part because he pledged to legalize far more cultivation of coca, which Aymara Indians like him have chewed for centuries for traditional medicinal purposes and which the U.S. has tried for decades to eradicate in Bolivia because drug traffickers use it to make cocaine. Morales impishly claims that coca-leaf extract is part of the formula of the classic American beverage Coca-Cola (a legend the company has consistently declined to comment on) and adds, 'It's not right that exporting coca is legal for Coca-Cola but not for the rest of us!' The Yankee baiting is part of Morales' stated intention to be the U.S.'s 'worst nightmare.'" The Bush Administration "has reason to be spooked. Morales' win has helped build momentum for a resurgence of leftist and often anti-U.S. candidates around Latin America. At least nine presidential races are slated for the region this year, and leftists could win at least five -- including those in the two most populous countries, Brazil and Mexico, as well as in coca producers like Peru and Ecuador. Leftists have toppled conservative governments in Uruguay and Honduras, and socialist Michelle Bachelet is favored to win Chile's presidential runoff on Jan. 15. To punctuate the situation, the radical left-wing President of oil-rich Venezuela, Hugo Chavez…is all but certain to be re-elected at year's end."

Ivory Coast Military Installation Attacked. The New York Times/AP (1/3) reports, "Gunmen attacked the main military barracks in Abidjan, Ivory Coast's largest city, on Monday, with gunfire and heavy explosions that shook the surrounding area, authorities said. The armed forces chief, Gen. Phillipe Mangou, said that the attack occurred around 6 a.m. at Camp Akuedo, and that military forces had repulsed it. There was no word on who carried out the assault."

Subsistence Farming Said To Encourage Child Labor In Ethiopia. The Washington Post (1/3, A1, Wax, 744K) reports Ethiopia "has one of the highest rates of child labor in the world," according to the UN. Nine million children "are employed, 90 percent of them in the agricultural sector. … Factors pushing children into the fields include ancient farming techniques, overworked land, the AIDS epidemic and a booming population of 74 million." The Post notes, "It is also an impoverished rural society where 85 percent of the population farms two-acre plots of land, too small to turn a profit, and nearly every plot is worked to exhaustion. Studies have shown that cultures dependent on subsistence farming also have the highest rates of child labor."

Former Political Prisoners Detail Burmese Junta's Abuses. The Washington Post (1/3, A12, Sipress, Nakashima, 744K) reports on Burmese political prisoners Min Ko Naing and Myo Myint both of whom "passed more than a third of his life in prison when both were released in 2004. Min Ko Naing, 44, remained in Burma, under scrutiny of the secret police. Myo Myint, 43, fled to a small town just over the border in Thailand. Their testimony, provided in separate interviews last month, highlights the psychological and physical abuse endured by political prisoners in Burma, which is ruled by a military junta. More than 1,100 people remain in jail for seeking democratic reform, according to Amnesty International. The two men's accounts reveal how determined they remain to press for social change despite torture inside prison walls and only the remote prospect for a shift in power outside them. Myo Myint now works with a group advocating prisoner rights. Min Ko Naing is urging the government and its opponents to set aside political differences to ease the country's deepening poverty and treat spreading disease."

Strike Follows Purge At Beijing Newspaper. The Christian Science Monitor (1/3, Marquand, 61K) reports, "An emotional strike by 100 journalists at [Beijing's] most popular and lively newspaper follows a 16-month campaign to quash a broad range of 'unapproved' public speech in areas verging on politics or society. … In the case of Beijing News, whose progressive editor Yang Bin was replaced without warning last week, Chinese authorities dealt a seemingly fatal blow to a publishing project that two years ago gave the press some freedom to experiment. Last June the paper reported on violent land disputes in Hebei province, and last month, in what may have precipitated the purge, it published tame, but independent, stories on the official coverup of a massive benzene chemical spill in the Songhua River. Last Thursday, in a gritty south Beijing neighborhood, nearly 100 reporters left the news offices. They began a short-lived strike - a rarity in China - and signed a petition asking for Mr. Yang's reinstatement."

Kirchner Seen As Moving Argentina To Left. The New York Times (1/3, Rohter, 1.19M) reports, "Just four years ago, Argentina's economy was prostrate and its politics in chaos, after a financial crisis resulted in bank deposits being frozen, the government defaulting on more than $100 billion in debt and five presidents holding office in two weeks. But on Tuesday, the country is expected to pay off the last of its debt to the International Monetary Fund and simply walk away from further negotiations with the group. … The $9.8 billion payment is an important symbolic milestone and just one of several recent signs that President Néstor Kirchner appears to be concentrating more power in his own hands and steering his government to the left. Since a midterm election victory in October, Mr. Kirchner has also moved to establish an alliance with Venezuela's populist leader, Hugo Chávez, and, as a traditional Peronist, to extend the hand of the state deeper into the economy, the judiciary and the news media."

LATimes Says North Korea Worsening Famine With Secrecy. The Los Angeles Times (1/2) editorializes, "Many third world countries would have been driven to the wall by back-to-back years of floods and drought. But North Korea, which suffered nature's disasters a decade ago, makes its problems worse with its leader's paranoid, Stalinist determination to isolate the nation from outsiders. For 10 years, the United Nations' World Food Program has done what it could to limit the number of deaths by famine, providing millions of tons of food worth more than $1 billion. When Pyongyang sometimes refused to let U.N. officials visit a province, the organization cut off the food. Its policy of 'no access, no food aid' is necessary to ensure that dictators such as North Korea's Kim Jong Il don't take the milk and grain and give it to their soldiers and trusted civil servants, rather than those who need it most. But now North Korea has forbidden private charities and the U.N. agency to deliver food. Pyongyang claims an improved harvest last year, and help from China and South Korea, will provide enough to feed its 23 million people. But outside experts are doubtful. A more likely reason for stopping food aid is to keep foreigners away and increase the already tight control by Kim's regime."

NYTimes Says Administration "Name-Calling" Against Korea Is Counter Productive. The New York Times (1/3, 1.19M) editorializes, "Calling North Korea nasty names is easy and satisfying. Negotiating is hard and frustrating. So for four years, the Bush administration put more creative energy into name-calling than into serious talks. The main result was that the North moved four years further along toward being able to threaten its neighbors with nuclear weapons. … The North can afford to take its time over resolving the nuclear issue, wasting diplomatic energy on disruptive and bullying tactics. The United States cannot afford that luxury. It makes little sense for the Bush administration to return to name-calling or to rule out high-level talks on the Patriot Act sanctions." According to the Post, "The window that briefly opened for diplomacy after John Bolton moved from nonproliferation issues to the United Nations is once again in danger of being slammed shut, reportedly at the urging of Vice President Dick Cheney and Mr. Bolton's successor in the nonproliferation job, Robert Joseph."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter To Question Gonzales On NSA Surveillance. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/26, McGough) reports, "If Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales thought he might be spared tough questioning from Republican senators when he testifies about the warrantless wiretapping of Americans thought to be in contact with foreign terrorists, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., yesterday disabused him of that notion." The Post-Gazette continues, "In a letter sent to the attorney general and shared with the press, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee propounded a series of questions that in a courtroom setting might be called 'leading' and requested that Mr. Gonzales answer them in his opening statement before the committee on Feb. 6. … The combative nature of the letter wasn't altered by the fact that the printed salutation to 'Attorney General Gonzales' was replaced by a hand-written 'Al.'" The Post-Gazette adds, "The letter honed in on the Bush administration's assertion-ridiculed by critics -- that Congress empowered the president to engage in electronic surveillance of Americans without a court order when it passed a resolution after the Sept. 11 2001, attacks authorizing him to 'use all necessary and appropriate force' against terrorists. … Mr. Specter asked: 'In interpreting whether Congress intended to amend the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act by the Sept. 14, 2001, resolution, would it be relevant on the issue of congressional intent that the administration did not specifically ask for an expansion for executive powers under FISA?' … Mr. Specter further asked: 'If Congress had intended to amend FISA by the resolution, wouldn't Congress have specifically acted to [do so] as Congress did in passing the Patriot Act giving the executive expanded powers and greater flexibility in using "roving" wiretaps?' … Mr. Specter also made it clear he would press Mr. Gonzales about the administration's other legal rationale for the surveillance -- that it flowed from Mr. Bush's constitutional authority as commander-in-chief."

The National Journal's Technology Daily (1/25, Stirland) reports, "Pressure mounted on the Bush administration Wednesday to provide lawmakers with answers on domestic spying activities. … Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., released a three-page letter with detailed questions to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on the president's decision in 2002 to secretly authorize domestic wiretaps without warrants. … The letter includes many of the questions that constitutional scholars have been posing about the president's order, and several questions could put Gonzales in an awkward position." Technology Daily adds, "At the same time, Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee demanded that Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., hold a business meeting so the committee can vote to investigate several aspects of the administration's domestic spying. … Under committee rules, Roberts is obligated to hold a meeting if at least five members formally ask for one. All seven Democrats on the panel signed the request to Roberts." Technology Daily notes, "A majority vote is needed to move ahead with the investigation. Two Republicans on the committee, Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine, have asked Roberts for a hearing on the matter. Roberts has said nothing publicly about holding a hearing. … Also on Wednesday, a group of Democrats, including Sens. Richard Durbin of Illinois and Charles Schumer of New York, sent a letter to President Bush asking him for specific changes in the law that he believes are necessary to permit effective surveillance of suspected terrorists."

Gonzales Warned To Expect Tough Questions From Senate Committee. The CBS Evening News (1/25, lead story, 4:00, Roberts) noted, "NSA officials aren't likely to be called in the first round of hearings, but in a letter, the Attorney General was warned by the Judiciary Committee chair, he's in for a full day of grilling on February 6. Among the questions: Why did the President bypass the Federal court that covers wire taps, and how does he justify not more fully informing Congress? The President insists he has informed Congress but complains existing laws aren't nimble enough to cover the explosion of technology through which terrorists communicate."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, lead story, 3:00, Mitchell) also noted, "The White House says when Congress authorized the war on terror after 9/11, it gave the President the power to spy without court orders. But even some powerful Republicans are challenging the program's legality. Today, Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter sent this 'dear Al' letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, listing 15 tough questions he will be asked at a hearing two weeks from now, including whether the spying was an illegal expansion of presidential power." Sen. Specter: "There was no thought when we passed the authorization for the use of force that it had implications for electronic surveillance."

The Baltimore Sun (1/26, Davis, 296K) focuses on Specter's letter, reporting that even as Bush spoke, "questions mounted about the administration's legal justifications for the program. A key Republican senator took issue with Bush's defense of the operation, which was secretly authorized by the president after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and targets some communications inside the United States. Also, new reports surfaced suggesting that the administration had rejected an earlier proposal in Congress that would have made it easier to obtain court approval for domestic wiretapping."

Administration Dismissed 2002 Proposal To Change Surveillance Warrant Standard. The Washington Post (1/26, A4, Eggen) reports, "The Bush administration rejected a 2002 Senate proposal that would have made it easier for FBI agents to obtain surveillance warrants in terrorism cases, concluding that the system was working well and that it would likely be unconstitutional to lower the legal standard." The Post continues, "The proposed legislation by Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) would have allowed the FBI to obtain surveillance warrants for non-U.S. citizens if they had a 'reasonable suspicion' they were connected to terrorism -- a lower standard than the 'probable cause' requirement in the statute that governs the warrants. … The administration has contended that it launched a secret program of warrantless domestic eavesdropping by the National Security Agency in part because of the time it takes to obtain such secret warrants from federal judges under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA)." The Post adds, "The wiretapping program, ordered by President Bush in 2001, is used when intelligence agents have a 'reasonable basis to believe' that a target is tied to al Qaeda or related groups, according to recent statements by administration officials. It can be used on U.S. citizens as well as foreign nationals, without court oversight. … Democrats and national security law experts who oppose the NSA program say the Justice Department's opposition to the DeWine legislation seriously undermines arguments by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and others, who have said the NSA spying is constitutional and that surveillance warrants are often too cumbersome to obtain. … 'It's entirely inconsistent with their current position,' said Philip B. Heymann, a deputy attorney general in the Clinton administration who teaches law at Harvard University. 'The only reason to do what they've been doing is because they wanted a lower standard than 'probable cause.' A member of Congress offered that to them, but they turned it down.'" The Post notes, "But Justice Department officials disagreed, saying the standard the department opposed in 2002 is legally different from the one used by the NSA. … 'The FISA "probable cause" standard is essentially the same as the "reasonable basis" standard used in the terrorist surveillance program,' said spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos, using the term for the NSA program the White House has adopted. 'The "reasonable suspicion" standard, which is lower than both of these, is not used in either program.' … Justice officials also said that even under a different standard, the process of obtaining a surveillance warrant would take longer than is necessary for the NSA to efficiently track suspected terrorists."

Under the headline "Words, Deeds On Spying Differed," The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Savage, 958K) also reports on the 2002 bill, noting that the administration's "public position then was the mirror opposite of its rationale today in defending its warrantless domestic spying program, which has come under attack as a violation of civil liberties. … A Justice Department spokesman confirmed Wednesday the administration had opposed changing the law in 2002 in part because it did not want to publicly debate the issue. 'There was a conscious choice not to have a public discussion about it. It could have exposed the program. This was a military defense intelligence program,' said the spokesman." The Times notes Sen. Patrick Leahy "accused the administration of having tried 'to paper over the legality of a secret spying program. If they really believed the current law is too burdensome, the Bush administration should have asked Congress to change it, but they did not. Instead a top lawyer in the Bush administration did just the opposite.'"

Knight Ridder (1/26, Landay) reports, "James A. Baker, the Justice Department's top lawyer on intelligence policy, made the statement before the Senate Intelligence Committee on July 31, 2002. He was laying out the department's position on an amendment to FISA proposed by Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio. The committee rejected DeWine's proposal, leaving FISA intact. … So while Congress chose not to weaken FISA in 2002, today Bush and his allies contend that Congress implicitly gave Bush the authority to evade FISA's requirements when it authorized him to use force in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks three days after they occurred - a contention that many lawmakers reject." Knight Ridder adds, "Glenn Greenwald, an Internet blogger, first connected the earlier Justice Department statement to the Bush administration's current arguments on his Web log, called Unclaimed Territory. … Baker's 2002 statement drew new attention Wednesday as the White House continued its campaign to justify eavesdropping on Americans who are suspected of being in contact with al-Qaida or other terrorist groups, despite possible violation of FISA." Knight Ridder notes, "Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said Wednesday that Gonzales stands by the administration's current view that FISA warrant requirements impose 'additional layers of review' that sacrifice 'critical speed and agility.'"

Administration Launches Campaign To Frame Surveillance Debate. The Dallas Morning News (1/26, Mittelstadt) reports, "The Bush administration raced this week to defend its warrantless domestic spying program, with several aims in mind, experts say: Win over a conflicted public; force Democrats into an arena that plays to GOP strength; and head off talk of impeachment and special prosecutors." The News continues, "With polls showing the public sharply divided over the controversial surveillance program, the White House and its critics – Democrats, small-government conservatives and civil libertarians – are engaged in a high-stakes contest to frame the debate. … 'If it's defined primarily as "government abuse, the president out of control, the White House running roughshod over basic constitutional rights," it would be a major problem for an extended period of time for the president – both on Capitol Hill but also with the voters,' said political analyst Stuart Rothenberg. … 'If the issue is defined more as "protecting national security, keeping people safe, stopping terrorism," then what the Democrats immediately saw might be a good issue for them could actually be turned around for the president and the Republican Party.' … Though the court of public opinion is key, some suggest that the political system or the courts will be the ultimate arbiter of the program's legality – and the far weightier question of whether Mr. Bush is claiming executive powers outside the bounds of the Constitution or the law." The News notes, "Mr. Specter has summoned Attorney General Al Gonzales for a Feb. 6 hearing and is under pressure from Democrats to invite former Deputy Attorney General James Comey and other administration officials who reportedly raised concerns about the legality of the domestic surveillance."

Debate Over Legality Of NSA Surveillance Narrows. Fox News (1/26) reports, "After three days of a Bush administration offensive and weeks of debate and accusations, some legal experts are coming to terms on what is illegal and what is not in the National Security Agency electronic surveillance program. … 'When the president goes around and speaks ... and says we're monitoring calls from overseas from Al Qaeda to the United States, the NSA can go ahead and do that now under the law,' Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said after the Senate Judiciary confirmation hearing of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito." Fox News continues, "But Kennedy said independent organizations, like the Congressional Research Service, have studied the legality of the NSA program and say the president has gone beyond what the rules allow. Bush, however, says the eavesdropping program is legal and doesn't overstep the boundaries allowed to him by the Constitution and congressional resolution. … According to legal experts, hypothetically, if the NSA had intercepted calls from alleged terrorists such as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed or Ramzi Binalshibb, both now in custody, while they were abroad, then U.S. intelligence agents could listen to the calls without a warrant. That goes for phone calls with people on the other end of the line who happen to be in United States. … Only when the person inside the United States becomes the target of surveillance is a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance court required. … Other experts agree that a warrant is not needed until the U.S.-based individual becomes a suspect. … But others argue that the law says domestic communications monitoring rules apply even when only one end of the call is on U.S. soil. They say that's why Bush signed a highly classified directive approving the program and has to re-approve it every 45 days."

Bush Continues Defense Of NSA Domestic Surveillance Program. President Bush defended the NSA domestic surveillance program yesterday. Media reports describe the President continuing to wage a "campaign" style offensive against its critics, with CBS saying Bush used "his strongest words yet to defend the program" and ABC saying he "made the most dramatic link yet between the September 11th attacks and his controversial domestic spying program." ABC, like most print sources this morning, was referring to the President's reference to the latest Osama Bin Laden tape.

Bush said the tape was a reminder of how serious the terror threat is. Reuters (1/26) reports Bush said "he took…bin Laden's threats of another attack seriously and invoked the al Qaeda leader's recent audiotape to defend a domestic eavesdropping program." The AP (1/26, Pickler) also focuses on Bush's Bin Laden argument, as does the Washington Times (1/26, Sammon, 90K), which notes the

President "the unusual step of imploring Americans to heed the warnings of…bin Laden." Likewise, USA Today (1/26, 2.31M) headlines its brief report "Take Bin Laden Threat Seriously, Bush Warns."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, lead story, 4:00, Schieffer) reported, "The President has clearly decided the best defense is a good offense. Democrats and even some within his own party have raised strong criticism of his decision to eavesdrop without warrants on some Americans, but today the President used his strongest words yet to defend the program." CBS (Roberts) added, "Bush privately told NSA staff today they have his 100% support in the eavesdropping program." His "visit was accompanied by a new White House PR line, casting the program as a vital military operation, one that can't wait for courts to consider warrants." Scott McClellan: "Do you expect our commanders in a time of war to go to a court while they're trying to survey the enemy? I don't think so."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 5, 0:42, Vargas) reported, "Bush made the most dramatic link yet between the September 11th attacks and his controversial domestic spying program." At the NSA he "said had the eavesdropping program been in effect prior to 9/11, the hijackers might have been stopped." Bush: "We know that two of the hijackers who struck the Pentagon were inside the United States, communicating with al Qaeda operatives overseas. But we didn't realize they were here plotting the attack until it was too late. We must be able to connect the dots, before the terrorists strike, so we can stop new attacks."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, lead story, 3:00, Williams) reported, "When it was first disclosed, the critics pounced upon learning that American intelligence personnel were eavesdropping on Americans who were placing suspect phone calls outside of the country. And while many Americans still say it's illegal domestic spying, the president insists on calling it a terrorist surveillance program and insists it's necessary and within his legal powers. And today, he took his argument right to the source." NBC (Mitchell) added, "Inside the NSA, he brushed off critics who say it is illegal." President Bush: "All I would ask them to do is listen to the words of Osama bin Laden and take him seriously. When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it."

Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Cameron) said Bush "reiterated that the program has helped prevent attacks and saved lives and that the US must detect and track all al Qaeda communications to secure the homeland."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Bash) added, "One of the things that even the President's opponents say that they give him credit for is knowing how to run a campaign, and that's exactly what the White House has been doing in trying to defend the controversial spying program this whole week. They are also really pulling out all the stops. One of the things that they did…was have the President himself" go to the NSA "to not only thank the people who are conducting his program, but also to, of course, make the arguments that we've heard time and time again about why it is legal and necessary. But another thing that sort of fell into the President's lap, if you will, was, of course, the tape from Osama bin Laden. And so the White House, for the first time today, had the President use that in making the argument for this program." CNN added that Bush "spent a lot of time on making the argument at the NSA today that it is just perhaps people who are talking to members of al Qaeda who could be listened in on, that it is not just people in the United States who are being surveilled, if you will. That is an argument that we've heard many times but certainly more so today."

The Washington Post (1/26, A4, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "Bush, whose aides said they consider the issue a clear political winner, is resurrecting tactics from the last campaign to make the NSA spying program a referendum on which party will keep the United States safe from terrorists." He "has dispatched top White House officials almost daily to defend the program and has sent a message to party activists that he considers fighting terrorism with tools such as NSA eavesdropping the defining issue of the November elections." The Post adds, "Exhibiting an obsession to detail not seen in the Social Security rollout a year ago, the White House is even waging a war on the semantics being used in the debate, lashing out at reporters who call the program 'domestic' spying, because the monitored calls involve a person overseas." It is also "putting out pages of highly detailed -- and often hotly disputed -- legal analyses of the program and drawing what Democratic critics and many independent analysts regard as questionable historical parallels to show Bush is following a long wartime tradition."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Gerstenzang, 958K) says Bush's visit to NSA headquarters at Ft. Meade, MD, "was part of a stepped-up campaign in recent days to gain public support for the spying program." Earlier, White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan "defended Bush's decision not to ask a special court for warrants to monitor people in the United States. 'This is a time of war. This is about wartime surveillance of the enemy,' McClellan said, adding a refinement of his earlier arguments: 'We don't ask our commanders to go to the court and ask for approval while they're trying to gain intelligence on the enemy.'"

The New York Times (1/26, Bumiller, Lichtblau, 1.19M) reports Bush "first met privately with employees at the agency, then told a small group of reporters who accompanied him that the program, which intercepts international phone calls and e-mail messages of people in the United States suspected of links to Al Qaeda, had been a crucial tool in fighting terrorism."

The President's speech was widely noted by local television news. Local coverage largely mirrored the national newscasts. For example, WGCL-TV Atlanta (1/25, 11:00 p.m.) reported, "Bush continued his aggressive defense of his domestic spying program today." KPRC-TV Houston (1/25, 4:16 p.m.) reported, "The President' s strong defense of a surveillance program is forcing some Democrats to mute criticism." KPNX-TV Phoenix (1/25, 10:12 p.m.) said Democrats '"disagree [with the President] and the Senate will hold hearings," but as KWGN-TV Denver (1/25, 9:24 p.m.) reported, this is a "controversy…the President himself seems almost anxious to keep alive."

White House Confident Public Supports Monitoring Efforts. NBC Nightly News (1/25, lead story, 3:00, Mitchell) reported, "Democrats think their best argument is the move was the power grab the President and will ultimately prove to be unpopular. Despite the furor, the White House is encouraged by recent polls, showing more Americans care about fighting terror than preserving their privacy." Andrew Kohut, independent pollster: "The public is concerned about civil liberties but what they tell us in the polls is they're more concerned about whether the government is doing enough to protect it from another terrorist attack." Mitchell: "Tonight the President plans to reauthorize the spying for as long as terrorists remain a threat."

Claims NSA Program Could Have Prevented 9/11 Attacks Challenged. The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 2, 2:00, Martin) reported, "The man who ran the NSA on 9/11 has made the most powerful argument in favor of the controversial eavesdropping program." Gen. Michael Hayden: "Had this program been in effect prior to 9/11, it is my professional judgment that we would have detected some of the 9/11 al Qaeda operatives in the United States." He "offered no specifics, and Democratic members of the 9/11 commission dispute it." Former 9/11 commissioner Tim Roemer: "Indicating that an intercepted communication would somehow identify and then stop or block parts of 9/11, I think is stretching this argument entirely too far." Former 9/11 commissioner Bob Kerrey: "We lost them. There was a breakdown in communication that many has nothing to do with the inability of getting an intercept permission to listen to people's communication." Martin: "Hayden stopped just short of saying warrantless eavesdropping could have broken up the 9/11 plot, but today, the White House claimed it might have. You can't prove any of that with what the 9/11 commission found."

Republicans May Propose Expanding Administration Wiretapping Authority. As a sign of growing Republican confidence in supporting Bush's terrorist monitoring policy one unidentified GOP Senator may propose expanding the Administration's wiretapping authority. The CBS Evening News (1/25, lead story, 4:00, Roberts) reported, "The growing response from Republicans in Congress: Tell us what you need. We'll write new laws. In fact, one Republican Senator told CBS News tonight, she might consider loosening the standards for approving the wiretap and allowing more officials at the Justice Department, not just the Attorney General, to authorize eavesdropping, so that it could begin just as soon as the NSA needed it." Schieffer: "Now, just a second, John. Are you telling me, there's a feeling amongst Republicans up in the Congress that they're going to give more people in the government the authority to eavesdrop without warrants? Is that what you're saying here?" Roberts: "That's what one Republican Senator is suggesting, that instead of making all eavesdropping or wiretapping requests go through the Attorney General, that some upper-level officials might be available and able to be able to authorize those wiretaps. It would spread it out among dozens of people as opposed to a single one at the top." Schieffer: "What do you think the mood is up there? Do you think anything like that could pass?" Roberts: "It's certainty being considered by the Republicans. They have the majority in the Senate and in the House, and if they want it, they'll probably get it."

Democrats On House Intel Panel Demand Open And Closed Hearings On NSA Spying. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "Democrats on the House Intelligence Committee are demanding that the panel hold both open and closed hearings on the NSA surveillance program. In a letter to the Republican chairman, they say they want to know the purpose of the spying, when it began and when it was first authorized. They want to know the targets of the eavesdropping, who decides what information to collect."

Hillary Clinton Calls Bush's Explanations Of Domestic Spying Program "Strange And Farfetched." CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "Senator Hillary Clinton says she doesn't know if Mr. Bush broke the law by authorizing these wiretaps without warrants, but today the New York Democrat called the President's explanations about domestic spying -- and I'm quoting now – 'strange and farfetched.'"

Under the headline "Rift Between Parties Over NSA Wiretapping Grows," the Washington Post (1/26, A4, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "In the latest sign of the escalating debate on the issue, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) called Bush's rationale a 'strange' and dangerous legal stretch." The "conflicting views of the NSA spying program highlighted by the Bush-Clinton exchange reflect a widening divide over warrantless eavesdropping," and "how leaders in both major parties are trying to shape the debate in preparation for upcoming congressional hearings and this year's elections."

LATimes Says Bush Equating Appeasement With Standing Up For Rule Of Law. In an editorial titled "Spying

By Another Name," the Los Angeles Times (1/26, 958K) says, "With polls showing the American public increasingly skeptical about the need to abridge core constitutional freedoms to wage the war on terrorism, the Bush administration launched a major PR offensive this week to justify its decision to conduct warrantless wiretapping within the United States." The White House "deserves credit for at least making its case. Unfortunately for the president, it's a weak case, and repetition doesn't make it any better." The Administration's "legal case remains wobbly, which may explain…Bush's churlish attitude toward his critics." The President "is equating concerns about the legality of bypassing the courts to obtain a warrant to eavesdrop on Americans with a lack of appreciation for the threats posed by Al Qaeda. In Bush's world, only appeasers stand up for the Constitution."

Judge Orders US To Give Moussaoui Defense Documents About Pre-9/11 Intelligence. The AP (1/26) reports US District Judge Leonie Brinkema "has ordered the government to give admitted terrorist conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui's defense team documents describing what officials knew before Sept. 11, 2001, about al-Qaeda threats and some of its hijackers. … 'Several of the categories of information are so critical to the issues in this case that the court can address some of the requests without a response,' Brinkema wrote. 'Moreover, given the increasingly shortening time before the start of the trial, discovery issues must be resolved quickly.' Granted Tuesday under seal, her order was released Wednesday after government censors blacked out about five lines of it." The AP notes that the "data clearly was sought by the defense for use in the first part of the upcoming court proceeding, in which prosecutors will try to convince jurors that the FBI would have prevented the Sept. 11 attacks if Moussaoui had told federal agents what he knew about al-Qaeda's desire to fly planes into U.S. buildings. The defense will argue that agents had more information about the plot than Moussaoui could provide but still could not prevent the attacks."

Scripps Howard (1/25, Gordon) reports, "The ruling could create a legal showdown, for example, if it requires intelligence agencies to produce classified information that they consider too sensitive to release, even to defense lawyers with government security clearances. … Jury selection is set to begin on Feb. 6, with opening arguments slated for March 6 in a sentencing trial to determine whether Moussaoui, who pleaded guilty to six conspiracy counts last April, should live or die."

Al Arian Lawyers Seek To Withdraw From Case If Retried. The AP (1/26) reports Sami al Arian's defense attorneys, Linda Moreno and Bill Moffitt, "asked a federal judge to let them off the case if prosecutors retry the former college professor on charges of aiding terrorists. … A hearing is scheduled for Friday. 'We gave everything we had, and I'm too exhausted to give anymore,' Moffitt…said Tuesday." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutor Terry Zitek told the court that if the case is retried, his team will need until June to present 'a streamlined case,' which should take about two months to present to a jury."

Texas Men Sentenced For Illegal Exports To Libya, Syria. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/26) reports Texas "brothers convicted of sending exports from their U.S. company to countries considered sponsors of terrorism were sentenced Wednesday to federal prison, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. Hazim Elashi was sentenced to 5 1/2 years in prison and will be deported after serving his sentence. His brother Ihsan 'Sammy' Elashi was given a six-year term, which will run consecutively to the four-year sentence he is currently serving. Hazim and Ihsan Elashi, their three brothers and their company," InforCom, "were convicted in 2004 on charges of making illegal technology shipments to Libya and Syria." The AP notes, "Agents from the FBI investigated InfoCom for years and raided the business the week before the Sept. 11 terror attacks. Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the original indictments against the brothers, calling it part of a campaign against 'the financiers of terror.'"

ACLU Files Lawsuit In Support Of Tariq Ramadan. The New York Times (1/26, Preston, 1.19M) reports that the ACLU filed a lawsuit in Federal District Court in Manhattan on behalf of scholar Tariq Ramadan, and three national organizations of academics or writers who have invited him to speak to their members yesterday, "seeking to strike down a clause of the USA Patriot Act that bars foreigners who endorse terrorism from entering to this country." Ramadan "has been denied a United States visa since July 2004, when he was on the verge of moving with his family to Indiana to take up a tenured professor's position at the Joan B. Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies at the University of Notre Dame. … The ACLU, joined by the New York Civil Liberties Union, brought the suit against Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, asserting that the Patriot Act clause is unconstitutional and that the ban on Mr. Ramadan violates the First Amendment rights of American thinkers who want to meet with him." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, A4, 2.11M) reports, "The lawsuit…intensifies the debate over the Patriot Act and reflects concerns in academia that the US's security precautions are hampering the flow of ideas between foreign and US scholars."

PATRIOT ACT:

US Scholarly Organizations File Lawsuit Over Patriot Act Visa Provision. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, A4, 2.11M) reports, "Three scholarly organizations sued the federal government over its 2004 decision to revoke a visa granted to a European expert on Islam," Tariq Ramadan, "preventing him from taking a faculty position at the University of Notre Dame. The lawsuit…intensifies the debate over the Patriot Act and reflects concerns in academia that the U.S.'s security precautions are hampering the flow of ideas between foreign and U.S. scholars." The Journal adds, "The lawsuit asks the U.S. District Court in New York City to declare unconstitutional a portion of the Patriot Act that denies entry on the grounds of 'ideological exclusion' to those who have endorsed or espoused terrorist activity or who have persuaded others to do so. 'There is simply no evidence' of Mr. Ramadan supporting terrorism, said Barbara DeConcini, executive director of the American Academy of Religion, one of the plaintiff groups." The New York Times (1/26, Preston, 1.19M) notes, "The ACLU, joined by the New York Civil Liberties Union, brought the suit against" DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, asserting that the Patriot Act clause is unconstitutional and that the ban on Mr. Ramadan violates the First Amendment rights of American thinkers who want to meet with him." The AP (1/25, Neumeister) and Knight Ridder (1/26, Strobel) also report on the lawsuit.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Georgia ACLU Releases Documents Allegedly Showing Spying On Activist Groups. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/26, Montgomery, 430K) reports, "In the name of fighting terrorism, the U.S. government and police agencies from the federal to the local level have been spying on Georgia anti-war rallies, peace and social action groups, and even a vegan protest, the state legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union charged Wednesday. Documents and surveillance photos obtained by the ACLU through a Freedom of Information Act request reveal a pattern of 'spying on Georgians who are our friends and neighbors, and are leading lawful lives,' attorney Gerald Weber said…outside the Georgia Homeland Security offices in downtown Atlanta. … 'Many of us remember the days of J.Edgar Hoover, and this is another reminder,' said state Rep. Nan Grogan Orrock." The Journal-Constitution adds, "A special agent at the FBI press office in Washington who would not give her name said the FBI 'investigates groups or individuals when we have information or allegations of federal law being broken. We do not investigate groups or persons exercising their constitutional right of protest or dissent.'"

The AP (1/26) reports the ACLU "released two documents from the FBI and DeKalb County Homeland Security," and "Weber says so far the ACLU has received complaints from six organizations and nearly two dozen people who fear they have been spied upon, photographed, videotaped or had their events infiltrated by government agents. He says none of them did anything that would justify surveillance but rather are critics of the Bush administration." The AP notes, "FBI spokesman Bill Carter says all FBI investigations are conducted in response to information that the people being investigated were involved in or might have information about crimes."

White House Declines To Release Documents On Katrina Warning. NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 2, 2:00, Williams) in its story on Federal Katrina relief reported, "Congress also wants answers from the White House about the poor Federal response to Katrina, and tonight members of both parties complain the President is holding back important information about who knew what and when." Sen. Joe Liebermann: "They haven't given us the documents we've asked for. They haven't let us into the people in the White House who were involved in the decision making regarding Hurricane Katrina." Gregory: "The White House cites executive privilege." Scott McClellan, White House Press Secretary: "The President believes that Senator Lieberman ought to have the right to confidential conversations with his advisors, just like all presidents have asserted they ought to have that same right."

The New York Times (1/26, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "In their four months of digging, House and Senate investigators have collected hundreds of thousands of pages of documents and testimony from governors, mayors, Homeland Security and Pentagon officials and dozens of others touched by Hurricane Katrina." While Republican leaders of the two committees are satisfied with "the mountains of still-accumulating evidence," to Democrats, "crucial holes still remain, particularly related to what senior White House aides and the president knew, and how they reacted to this knowledge, right before the storm and after it." Senator Joseph I. Lieberman "said Wednesday that he realized it was unlikely he could get the information he wanted by threatening to subpoena. Even if one were issued, the administration would probably fight it in court."

MSNBC's Hardball (1/25, Shuster) reported, "Ratcheting up a battle with Congress, the Bush White House is now refusing to turn over Hurricane Katrina related documents or make senior officials available for testimony. The Administration contends executive branch discussions about the storm are not open to review by Congress. … It was Senator Lieberman, the President's favorite Democrat, who on Tuesday alleged the Bush Administration's refusal to cooperate has killed the Katrina investigation."

Landrieu Says Administration Should Be More Forthcoming. Sen. Mary Landrieu said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/25), "I believe the committee, the Bipartisan Committee of Senator Collins and Lieberman, has asked for those records. They are truly acting in a bipartisan spirit. And we would like a full investigation of actually what happened. Not so that we can spend time blaming…but that we can prevent this from happening again, and we can get on the business of rebuilding New Orleans, Louisiana, and the Gulf Coast. So you'll have to ask them specifically what they asked for, but I would hope they would provide all the records so we could get to the bottom of whose fault it was that the levees broke and how do we fix it in the future." Asked about White House claims that the requested information is privileged, Landrieu said, "I would think it would be in the country's best interest, as we seek to protect the people of this nation from terrorist attacks, from catastrophic events, that we would have a real independent investigation of that. Our governor has turned over a great deal of information. I'm assuming that our mayor and local officials have. The White House needs to step up and be very forthcoming. But more than turning over that information, the White House needs to turn over some good plans for rebuilding. All we've heard is a lot of empty promises and criticism."

Vitter Criticizes Federal, State and Local Responses To Hurricane. Sen. David Vitter said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/25), "We need to understand what broke down at the federal level and the state level and the local level. Because things clearly broke down at every level. This was not a disaster that was predictable. This was a disaster that was utterly predicted in print, in studies like the hurricane pan exercise. And every level of government fell flat." Vitter added, "I was disappointed at the federal response, very disappointed. I said so matter of factly the Friday after the storm. I gave the whole recovery effort an F. And the state response was just as poor and the local response."

White House Rejects Plan To Buy Out Katrina Home Owners.

In a story that characterized the White House as declining to approve aid for Louisiana NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 2, 2:00, Williams) reported on "the long road back for the Gulf Coast, specifically the state of Louisiana. Crippled by Katrina and hoping for a $30 billion Federal relief package that just today was shot down by the Bush White House." NBC (Gregory) added, "Despite lofty promises, the White House has rejected Louisiana's homeowner bailout plan which local officials consider it crucial for recovery." Rep. Richard Baker, New Orleans: "To leave us in that state of disrepair without the hope of recovery is very troubling." Gregory: "The White House considers the" state plan to buy out home owners as "too expensive and bureaucratic suggesting instead the state settle for the more than $6 billion in Federal grants released today to bail out just those homeowners who didn't have insurance because they lived outside the floodplain." Administration officials "say more Federal dollars may come later, but acknowledge that conservatives in Congress are worried about spiraling costs."

The New York Times (1/26, Nossiter, 1.19M) carried a similar tone, reporting, "The White House decision to withhold support from a major Congressional reconstruction plan left Louisiana officials expressing bewilderment on Wednesday over what they characterized as the lack of a workable alternative from the Bush administration. … 'The White House simply needs to tell us what their plan is,' Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said Wednesday at a news conference in Baton Rouge. 'We don't see an adequate plan. You can't fix a $12 billion problem with $6 billion.'"

Reuters (1/25, Roberts) reported, "A group representing mortgage bankers also said President George W. Bush had yet to offer an alternative that was comparable to the plan proposed in Baker's legislation to create the Louisiana Recovery Corp. 'We'll really pay attention to the State of the Union address because we'll be anxious to see what the president is going to propose as a plan for rebuilding those devastated areas,' said Kurt Pfotenhauer, senior vice president of government affairs at the Mortgage Bankers Association. 'It's clear that some plan has to be in place in order to spur the investment of private capital.'"

USA Today (1/26, Dorell, Konigsmark, 2.31M) reports, "Donald Powell, President Bush's coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, suggested that money from the government's funding grant, announced Wednesday, be doled out to roughly 20,000 homeowners who weren't in a flood zone and did not have flood insurance when Hurricane Katrina hit. State officials must draw up plans for disbursing the money and get federal approval." Blanco said the plan "simply will not work," and added that "she won't use the money as the White House recommends. 'We are not in the business of choosing between our citizens.'"

Highlighting the severity of the damage caused by Hurricane Katrina, NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 10, 1:30, Williams) also reported that some viewers were complaining about NBC's continuing coverage of the impact of Hurricane Katrina. NBC defended the extent of its coverage saying that it reported on the impact of all of last year's hurricane's in the region, but "Katrina is different. Katrina displaced two million Americans. It destroyed 350,000 homes. Not all the bodies have been found yet. It exposed cracks in our society, and it has us talking about race and class and money and relief. It affected what we pay for gas and may affect what we pay in taxes. It literally rearranged the map of the Gulf Coast. There are many heroes, but no one villain. Tonight, one of the great American cities is partially in ruins, and many of our fellow citizens are hurting and have nothing left. And in some places, nothing's been done yet." And "we intend to keep covering it."

Nagin's Comments Scrutinized. The Washington Post (1/26, C1, Haygood, 744K) reports, "New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin blew into the original Chocolate City yesterday. Everywhere he goes these days, there seem to be things to explain, his words and comments tossed about as if, well, in yet another hurricane." Attending the winter meeting of the US Conference of Mayors at the Capital Hilton, Nagin said, "I don't get what all the fuss was about when I talked about New Orleans being a chocolate city. I mean, I understand the frustration with my 'God' comments. Maybe I went a little overboard. But Chocolate City? Come on.'"

Flood Insurance Program Administrator Seeks Changes. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) reports, "The administrator of the National Flood Insurance Program asked Congress on Wednesday to allow the elimination of discounts on as many as 1.2 million policies and suggested that the government consider requiring millions more homeowners to buy coverage. The program expects to borrow $23 billion from the Treasury to pay claims from Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma." David I. Maurstad, the administrator, "asked Congress to order the program's parent agency, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, to study expanding coverage requirements to properties in areas known as 500-year flood plains, with a 0.2 percent chance of flooding in any year, and to properties protected by levees and dams. He estimated that would affect four million to six million properties."

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports "the Senate Banking Committee is preparing to overhaul the federal flood insurance program, resulting in much higher premiums for many homeowners and a likely taxpayer bailout. … While broad legislation hasn't yet been proposed, several committee members and experts who appeared before the banking panel yesterday agreed that the insurance program needs to be restructured to operate more like a private insurance company."

WAR NEWS:

US, Iraqi Forces Repel Insurgent Attacks In Ramadi. US Marines and Iraqi troops repelled insurgent attacks in Ramadi Tuesday afternoon, killing seven insurgents. The Washington Post (1/26, A18, Finer, 744K) reports, "Five insurgents -- whose assault included mortar, small-arms and machine-gun fire -- were killed by a strike from a Marine Harrier jet as they gathered in a nearby cemetery, according to a statement from Capt. Jeffrey S. Pool, a Marine spokesman in the city. Two other fighters died in a firefight after insurgents used a rocket-propelled grenade to attack a military convoy entering the city's main government compound. No U.S. or Iraqi forces were wounded in the clashes, the statement said." The Post adds, "During the fighting, Zaal Shehan Mahmoud, 30, a cameraman for the Baghdad TV network, was killed by more than 20 bullets to the head, abdomen and legs, according to Mohammed Dulaimi, a doctor at the Ramadi hospital."

Officials See Rift Between Foreign Fighters, Local Insurgents. Maj. Gen. Richard Zahner, deputy chief of staff for intelligence for multinational forces in Iraq says a deepening rift between radical foreign fighters and native Iraqi insurgents has turned violent, creating an opportunity for US forces to try to persuade local guerillas to lay down their arms and join the political process. USA Today (1/26, Jervis, 2.31M) reports, "Iraq's national security adviser, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, also said there is a rift in the insurgency, calling it a 'a major step forward in our fight against terrorism.'" Zahner "said the insurgency consists of about 12,000 to 15,000 hard-core Iraqi fighters and supporters, as well as 1,000 militants loyal to al-Qaeda in Iraq, of which about 10% are foreign."

Videos Of Insurgent Attacks Provide Training Tool For US Forces. USA Today (1/26, Diamond, 2.31M) reports, "Videotapes of insurgent attacks in Iraq have become a potent propaganda tool for militant Islamists but also a handy training aid for U.S. forces, according to Army briefing documents being given to U.S. officers deploying for duty in Iraq. Insurgents routinely videotape their attacks and sometimes post the footage on the Internet as propaganda to show tactical victories against U.S. military convoys or helicopters. A briefing report prepared by the intelligence division of the Army's Training and Doctrine Command shows how the Army is mining the insurgent tapes for ways to avoid casualties." The briefing "report says 55% of U.S. military deaths in Iraq are attributed to improvised explosive devices, the military's term for roadside bombs, and small-arms attacks. It says 59% of U.S. military deaths occurred in Baghdad and Sunni-dominated Anbar province, which runs from just west of Baghdad to the Syrian border. Designed to help soldiers know what to expect and how to counter insurgent tactics, the briefing also warns that Iranian-backed Shiite militants as well as Iraqi Sunnis and foreign Sunni fighters are regularly mounting attacks."

US Troops Train Iraqi Police To Defeat Insurgents, Combat Corruption. NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 6, 2:00, Miklaszewski) reported that Colonel Bushar Hussein, commander of Iraq's first special police brigade, and his "commandos are slowly taking back parts of the city." And

"he isn't doing it alone. For the past nine months, 10-man teams of US military advisors have trained and fought alongside Iraqi police commandos. Major General Joe Peterson heads the increased US effort to turn Iraqi police into an independent fighting force by the end of this year." Peterson: "Our troops are making a significant difference in increasing that capability." Miklaszewski: "Despite some progress, the Iraqi commandos are far from fighting entirely on their own." Peterson: "There are times when a guy will walk off down the street and buy a pack of cigarettes while we are trying to provide security. And I'll have to fix him." Miklaszewski: "In addition, some police units have been infiltrated by militias while others are reportedly ripe with corruption." And "Colonel Bushar warns that government corruption and incompetence may pose more of a threat to the future of Iraq than the insurgents. And in the long run, may be even more difficult to defeat."

US To Release Five Female Iraqi Prisoners.

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 3, 0:25, Woodruff) reported, "Iraq's justice ministry said at least five Iraqi women, in US custody, would be freed soon, possibly tomorrow. This would go a long way toward meeting the demands of militants who kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll of the Christian Science Monitor. A US spokesman confirmed the release of prisoners would occur, but the US has said consistently that any release would be a coincidence and not a response to the kidnapping."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 4, :45, Schieffer) reported, "US officials insist this is not linked to the demand by the kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll that US forces release all women detainees."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Murphy, 61K) reports, "Reuters reported that Iraqi officials have suggested the delay in releasing the women was linked to the demands of the kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll, who threatened to kill her by last Friday unless all women prisoners were freed. The deadline passed with no word on Ms. Carroll's fate."

However, the Washington Times (1/26, Deshmukh, 90K) says that the Iraqi Justice Ministry official "denied that the release of the women had anything to do with kidnappers' demands, and U.S. forces have stressed they do not negotiate with hostage-takers."

Reporter Recounts Attempted Kidnapping In Iraq. The Washington Post (1/26, C1, 744K) excerpts the book "Tell Them I Didn't Cry: A Young Journalist's Story of Joy, Loss, and Survival in Iraq" by reporter Jackie Spinner. In it, Spinner writes, "For 13 months in 2004 and 2005, my half was in Baghdad, dodging mortar rounds, roadside bombs and potential kidnappers, while [twin sister] Jenny worried from home that I would not be able to keep my promise to my nephew, her young son. 'Aunt Jackie always comes back,' I told him each time I returned to Baghdad, to a place that began to feel more like home the longer I stayed." Spinner recounts a day outside Abu Ghraib prison, "when a stranger grabbed my arm and began dragging me toward a car. … Another man came up behind me and grabbed me around the waist. Someone else grabbed the pillowcase that held my belongings and threw it aside. At first I couldn't fathom what was going on. What was happening to me? Were they trying to kidnap me? They were trying to kidnap me! My heart pounded. … Once the men who grabbed me saw the Marines, they let go, and everyone scattered."

In Wake Of Carroll Kidnapping, Journalist Rethinks Dangers In Iraq. Journalist Alissa Rubin writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/26, 958K), "When Jill Carroll was kidnapped, other journalists in Iraq were aghast that something so horrible had happened to someone they knew. But many insisted privately that it never would have happened to them. … The truth is that we are working in a war zone where no rules apply. No one is safe: not Iraqis, not Westerners, not men, not women." Rubin adds, "For most journalists in Iraq, it's hard to be honest about danger, even though we talk about it all the time. … To family and friends not in Iraq, it is incomprehensible why you came here, and certainly why you returned twice, three times — in my case, over and over for nearly three years. … For me, at least, what is true is that once in a while as a journalist you get the chance to witness history, a moment when tectonic plates shift, when more is at stake than you ever imagined you would touch or see. It's the adrenaline surge of being in a place where people's lives are in the balance, where every decision counts and where what you're writing might, might just matter. … I was aware of the statistics: Since the beginning of the war, 60 journalists, five of them women, had been killed in Iraq and at least 37 abducted, according to a tally by the Committee to Protect Journalists. But like all the other foreign journalists in Iraq — fewer than 75 of us, down from more than a thousand after the war — I needed to believe that I was going to slip through. After [journalist Jill] Carroll's abduction, I don't feel that way anymore." Iraq "is hostile ground and nothing I do can make it safe."

Former General Says Iraq WMD Moved To Syria Before US Invasion.

Former Iraqi general George Sada, author of "Saddam's Secrets, How an Iraqi General Survived Saddam Hussein," in an interview on Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (1/25) said, "I want to make it very clear to everybody in the world that" there were weapons of mass destruction in Iraq "and the regime used them against our Iraqi people. It was used against Kurds in the north. Against Arabs." Asked whether Iraq had the WMD when the US toppled Hussein's regime, Sada replied, "Up to the year 2002, 2002, in summer, they were in Iraq. And then when Saddam realized that the inspectors are coming on first of November and the Americans are coming, so he took the advantage of natural disaster happened in Syria, a dam was broken. So announced to the world that he is going to make an air bridge" and moved the WMD to Syria.

Kurdish Writer's Prosecution Seen As Test Of Iraq's Move Toward Democracy. The New York Times (1/26, Oppel, 1.19M) reports on Kamal Sayid Qadir a Kurd who, from Austria has written articles accusing Kurdish leader Massoud Barzani's Democratic Party of corruption "while calling members of its intelligence service, the Parastin, criminals and its chief -- Mr. Barzani's son -- a 'pimp.'" Qadir is now imprisoned in Iraq, "sentenced last month to 30 years for defaming the Parastin and Kurdish political leaders after a trial that he said had lasted 15 minutes." The Times adds, "His case, while extraordinary, is by no means unique." These prosecutions "indicate how much remains at play in newly democratic Iraq. The nation has made remarkable steps away from totalitarian rule: the overthrow and prosecution of a genocidal dictator, two national elections and the adoption of a Constitution. But it remains to be seen how far Iraq will ultimately travel toward true Western-style democracy." Iraq "is still testing the limits of responsible free speech, and some of the name-calling and rumor-mongering that goes on clearly oversteps the boundaries. Many of Mr. Qadir's criticisms exceeded what would be tolerated in other Middle East countries, particularly his assertions about the sexual proclivities of the Barzani clan. A number of Kurdish journalists who have called Mr. Qadir's imprisonment outrageous say they are nevertheless uncomfortable with some of his writings, calling them offensive and reckless."

Arrest Of Police Strains Relations Between Iraqis, UK Troops. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Moore, 958K) reports, "Tensions continued to simmer Wednesday between local Iraqi officials and British troops in the Shiite-dominated southern city of Basra, where the British this week arrested 14 law enforcement officials, including two senior police intelligence officers, allegedly linked to political corruption and assassinations. The British released several of the men Wednesday, but a spokesman for the Basra provincial council said that eight remained in custody, including three who had been transferred to a prison facility after British authorities said they had bomb-making materials in their possession. … The province has responded to the arrests by threatening to cut off all cooperation with British forces in Iraq's second-largest city."

Soldiers Make Digital Memorials For Fallen Comrades. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Searcey, 2.11M) reports, "Digital photography, video and Internet access have let soldiers in Iraq stay closer to distant friends and family than troops in any other war. Now, these electronic records are also creating a powerful and raw new wave of war memorials. … Wartime cinematographers say commanders ask to review the videos before they're shown at memorial services to make sure they don't degrade the image of soldiers with, for example, footage showing them drinking."

Hoagland Says Administration Has Been "Bitten" By Reality In Iraq. Jim Hoagland writes in the Washington Post (1/26, A25, 744K), "Iraq's Dec. 15 balloting was orderly and inspiring, but it has created an aftermath that is neither of those things. It has also forced the Bush administration into a silent reassessment of where Iraq is going and how it is going to get there. Increasingly, the country drifts toward the future as two relatively stable autonomous regions and a violently unstable central zone, all linked by a weak central government and a reduced, reactive U.S. military presence." The Bush Administration "gives no sign of trying to hurry things along as it concedes it must deal with the election results it has, not the results it wanted. Those were canceled by the poor showing of Ayad Allawi and Ahmed Chalabi -- secularists who conceivably could have been strong, independent executives -- and successful electioneering by Iranian-backed Shiite parties distrusted by Washington. … Reality has bitten the Bush administration in Iraq and forced the president to settle for less than he wanted. Let's hope that reality can now do the same with Iraq's newly empowered Shiite leaders."

In 1998, Clinton Said No-Fly Zones Over Iraq Would Be Enforced. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (1/26, 90K) excerpts a December 28,, 1998 statement by then-President Bill Clinton. Clinton said, "I think I should say a few words about an incident early this morning over the skies of Iraq, where American and British air crews were enforcing a no-fly zone in Northern Iraq. They were fired on by Iraqi surface-to-air missiles. They took evasive action, returned fire on the missile site, and returned safely to their base in Turkey ... They attacked because they were attacked. And they did the appropriate thing. We will continue to enforce the no-fly zones."

Musharaff Blames US Missile Attack For Increasing Domestic Turmoil. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Champion, Kempe, 2.11M) in an interview with Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf at the World Economic Forum reports Musharraf "said a suspected U.S. missile attack on a Pakistani village that killed civilians this month 'probably' killed five or six al Qaeda operatives, but had

'harmed our interests' by violating his country's sovereignty and feeding domestic unrest." He "said his goal is to transform Pakistani society by ending conflicts like the one in Baluchistan, defusing Islamist extremism and generally calming 'a nation in turmoil.'" Gen. Musharraf said, "We want to guard our own sovereignty." He "also said his close cooperation with the U.S. in the fight against terrorism hadn't been damaged, and that Pakistan needs the technical help the U.S. can offer to gather intelligence. 'Intelligence is far more significant and difficult than operating against [al Qaeda],' he added."

India Provides Aid To Afghanistan. The Washington Times (1/26, Nelson, 90K) reports, "India has poured more than a half-billion dollars of foreign aid into Afghanistan in the past three years in an attempt to create a friendly and stable neighbor in a volatile part of the world." India's "effort, which continues despite a Pakistani blockade of Indian goods bound for Afghanistan, touches all aspects of life." Tensions "between India and Pakistan has complicated proposed energy pipelines from Afghanistan, which would have to run through Pakistan on the way to India." But some observers "think Pakistan is more worried about losing its dominant position in Afghan trade."

Rumsfeld Takes Issue With Reports Saying US Military Is Overstretched. Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Hume) reported, "A couple of new reports suggesting that the US military is overstretched or overstressed or both drew a sharp response from the Secretary of Defense. One report was funded by the Pentagon itself." Fox (Baier) added, "On Capitol Hill today, former officials from the Clinton Administration joined top Democrats to release a new study on the state of the US armed forces. Titled 'The US Military -- Under Strain And At Risk,' it concludes the war in Iraq threatened the battle-readiness of US troops. … At the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld addressed the criticism head on." Rumsfeld "said today's US military, while trying to recover from underfunding…is far from broken." Rumsfeld "pointed out there are more than 2 million troops in the US military if you're counting active duty, National Guard and Reserves and only 136,000 troops in Iraq."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 5, :45, Williams) reported, "Two new reports say tonight the US military is so overburdened from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that it's near the breaking point. One report flatly warns ground forces are stretched so thin and under such enormous strain, the Pentagon may not be able to recruit and retain enough troops in the all volunteer army to defeat the insurgency. This afternoon, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld responded." Rumsfeld: "This armed force is enormously capable. In addition, it's battle hardened. And it is not a peace time force that has been in barracks or garrisons." Williams: "Rumsfeld pointed out that there are 138,000 US troops in Iraq, out of two million total including the National Guard and Reserve units."

In a brief story The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 3, :45, Schieffer) noted, "Rumsfeld took strong issue today with former Clinton Administration officials who say the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have stretched the US military to the near breaking point. At a Pentagon news conference, Rumsfeld called that misdirected, and he praised the military as, quote, 'enormously capable and battle hardened.'"

The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/26) says Rumsfeld "spoke a day after the Associated Press reported that an unreleased study conducted for the Pentagon said the Army is being overextended, thanks to the two wars, and may not be able to retain and recruit enough troops to defeat the insurgency in Iraq. Congressional Democrats released a report Wednesday that also concluded the U.S. military is under severe stress."

The Washington Times (1/26, Scarborough, 90K) reports that Rumsfeld responded to the reports with a "combative appearance at a Pentagon press conference. He reminded reporters that during the Clinton years, when the military was sent on about 50 war and peacekeeping missions, that the force suffered from lack of funding and that some units were 'hollow pieces.'" Rumsfeld "said anyone who concludes that the Army is breaking does not know what he or she is talking about. 'I suspect the people writing these things don't know, either, because I suspect that they don't have any more insight than the other people around here do,' he said. 'I just can't imagine someone looking at the United States armed forces today and suggesting that they're close to breaking. That's just not the case.'"

USA Today (1/26, Komarow, 2.31M) says Rumsfeld "dismissed" the reports, "calling their authors ill-informed about America's 'battle-hardened' forces." Speaking at a news conference, Rumsfeld said, "People just don't fully understand," adding that today's military is "battle hardened. It's not a peacetime force that has been in barracks or garrisons."

The Washington Post (1/26, A18, Tyson, 744K) reports that Rumsfeld "said a recent decision to scale back U.S. troop levels in Iraq did not grow out of a need to relieve the strain on American ground forces." Rumsfeld said, "The force is not broken," adding, "I just can't imagine someone looking at the United States armed forces today and suggesting that they're close to breaking. That's just not the case." Rumsfeld called the US military an "'enormously capable force,' as demonstrated to the world by its swift overthrow of governments in Iraq and Afghanistan. Such proven capability

'ought to increase the deterrent rather than weaken it,' he added."

Study Finds Active Duty Reservists Earn More Than In Civilian Jobs. A study released yesterday by the RAND Corporation says that nearly three-fourths of military reservists called to serve in Afghanistan and Iraq are making more money on duty than in their civilian jobs. USA Today (1/26, Komarow, 2.31M) reports, "In many cases, the troops earn a higher gross salary in civilian life. But when the federal tax exemption and other allowances approved by Congress for troops in combat are factored in, about 72% are better off, according to a study by the RAND Corp., a research institute. The RAND study, which was funded by the Pentagon, showed an average benefit of 25% over civilian pay, about $10,000 a year." USA notes, "The study results run counter to complaints by Reserve and Guard troops that they have suffered financially when activated. It is part of an effort to track the war on terrorism's effects on part-time troops."

DOJ:

Federal Judge Extends Temporary Appointment Of Alabama US Attorney. The Mobile (AL) Register (1/26, Kirby) reports, "Chief U.S. District Judge Ginny Granade has extended the term of U.S. Attorney Deborah Rhodes, whose temporary appointment to the Mobile office expires this month." The Register continues, "Rhodes took over for David York, who resigned in September amid reports of an internal Department of Justice investigation into allegations that he had an improper relationship with an assistant prosecutor." The Register adds, "Under the law, the Justice Department could replace York for a maximum of 120 days. The statute gives the chief judge of the district the power to name the U.S. attorney beyond that, and Granade said Tuesday that she complied with a request by the Justice Department to extend Rhodes' tenure until President Bush names a permanent successor. … When appointed to Mobile, Rhodes, 47, was on special assignment to the Justice Department in Washington as a counselor to the assistant attorney general of the criminal division."

DHS Assisting DOJ With Case Management System. Federal Computer Week (1/25, Arnone) reports, "The Homeland Security Department is helping the Justice Department develop new case management systems for the entire federal government, DHS' chief information officer said today." FCW continues, "DHS is working with DOJ to create a Consolidated Enforcement Environment (CEE), which allows access to all available data, analyzes data and links relevant law enforcement partners, DHS' CIO Scott Charbo said. … One goal of the collaboration is to move beyond products and create a layer of information that can be used governmentwide, Charbo said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Trial Seen As Big Test For Federal Prosecutors. The New York Times (1/26, Eichenwald) reports, "In the court of public opinion, they were convicted long ago. But as Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, the onetime leaders of Enron, step into a court of law next week, the outcome of their fraud trial is far from certain, creating one of the most closely watched and hotly contested white-collar criminal cases ever." The Times continues, "On one side of the Houston federal courtroom starting Monday will be two top-flight teams of defense lawyers, who will be taking the risky approach of proclaiming many of the controversial actions of Enron and some much-criticized statements of their clients to be legal and truthful." The Times adds, "On the other, the prosecutors for the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, who have racked up an impressive array of guilty pleas in the case, but whose performance at trial has been decidedly less dazzling. … 'For the government, if they lose the Enron case, it will be seen as a symbolic failure of their rather significant campaign against white-collar crime,' said John C. Coffee Jr., a professor at Columbia Law School. 'It will be seen as some evidence that some cases are too complicated to be brought into the criminal justice process.'" The Times notes, "Of the three major Enron-related criminal cases brought by the government before juries, guilty verdicts stand from only one, which involved Enron's booking what the government said were phantom profits on the sale of Nigerian barges to Merrill Lynch. A second case, against the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, was thrown out by the Supreme Court on appeal. The third, involving the broadband division of Enron, resulted in no convictions, but the five defendants await a retrial."

Success Of Efforts To Curb Corporate Fraud Seen As Problematic. The Washington Post (1/26, D1, Johnson, Ben White) reports, "Four years after the collapse of Enron Corp. spurred the most sweeping revisions in business regulation since the Great Depression, experts warn that the ingredients for a similar financial disaster remain." The Post continues, "Despite new laws and regulations, companies still face enormous pressure to meet short-term financial goals, creating a powerful motive for accounting fraud. Outsized executive compensation grows by the year, offering another rich incentive to cook the books. And there is no certainty that Congress will continue to fund regulatory budgets at current levels. … But some things have changed since December

2001, when Enron's sudden descent into bankruptcy protection rocked investor confidence and left the markets reeling. Accountants face independent oversight for the first time in 70 years. Most corporate board members take their jobs far more seriously. Wall Street is somewhat less willing to accommodate clients' interests." The Post adds, "Nearly a dozen experts contacted by The Washington Post, including regulators, accountants, chief executives, board members and investor advocates, agreed to fill out a corporate governance report card on the eve of the Enron trial. … Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act in July 2002, imposing new duties on corporate executives, auditors and directors. The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department spent tens of millions of dollars to root out malfeasance. Along the way, prosecutors won criminal convictions and decades-long prison terms for former leaders of Adelphia Communications Corp., Tyco International Ltd. and WorldCom Inc. … But in a sense, the government efforts may have backfired, inspiring a dangerous overconfidence among investors."

Ex-Enron Employees Still Feel Effects Of Stock Price Plummet. USA Today (1/26, Armour, 2.31M) reports, "Four years after the Texas energy giant began its meltdown -- and on the eve of a criminal trial for its former top executives -- many former Enron employees still feel betrayed." Some of them, "at the end of their careers, have started over again in new jobs -- but working harder to keep up with younger co-workers. They've turned to churches and food pantries to eat, sold homes they could no longer pay for, and endured financial stresses that frayed their marriages."

Former Securities Broker Pleads Guilty To New York Market-Timing Charge. The AP (1/26, Gormley) reports, "A former Las Vegas securities broker pleaded guilty to a felony charge Wednesday in a mutual fund investigation in which investors were defrauded through improper late trading and market timing, according to New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer." The AP continues, "Daniel Calugar, 52, now of Ponte Vedra, Fla., pleaded guilty in state Supreme Court in New York City to violating a state business integrity law called the Martin Act. He was accused of entering into a secret agreement in August, 2001, that defrauded a mutual fund called the Franklin Small-Mid Cap Growth Fund. … He faces up to four years in prison when he is sentenced March 23." The AP adds, "Earlier this month, Calugar agreed to pay $153 million to settle civil charges brought by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. Calugar will relinquish $103 million in ill-gotten gains and pay a civil penalty of $50 million, the largest penalty regulators have imposed on an individual in a late trading and market timing case, SEC officials said. … Spitzer said Calugar secretly agreed to a deal with an employee of Franklin's investment adviser. Calugar would be allowed to rapidly trade in the mutual fund without paying a 2 percent penalty. Calugar then invested $10 million in another hedge fund run by Franklin and defrauded the fund and its shareholders of more than $1 million in fees that he avoided."

Livedoor Investigation Prompts Re-Examination of Japanese Accounting Standards. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Hayashi, Morse) reports, "The investigation into Internet company Livedoor Co. has pointed a spotlight" on Japanese accounting standards, which need to be upgraded, the article says. The Journal notes, "Tokyo district prosecutors arrested Livedoor Chief Executive Takafumi Horie on suspicion of violating securities law." Now, "in Japan, experts … are calling for stepped-up efforts to improve accounting standards, as companies .... increasingly use sophisticated and aggressive financial techniques." In particular, the article notes, "Japan has no standards on accounting for special-purpose companies," and no rules "on how to interpret revenue at Internet and software companies, whose business structures tend to differ significantly from those of traditional companies." However, the article notes, changes are beginning to take place, with the Financial Services Agency issuing "a guideline calling for closer examination of accounting firms and requiring companies to rotate their accountants more frequently" and the Accounting Standards Board of Japan adopting "a handful of standards in the past two months, covering areas from mergers and acquisitions to executive compensation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Leahy Seeks Information From DOJ On Google Subpoena. Reuters (1/26, Vicini) reports, "The Senate Judiciary Committee's top Democrat asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales what steps are being taken to protect Americans' privacy rights as the Justice Department demands information about Internet searches." Reuters continues, "In the letter released on Wednesday, Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont asked Gonzales about the subpoena to Google Inc. and three other companies seeking data about what millions of Americans search for on the Internet's leading search engines." Reuters adds, "Leahy asked about the types of information being sought, how the department intends to use the information while protecting individual privacy rights and civil liberties and whether it will issue any additional subpoenas. … Leahy's letter comes at a time of growing criticism in Congress over the government's monitoring of communications, after the disclosure that the Bush administration has been conducting domestic eavesdropping after the September 11 attacks."

CNET News (1/25, Broache) reports, "Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said the department planned to respond accordingly, though he was not sure what the response would entail. … As for the privacy concerns raised by Leahy, 'We've addressed that in our subpoenas and to the search engines,' Miller said. 'We weren't seeking information about the individuals, we were only seeking the search terms....We don't even want to know the names of the people.'"

Rep Davis Questions Google's Response To Subpoeana. Government Computer News (1/25, Grimes) reports, "House Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) said today that search giant Google Inc. has 'bent over backward' to comply with the Chinese government's demand that it block certain search results in order to operate in that country. So why, he wondered, won't the company cooperate with the U.S. Justice Department in its efforts to fight online pornography?" GCN continues, "Google has refused a Justice Department subpoena for search results, saying it violated users' privacy. The government has said it needs the data to prepare a case regarding the 1998 Child Online Protection Act. … Other search companies have complied with the subpoena. … The company today also launched a Chinese version of its search site after agreeing to censor topics such as Falun Gong and Tibet. … 'Google gave the Chinese everything they wanted. They're not going to put data on there about human rights,' Davis said." GCN notes, "Davis spoke to public-sector CIOs today at a summit hosted by Micrsosoft Corp. Microsoft's MSN service also censors search results in China, as do Yahoo and others. Microsoft, Yahoo and America Online have also reportedly given the Justice Department information it was seeking. … 'What does it mean to be a corporate citizen, working to bring terrorists or child pornographers to bear? What are the boundaries?' Davis said. 'These are new areas for a lot of us that we've got to work our way through.'"

Dow Jones (1/25, Richmond) reports, "In the last week, Google Inc. stood up to one government and acquiesced to another. … The moves show the kind of treacherous terrain the Internet giant, whose corporate philosophy is 'Don't Be Evil,' must traverse as it weighs its ideals and its business interests. It also spotlights how important Google (GOOG) has become as a key waypoint on the global Internet, where individual and government interests around access to information can and do collide. … 'Google is at the cutting edge in terms of trying to figure out what is acceptable and what is not acceptable in this century,' when the Internet is making information more accessible than ever before, says Lauren Gelman, associate director of Stanford Law School's Center for Internet and Society. 'What happens to information Google collects? I think this is a big question for society as new technologies evolve and we have to rethink privacy and censorship.'"

The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Macdonald) reports that Google is confronting "an age-old business dilemma caught up in the new age of globalization: When governments demand something that compromises the interests of customers, what's a company to do?" The article notes that Google launched service in China and "because of government sensitivities there, will limit what users there can access." However, the article says, Google is also "vigorously fighting US government efforts to obtain data on its users' search habits." The article quotes one expert who lauds Google's decision to fight the subpoena, and another who dislikes Google's decision. The article notes that "So far, Google seems to be winning points for its tough stand against the US Department of Justice. According to one survey released this week, 56 percent of American users of the Internet believe Google should not release information about Web searches to the government." But overseas, the article says, "Google has endured criticism, as has Microsoft's MSN search service, for limiting what Chinese users can find."

Debate In Google Case Not Really About Privacy. The New York Times (1/26, Liptak) reports, "The Justice Department went to court last week to try to force Google, by far the world's largest Internet search engine, to turn over an entire week's worth of searches. The move, which Google is fighting, has alarmed its users, enraged privacy advocates, changed some people's Internet search habits and set off a debate about how much privacy one can expect on the Web. … But the case itself, according to people involved in it and scholars who are following it, has almost nothing to do with privacy. It will turn, instead, on serious but relatively routine questions about trade secrets and civil procedure." The Times continues, "The privacy debate prompted by the case may thus be an instance of the right answer to the wrong question. As recently demonstrated by disclosures of surveillance by the National Security Agency and secret inquiries under the USA Patriot Act, the government is aggressively collecting information to combat terror. And even in ordinary criminal prosecutions and in civil lawsuits, Internet companies including Google routinely turn over authentically private information in response to focused warrants and subpoenas from prosecutors and litigants. … But 'this particular subpoena does not raise serious privacy issues,' said Timothy Wu, a law professor at Columbia. 'These records are completely disconnected. They're just strings of words.'" The Times notes, "In its only extended discussion of its reasons for fighting the subpoena, a Google lawyer told the Justice Department in October that complying would be bad for business. 'Google objects,' the lawyer, Ashok Ramani, wrote,

'because to comply with the request could endanger its crown-jewel trade secrets.' … Mr. Ramani's five-page letter mentioned privacy only once, at the bottom of the fourth page, and then primarily in the context of perception rather than reality. … Even Google's allies are shying away from legal arguments based on privacy. The American Civil Liberties Union, for instance, said it planned to file papers supporting Google. But not on privacy grounds. 'We will probably not be making that argument,' said Aden J. Fine, a lawyer with the civil liberties union." The Times adds, "Other Internet search engine companies, including Yahoo, America Online and MSN, have complied with the same Justice Department subpoena, which also sought a random sample of a million Web addresses. The companies all said there were no privacy issues involved. … A Justice Department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse, agreed. 'We specifically stated in our requests,' he said, 'that we did not want the names, or any other information, regarding the users of Google.' … None of this is to say that subpoenas for search records linked to individuals are inconceivable. Google maintains information that could be used that way, and a subpoena could ask for it. But the recent subpoena does not."

Louisiana Businessman Pleads Guilty To New Orleans Contract Fraud. The AP (1/26) reports, "A businessman described by federal prosecutors as a key player pleaded guilty Wednesday to conspiring in a kickback scheme for the biggest contract signed while Marc Morial was New Orleans mayor. Terry Songy "admitted taking kickbacks from subcontractors, participating in a larger kickback conspiracy with the city's director of property management, and failing to file federal income tax returns for 2001, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said." The AP notes, "An affidavit filed with the guilty plea states that, after FBI agents approached him, Songy 'admitted his involvement in a much larger scheme than the government was aware' of. … The indictment described Songy as sharing hundreds of thousands of dollars in kickbacks with the three major defendants: Morial associates Stan 'Pampy' Barre, a restaurant owner and Morial confidant, city property manager Kerry De Cay, and construction company owner Reginald Walker. … All three have denied wrongdoing. Their trial is scheduled Sept. 5 before U.S. District Judge Carl Barbier."

Six Indicted On Bribery Charges In Ongoing Tennessee License Fraud Probe. The Tennessean (1/26, Carey) reports, "A widespread bribery scheme funneled hundreds of illegal aliens into a Winchester, Tenn.-based driving school, netting them fraudulent licenses. And six people, including one current and one former state employee, got more than $146,000, federal prosecutors said yesterday. The U.S. attorney's office yesterday unsealed a six-count indictment of the six people who are accused of helping hundreds of people since May 2004 obtain driver's licenses they didn't earn. … 'Just as in previous investigations, you had those who thought that what they did in secret would never come to light,' said My Harrison, FBI special agent in charge for the Middle and Western Districts of Tennessee. The FBI was one of several agencies involved in the probe. U.S. Attorney Jim Vines said the people who fraudulently received licenses weren't eligible for 'a variety of reasons.'" The Tennessean adds, "The investigation, dubbed Operation Crooked Highway, has been under way by federal and state agencies for 18 months, Vines said yesterday." The Murfreesboro Daily News (1/26) notes, "The FBI charged driver's license examiner Bruce Conklin with taking about $9,200 in cash from July 2005 to January. Agents also charged Bryan Guess, owner of the Winchester Driving School…with paying bribes to Conklin and a former examiner, Teresa Jones.

The AP (1/26) reports, "Authorities said they won't know how many illegal documents were issued until all evidence is studied and declined to speculate on the total. They did say that one state worker accepted $20 per student in bribes for about 1,000 licenses or certificates. 'We come to you with another sad chapter in the book of public corruption in Tennessee,' FBI agent in charge My Harrison said at an afternoon news conference." The AP adds, "Citing a number of recent public corruption investigations in Tennessee, Harrison said agents were getting better with practice. 'If you can hear me and are involved in public corruption, the eyes of law enforcement are upon you,' she said." The Nashville City Paper (1/26, Lewis) also notes Harrison said that "it's the latest 'sad chapter' in a string of Tennessee public corruption cases." She added, "You've heard of Operation Tennessee Waltz, Operation Tarnish Blue and Operation Tarnish Shield. What can I say? Same game, only the names have changed. The title of this new chapter is, Operation Crooked Highway." The City Paper adds that as a result of the investigation, "customs officials took into custody 50 undocumented immigrants and began deportation proceedings against 50 other immigrants who were uncovered in the investigation, said Rick Crocker, assistant special agent in charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement."

IRS Agent Downplays Ryan's Eventual Declaration Of Campaign Funds As Income. The Chicago Tribune (1/26, O'Connor, 643K) reports IRS Agent Shari Schindler "on Wednesday downplayed that former Gov. George Ryan filed corrected tax returns for 1995, 1996 and 1997 several years later because Ryan knew by then of the federal investigation into his finances." Schindler "said that by the time Ryan filed the amended returns in late 2002, each of his six children had testified before the grand jury and there had been press coverage of the nature of the probe." On cross-examination, Ryan lawyer Dan Webb "contended that records showed Ryan had paid taxes on most of the travel expenses, but that certain charges hadn't been itemized in campaign disclosure reports, fell through the cracks and mistakenly weren't reported on Ryan's returns." But Assistant US Attorney Laurie Barsella "pointed out that Roger Bickel, Ryan's former chief lawyer, had spelled out for Ryan 'in plain English' that personal use of campaign funds had to be reported on his tax returns." The AP (1/26, Robinson) notes that the "verbal fencing match between" Webb and Schindler "came to an end with no one sure who emerged the victor. Webb repeatedly tried to get her to agree that Ryan couldn't be blamed if he failed to report thousands of dollars in income because he was grappling with vague, complex tax laws. Schindler coolly disagreed, saying Ryan easily could have asked his tax advisers."

Prosecution Hopes To Rest Thursday After FBI Agent's Testimony. The Chicago Tribune (1/26, O'Connor, 643K) also reports Assistant US Attorney Patrick Collins "said he still hopes to rest the prosecution case on Thursday after four months of testimony. The FBI's case agent is scheduled to be the government's last witness." And US District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer "ruled Wednesday that prosecutors can play a portion of a videotape of Ryan from November when he made a statement to reporters outside the court defending his receipt of $9,675 from the Gramm campaign." The AP (1/26, Robinson) notes, "Prosecutors indicated Wednesday night that just one more prosecution witness remains - Raymond Ruebenson, the veteran FBI man who has long been the case agent for the government's seven-year Operation Safe Road investigation that led to the former governor's indictment. But Ruebenson was absent with a case of the flu Wednesday.

Laski Vows To Fight Bribery Charges, Alleges US Withheld Exculpatory Recordings.

The Chicago Tribune (1/26, Washburn, 643K) reports, "Facing federal corruption charges, a defiant James Laski vowed Wednesday to 'keep fighting,' insisted his office is running smoothly and took sharp issue with claims he was away from his job as Chicago city clerk for a prolonged period before charges were filed. 'Somebody is lying, and it isn't me,' Laski declared. The clerk's comments came after a surprise appearance at a City Council committee meeting, his first visit to the council chamber in nearly two months." The Tribune adds, "Laski implied Wednesday that exonerating portions of the recordings were not released when the U.S. attorney's office announced the charges against him on Jan. 13."

Former Campbell Aides Testify About Relationship With Contractor.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/26, Suggs, Scott, 430K) reports former Atlanta contracts compliance director Michael Sullivan testified at former Mayor Bill Campbell's corruption trial on Wednesday "that in 1994 he and the former mayor, along with city contractor Ricky Rowe, traveled together to Florida to attend a golf and tennis tournament sponsored by Black Enterprise magazine. Sullivan said the city paid for his trip. He said he was unsure of who paid for Campbell's but noticed that when he and Rowe were checking out of the hotel, Rowe used his credit card for Campbell's incidentals. … 'He was upset that I allowed Mr. Rowe to pay for his incidentals,' Sullivan told the jury. 'He told me that you can't use a credit card to pay for things like that. It leaves a trail.'" The Journal-Constitution adds, "The theme of loyalty to the mayor was played over and over Wednesday, witness after witness, as prosecutors tried to establish that City Hall under Campbell…was a den of cronyism and deal-making between Campbell, his friends and political allies. None of the prosecution's witnesses testified that Campbell made them do anything illegal, nor did they say they saw Campbell doing anything criminal."

Wisconsin Procurement Official Indicted Over Travel Contract Award.

The AP (1/26) reports, "An official in Gov. Jim Doyle's administration was indicted on two felony counts Tuesday for her role in awarding a state travel contract to a company whose executives donated $20,000 to Doyle's campaign. The federal indictment alleges that Georgia Thompson, chief of the Department of Administration's procurement bureau, tried to give her bosses political advantage and help her own job security." The AP notes Thompson, "who was hired before Doyle took office in 2003, served on a committee that awarded a contract to Adelman Travel as part of an effort to cut travel costs. … Questions were raised this summer after media reports that Adelman's CEO donated $10,000 to Doyle before the contract went into effect. An Adelman board member gave another $10,000 afterward, finance reports show."

Former New Jersey Councilman Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering.

The Farmingdale (NJ) News Transcript (1/25, Front Page, Israeli) reports former Marlboro Township Councilman Thomas Broderick "pleaded guilty in federal court last week to one count of money laundering. … Broderick was one of the 11 Monmouth County officials who were arrested…in an FBI investigation known as 'Operation Bid Rig.' … Broderick admitted that he accepted $15,000 for assisting in the laundering of large sums of cash from a cooperating government witness whom he believed was a corrupt demolition contractor." The News Transcript notes, "He is scheduled to be sentenced on April 27. Broderick remains free on $50,000 bail."

Contractor Sentenced To Probation, Fine For SoCom Bribery Scheme. The Tampa Tribune (1/26, Lardner) reports, "A contractor formerly employed by U.S. Special Operations Command was sentenced Wednesday to three years probation and a $4,500 fine for his role in a bribery scheme that has tarnished the war fighting organization's reputation for acquiring equipment used by the nation's elite fighting forces. U.S. District Judge Susan Bucklew, who called William E. Burke's crime 'scary' and a 'bad thing,' could have saddled him with a prison term of up to 16 months and a heftier fine. But Bucklew opted for the lighter penalties mainly because Burke has been cooperating with federal law enforcement agents examining contracting practices at Socom, which is headquartered at MacDill Air Force Base in Tampa."

Texas Hired Abramoff-Linked Firm Due To Access To Rove. The AP (1/26) reports the Texas state government "hired a firm with close ties to lobbyist Jack Abramoff after rejecting competing bids that met more of its selection criteria and cost less." The Austin American-Statesman reported that Cassidy & Associates, the winning firm, has access "all the way to presidential aide Karl Rove. … The firm was awarded a $15,000-a-month contract in 2004 to lobby Congress for the state." On Friday, seven Democratic Texas state legislators sent a letter to Gov. Rick Perry "demanding that Cassidy's contract be canceled."

California Man Pleads Guilty To Cyber Attack. Federal Computer Week (1/26, Brewin) reports, "A hacker indicted for creating botnet armies that infected Defense Information Systems Agency networks and computers at the Naval Air Warfare Center at China Lake, Calif., pleaded guilty to the charges at a hearing earlier this week in the U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, the Justice Department said." FCW continues, "Justice said James Ancheta 20, of Downey, Calif, entered guilty pleas of conspiring to violate the Computer Fraud Abuse Act and causing damage to computers used in national defense." FCW adds, "Justice said the prosecution of Ancheta was the first of its kind in the United States against a hacker who used botnets, armies of computers infected with Trojan horse programs that allowed Ancheta to remotely control the computers. Justice said Ancheta controlled more than 400,000 computers as part of his botnet armies, which in turn infected other computers with unwanted adware."

Former Dietary Supplement Company Executives Admit $100 Million Mail Fraud. The AP (1/26) reports, "Former executives of a mail-order firm admitted that the company bilked buyers out of more than $100 million by charging credit cards without permission and offering refund guarantees it had no intention of honoring. Four former executives of Berkeley Premium Nutraceuticals Inc. detailed their involvement Wednesday with the Cincinnati-based company that sold vitamins and supplements for a variety of ills from fatigue to sexual disfunction. The four executives filed written statements as part of an agreement to plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati to charges of conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud. Federal agencies -- including the FBI, the Internal Revenue Service and the Food and Drug Administration -- have been investigating Berkeley." The AP adds, "The former executives said Berkeley's vitamins and supplements…weren't supported by strong medical proof, according to court documents."

Jury Convicts Palestinian Man Of Being Iraqi Agent. The AP (1/26, Callahan) reports, "Jurors on Wednesday convicted a Palestinian migrant accused of being an Iraqi agent on six federal charges but could not reach a decision on a charge that he tried to sell to Saddam Hussein's regime the names of U.S. operatives and agents." The AP continues, "Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, 53, showed little reaction as the federal jury returned its verdicts finding him guilty of six of seven counts, including acting as an unregistered foreign agent, violating sanctions against Iraq, conspiracy and witness tampering. … They could not decide his guilt on a charge of violating the International Emergency Economic Powers Act by allegedly trying in late 2002 to sell U.S. intelligence secrets to Iraq for $3 million. No evidence was presented during his trial, however, that he had access to that classified information. … U.S. District Judge John Tinder set sentencing for April 13 on the six convictions." The AP notes, "Shaaban represented himself during an 11-day trial that included testimony by a former Iraqi intelligence officer. He repeatedly contended that the government had confused him with a dead identical twin brother who worked for the CIA."

Three Kidnap Suspects Face Federal Charges In Ohio. Cox News Service (1/26, Giordano, Hardy) reports, "The FBI on Wednesday brought criminal charges against three people accused in the abduction, assault and robbery of a Miami University freshman." Cox continues, "Sidney R. Jones, 23, of Richmond, Ind.; Katrina L. Jones, 18, of Oxford; and Seth R. Jett, 21, of Richmond were turned over to federal custody Monday by local authorities, Special Agent Michael E. Brooks said. … The three had been detained at the Butler County Jail following their arrests Jan. 14 and 15 stemming from a case involving MU freshman Ryan Coli. … The charges were the result of a joint effort by the U.S. Marshals Service and the FBI in three states." Cox adds, "The three appeared Wednesday in U.S. District Court

(in Oxford, OH) where Magistrate Judge Timothy S. Hogan ordered them held pending a detention hearing Jan. 30, when the court will determine bond."

Supreme Court To Hear Lethal Injection Case.

The Washington Post (1/26, A3, Lane, 744K) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed yesterday to decide when death row inmates may challenge lethal injection as a method of capital punishment, in a surprise decision issued after the justices dramatically stopped the execution of a Florida prisoner who was already strapped to a gurney preparing to die." The High Court said it will hear convicted murderer Clarence Hill's "claim that he should have an opportunity to argue that his civil rights would be violated because the chemicals used to execute him would cause excessive pain. It is a claim that has been pressed with growing frequency by capital defense lawyers around the country in recent years -- but that has generally not yet succeeded, either in lower courts or at the Supreme Court."

The AP (1/26, Holland) reports, "Lethal injections are used in most states that have capital punishment, and there's been a growing dispute over the way they are carried out. … The Supreme Court has never found a specific form of execution to be cruel and unusual punishment, and the latest case from Florida does not give Court members that opportunity. The justices will, however, spell out what options are available to inmates with last-minute challenges to the way they will be put to death." The AP adds, "Florida inmate Clarence Hill, who filed the appeal, had been strapped to a gurney with intravenous lines running into his arms Tuesday night when he won a temporary Supreme Court stay, Hill's lawyer said. The stay was signed by Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. … The full Court announced Wednesday that the stay would be permanent until justices decide whether an appeals court was wrong to prevent Hill from challenging the lethal injection method. … The argument is expected April 26, with a ruling before July."

Texas Executes Man For 1992 Murders.

The Associated Press (1/25) reported that Marion Dudley, an "Alabama man who was part of a ring that shuttled drugs from Texas to his home state was executed [Wednesday] for the slayings of four people in Houston nearly 14 years ago." But the AP noted that Dudley maintained he wasn't at the house where the murders occurred the night of June 20, 1992, when "six people were shot, four of them fatally, in what authorities said was a drug dealer ripoff." Dudley was "the first Texas inmate put to death this year." The wire service added, "Besides Dudley, Arthur 'Squirt' Brown, of Tuscaloosa, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death. Now 35, he remains on death row. A third man, Tony Dunson, also from Alabama and 19 at the time of the shootings, received a life sentence."

ID Theft Complaints Rising, But Rate Of Increase Down.

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Conkey) reports, "Businesses, law-enforcement agencies and consumers may be beginning to turn the tide in the war against identity theft, data from the Federal Trade Commission suggest. Identity-theft complaints were up again last year to nearly 256,000, the FTC said, but that was only 3.5% higher than the year before. In 2004, complaints rose by 15% and in 2003 by 33%. … Industry officials and analysts say the development and widespread adoption of antifraud technologies are responsible for lower levels of card fraud." The article also said, "the FTC is expected to announce today tough action against" ChoicePoint Inc., which "is expected to agree to pay a multimillion-dollar penalty to settle alleged data-security violations stemming from a yearlong investigation by federal regulators, according to a person briefed on the matter."

Jury Reject Insanity Defense, Convicts Killer of Accused Pedophile Priest.

The New York Times (1/26, Zezima) reports, "Rejecting an insanity defense, a state jury on Wednesday convicted an inmate of the prison murder of John J. Geoghan, a defrocked priest who was accused of molesting 150 boys. … Judge Francis R. Fecteau of Worcester District Court sentenced the inmate, Joseph L. Druce, to life in prison without parole, in addition to the life sentence he is serving for another murder. … Prosecutors argued that Mr. Druce was a calculated killer who planned the murder for weeks and saw Mr. Geoghan as a trophy. But Mr. Druce's lawyer, John LaChance, painted his client as someone who 'never had a chance,' unwanted from birth and the victim of physical and sexual abuse for much of his childhood and teenage years."

Girl's Death Highlights "Dual-Track" Handling Of Abuse Reports.

The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Ridberg) reports, "Calls to New York's child-abuse hot line have spiked dramatically ever since Nixzmary Brown was buried." The Monitor notes that the girl, allegedly killed by her stepfather, "captured the hearts and minds of New Yorkers who never want to see such a tragedy happen again." However, the article says, "the city is left with the tall task of distinguishing the serious cases of abuse from reports of neglect. This is one of the most controversial challenges facing social welfare systems nationwide." The article says that some states have adopted a dual-track system that divides complaints "into two groups." This approach "aims to ease systems overburdened with poverty-related neglect reports and focus aggressive tactics on the rarer cases of abuse," the article says. It "has been adopted in various states, including Michigan, Missouri, Minnesota, and North Carolina. In Minnesota, one recent study shows the law improved the safety of children by providing better services for families such as food." However, the article notes, New York City fears that under a dual-track approach "an abused child may be handled as a neglect case."

Fairfax County, VA, Police "Accidentally" Shoot, Kill Optometrist Suspected Of Gambling. The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Jackman) reports, "Fairfax County's police chief said yesterday that one of his officers accidentally shot and killed an optometrist outside the unarmed man's townhouse Tuesday night as an undercover detective was about to arrest him on suspicion of gambling on sports. Police had been secretly making bets with Salvatore J. Culosi Jr., 37, since October as part of a gambling investigation, according to court records." In the incident, "Culosi came out of his townhouse on Cavalier Landing Court about 9:35 p.m. and was standing next to the detective's sport-utility vehicle, police said, when the detective gave a signal to tactical officers assembled nearby to move in and arrest Culosi. 'As they approached him . . . one officer's weapon, a handgun, was unintentionally discharged,' said Fairfax Police Chief David M. Rohrer. Culosi was not making any threatening moves when he was shot once in the upper part of his body, police said. He was taken to Inova Fairfax Hospital, where he was pronounced dead."

Crimes Prompt DC Police To Beef Up Presence In Neighborhood. The Washington Post (1/26, B1, Schwartzman) reports, "A spate of crimes outside Adams Morgan clubs and bars, including two assaults in which victims were left in critical condition, has prompted police to plan greater deployment in the area. … A business group plans to supplement the effort with a contingent of security guards and off-duty police to patrol the area on weekends, said Josh Gibson, executive director of Adams Morgan's newly formed business improvement district. Thousands of people pour into Adams Morgan on weekend nights, drawn by its cafes and clubs."

Father Charged With Gun Offenses In Daycare Shooting. The Washington Post (1/26, B1, Londoño) reports that John L. Hall, who is the "father of an 8-year-old boy arrested in the shooting of a 7-year-old girl at their Germantown day-care center provided his son with violent video games and showed him how to cock and release a gun hammer the day before the boy pulled the trigger, a prosecutor said yesterday" at Hall's bond hearing. The Post reports, "Hall's sister, Darlene Hall, 53, disputed the prosecutor's characterization of her brother's influence over the child." The article adds, "Montgomery District Court Judge Mary Beth McCormick reduced Hall's bond to $75,000 yesterday after authorities charged him Tuesday with leaving a firearm within reach of an unsupervised minor and two other gun charges."

NYTimes Columnist Pans Show About Innocence On Death Row. In a New York Times (1/26) column, Joshua Marquis disapproves of a new ABC drama called "In Justice." He writes, "'In Justice' has received dismal reviews. But that hasn't stopped its premise from permeating the conventional wisdom: that our prisons are chock-full of doe-eyed innocents who have been framed by venal prosecutors and corrupt police officers with the help of grossly incompetent public defenders." Calling this "a misconception that has run through our popular culture," Marquis notes that "only 14 Americans who were once on death row have been exonerated by DNA evidence alone. The hordes of Americans wrongfully convicted exist primarily on Planet Hollywood." Marquis says that it is "understandable that journalists focus on the rare case in which an innocent man or woman is sent to prison." However, he says, "The larger issue is whether those who influence the culture, like an enormous television network, have a moral responsibility to keep the facts straight regardless of their thirst for drama. 'In Justice' may soon find itself on the canceled list, but several million people will still have watched it, and they are likely to have the impression that wrongfully convicted death row inmates are the virtual rule."

Times Writer Wistful For Buttafuoco Era. In a New York Times (1/26) column, Lawrence Downes writes, "Before Angie and Brad, before Monica and Bill, there was Amy and Joey. Amy Fisher and Joey Buttafuoco — the Long Island Lolita and her body-shop lover — with Joey's wife, Mary Jo, formed a triangle of passion, obsession and violence that became the industry standard for tabloid crime way, way back in 1992. There is an entire generation, or at least a cohort, or maybe a handful, or at least one or two journalists who remember working on that day in May when the story broke, and who still marvel at how that strange crime — a housewife in a swanky suburb shot in the face — soon became much stranger. It swelled in significance until it made headlines coast to coast and around the globe. … I miss the Buttafuoco era. Joey and Amy were the Sid Caesar and Howdy Doody of reality TV, relics of a simpler time when crime sold newspapers — imagine that — and when the culture tended to look down on adultery and teenage prostitutes, and when attempted murder carried a hint of shame, which presumably was why Amy, in her perp walk, went to the trouble of hiding her face with her long brown hair."

CIVIL LAW:

Former Kentucky GE Plant Supervisor Files Whistleblower Suit. The AP (1/26) reports, "A former supervisor at a General Electric Co. plant has filed $50.5 million federal lawsuit that claims that he was fired for testifying that GE shipped defective parts to military and commercial customers." The AP continues, "James Richard Gardner, of Madisonville, filed the suit Friday in U.S. District Court in Louisville. Gardner said he repeatedly alerted managers at the Madisonville plant that engine turbine blades were not meeting company and government specifications and that defective parts were shipped with the knowledge of managers to meet production requirements." The AP adds, "Marta Rhyner, a GE spokeswoman, said she couldn't comment on specific allegations made in the lawsuit. She said the company is 'confident in the parts produced by our employees at Madisonville.' … The Defense Department began a criminal investigation at the plant in November 2000. The Justice Department is conducting a civil investigation."

Judge Rules Trustee Request Could Jeopardize Adelphia Bankruptcy. The New York Law Journal (1/26, Lin) reports, "In a decision released Wednesday in the Chapter 11 bankruptcy of cable company Adelphia Communications, the presiding judge said the motions by which one group of creditors sought the appointment of a trustee to oversee disputes and the disqualification of chief Adelphia bankruptcy counsel Willkie Farr & Gallagher constituted a 'nuclear war button' threatening obliteration of a crucial $17.6 billion deal." The Journal continues, "Southern District of New York Bankruptcy Judge Robert Gerber's strongly worded 113-page decision, In re Adelphia, 02-41729, previously filed under seal, clarified his order issued earlier in the week denying the appointment of a trustee but granting the disqualification of Willkie lawyers from participating in the disputes at issue. Willkie remains bankruptcy counsel to Adelphia. … Those disputes, which the requested trustee would have overseen, are between different groups of debt holders, all seeking to maximize their own claims on the bankruptcy estate, most of the assets of which are slated to be sold to rival cable companies Time Warner and Comcast for $17.6 billion." The Journal adds, "The potential appointment of a bankruptcy trustee is almost always controversial, as such trustees are usually granted broad-ranging powers to settle disputes or dispose of assets. … Gerber said the disqualification and trustee motions, brought in November by noteholders of Arahova, a subsidiary through which Adelphia issued some $540 million in debt, seemed designed to 'purposefully' imperil that sale as part of a 'scorched earth litigation strategy' aimed at extracting a larger distribution by threatening dire consequences for all."

GSA's Networx Contract Award Delayed By Unexpectedly High Number Of Bids. The Washington Post (1/26, D5, Mohammed, 744K) reports, "The General Services Administration said yesterday that it got more bids than expected for a $20 billion telecommunications contract known as Networx," a "10-year telecom contract, the largest ever to be awarded by the GSA," which is "forcing the agency to delay the award so it can evaluate the complex proposals."

Lockheed Loses Spy Plane Contract. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, A1, Karp, 2.11M) reports, "In 2004, Lockheed Martin Corp. won an Army spy-plane contract that broke with the past." Instead of building it, they "would serve as the 'lead integrator' -- stuffing somebody else's hardware with high-tech eavesdropping gear." However, "Lockheed engineers proved unable to load the airframe they were buying from Brazil with the equipment the Army wanted. Earlier this month, the Army scrapped Lockheed's contract," in "a setback for Chief Executive Robert Stevens and his young 'integrated solutions' division," and "a signal for the entire defense industry that de-emphasizing old-style hardware in favor of software and systems management isn't a sure path to success."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Virginia Likely To Vote On Gay Marriage Ban; Similar Measure Unveiled In Maryland. The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Jenkins, 744K) reports, "The state Senate all but guaranteed on Wednesday that Virginia will hold a November referendum on whether to amend its 230-year-old Bill of Rights to bar same-sex marriages. The Senate voted 28 to 11 to follow the House of Delegates in approving the amendment. Though each chamber still must pass the measure adopted by the other, their wording is identical and support among the senators and delegates is strong." Meanwhile, Maryland Republicans "introduced a similar measure in the Senate on Wednesday and said they believe they have the votes they need to bring the matter to an up-or-down vote, despite resistance from leaders of the Democrat-controlled legislature. In the wake of a circuit court ruling last week that declared Maryland's 33-year-old ban on same-sex marriage discriminatory, GOP leaders said it was important to at least put the matter to a vote."

The Washington Times (1/26, Bellantoni, Miller, 90K) notes that Maryland Democratic leaders "appear reluctant to put a constitutional amendment on the ballot because it could energize conservative voters in an election year in which Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, is seeking re-election, and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, also a Republican, is running for the U.S. Senate." The Times adds, "In Virginia, state Sen. Stephen D. Newman said the constitutional amendment is necessary to guard against 'aggressive' judges in other states, including Maryland, who are trying to redefine marriage. 'A few judges or a few localities are now presuming to change that fundamental meaning for our civilization and their actions have created confusion on the issue,' the Lynchburg Republican said. 'The federal courts are going to leave us with no other recourse.'"

FBI Mississippi SAC Says Report Could Rewrite Till Story. The AP (1/26) reports, "An FBI report on the decades-old murder of 14-year-old Emmett Till could rewrite the story of the slaying that put a young man's face on racial injustice in the South during that period." The AP adds that "some details of the crime could have been distorted or embellished over the past five decades, the FBI special agent in charge of Mississippi, John G. Raucci, told The Associated Press this week. 'The facts were told one way because that's the information that was available at the time,' Raucci said. 'And often times it's through urban legends and folklore -- and people who lived in the community pass along information from generation to generation -- and the next thing you know, they become fact.' Raucci did not rule out the possibility of indictments in the case or provide a timetable for releasing the report." The AP notes that the FBI report "should soon be turned over to District Attorney Joyce Chiles in Greenville. 'That does not necessarily mean that everybody involved in the Emmett Till case or the overt act is still alive or will one day be prosecuted,' Raucci said. … 'Evidence may no longer be available. Individuals who may have witnessed an event, time has now gotten the better of their minds.'"

FBI Reaching Out To NC Hispanics In New Human Trafficking Initiative. The Charlotte Observer (1/25, Ordoñez, 234K) reports that with funding from the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act, "The FBI is launching a new effort to raise awareness of human trafficking. Calling it an offense against humanity akin to modern-day slavery, the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Charlotte estimates thousands of victims are trafficked into the state each year for forced labor and prostitution. 'This is something that is flying under the radar,' said Special Agent Kevin Kendrick, who is heading the local campaign. … In conjunction with increased investigative efforts to shut down human trafficking rings, the FBI is teaming up with local advocacy groups and social organizations to get a message out that federal agents should be trusted and not feared. The FBI, Kendrick said, is looking to assist all victims of human trafficking, even if they're living in the country illegally. Not only will the FBI protect victims and their rights, Kendrick said, the agency also will help them remain permanently." The Observer adds, "'This is a reprehensible problem,' said Assistant Special Agent Robert Clifford. 'We'd look at every weapon in FBI's arsenal to countering human trafficking.' … 'We need to let people know it's OK to contact us,' Kendrick said. 'This is an affront against humanity. This goes far past someone's immigration status.'"

Georgia Lawmakers Approve Voter ID Bill. The AP (1/25) reports, "A birth certificate might not be enough to vote in Georgia this year - legislation sent to the governor Wednesday would require photo identification before voters could cast their ballots." The AP continues, "Gov. Sonny Perdue said he would sign it quickly to give counties time to prepare for the primary in July and the general election in November. … The U.S. Justice Department also must approve the requirement before it takes effect." The AP adds, "The legislation would require voters to have a driver's license, military ID or state-issued identification card with a photo. Social Security cards, birth certificates and utility bills would no longer be accepted. … Supporters said it would help fight voter fraud. Critics argued it would disenfranchise the poor, minorities or elderly - people who are less likely to have driver's licenses."

5th Circuit Rules Against Shreveport In Race Bias Suit. The Shreveport (LA) Times (1/26, McCabe) reports, "A federal appellate court changed its stance and ruled today in favor of plaintiffs in a discrimination lawsuit against the city of Shreveport and its Fire Department, overturning a lower court's decision to dismiss the five-year-old case." The Times continues, "The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals remanded the heart of the discrimination case back to U.S. District Court in Shreveport. … The petition originally was brought against the city in 2000 by Todd Dean, who was not hired by the Fire Department and felt the city's hiring practices discriminated against him because he is white. Dean earned a higher test score than some blacks hired then, his lawsuit alleges. Other men joined the lawsuit soon after." The Times adds, "The 5th Circuit's ruling should compel the city not only to cease race-based hiring procedures in all departments, but also to re-evaluate the continued validity of all city programs that incorporate race as a criteria for participation," said local attorney Pamela R. Jones, who represented Dean, Shawn Sanders and Jason Matthews in the lawsuit. … The department ended race-based hiring practices 11 months before a federal magistrate dismissed Dean's case in December 2004 hoping to avoid further lawsuits, according to officials. Now the department relies on a pass/fail civil service exam, the educational background and technical training of each candidate and psychological and physical ability exams. … The city has maintained that the Fire Department's hiring practices are based on a complaint brought by the U.S. Justice Department in 1980 that said the department had discriminated against blacks and women. Up to that point, the department had hired only three black men in its history, according to court records."

SIU Changes Web Descriptions Of Challenged Fellowships. The AP (1/26) reports, "While threatened with a federal lawsuit over three graduate fellowships the government considers discriminatory, Southern Illinois University has tweaked the descriptions of at least two of those scholarship programs on its Web site." The AP continues, "The fellowships at issue were said to specifically target minorities or 'underrepresented groups,' before the Justice Department objected last year, but the site now says those programs seek to help 'underserved' populations. … The revisions come as SIU administrators are weighing a Justice Department proposal that would head off a lawsuit threatened by the government, which in demanding that SIU discontinue the fellowship programs has accused the university of engaging in 'intentional discrimination against whites, non-preferred minorities and males.'" The AP adds, "The university has refused to publicly discuss the proposal it got from the Justice Department last week, saying only that administrators and key constituency groups were being tapped this week for feedback before the university responds. … David Gross, a spokesman for the SIU system, said Wednesday the Web site changes were done without the consent of the university's president, the Carbondale school's chancellor or the system's legal counsel and 'do not reflect the proposed offer from Department of Justice.'"

Judge Orders EEOC To Pay $1 Million To Law Firm For Frivolous Action. The AP (1/26) reports, "The U.S. Equal Opportunity Employment Commission must pay more than $1 million to a law firm that it sued unsuccessfully for allegations of sexual harassment and pregnancy discrimination, a federal judge has ruled." The AP continues, "The EEOC action was a 'frivolous' lawsuit against Robert L. Reeves & Associates, which practices immigration law, U.S. District Judge Dickran Tevrizian said in a ruling issued Monday." The AP adds, "Reeves maintained that the EEOC should have known the harassment and discrimination allegations the agency was pursuing were part of a scheme by two of his former law associates to destroy his firm, said a statement from lawyers representing Reeves. … The EEOC has already appealed the judge's findings, said Anna Park, the EEOC regional attorney in charge of the Los Angeles district office's legal division."

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Offers To Release Part of Its Source Code In EU Antitrust Case. The Financial Times (1/26, Buck) reports, "Microsoft made a concession in its six-year dispute with European competition regulators on Wednesday by offering to give rivals access to parts of its Windows source code. With only three weeks until a compliance deadline set by Brussels, which had threatened fines of €2m ($2.5m) a day, Brad Smith, the group's general counsel, said: 'We are putting our most valuable intellectual property on the table.' … Microsoft's offer … came in response to a European Commission warning last month that it would impose fines unless the software group complied quickly with Brussels' 2004 antitrust ruling against the US group. The daily fines would come on top of the record €497m payment the Commission ordered in 2004. The regulator said Microsoft had failed to comply with a part of the ruling requiring the software group to share information about its Windows operating system."

The USA Today (1/26, Acohido) reports, "The European Commission issued a terse statement saying it would 'study carefully' Microsoft's announcement 'once it has received the full details.' … This is not the first time Microsoft has let outsiders view such code. It has granted governments, academics and business partners varying levels of access under tight restrictions."

Reuters (1/25, Lawsky, Zawadzki) reports, "Critics of Microsoft contend that protocols are standard software and that Microsoft has used what is essentially a digital combination lock to make them inaccessible. … A Commission spokesman said if that turns out to be true then Microsoft has no right to charge for them. … However, Microsoft says that the protocols include valuable patents and that it should be able to charge for their use, an argument under review at the Commission."

The AP (1/25) reports, "The company's chief counsel, Brad Smith, said sharing the part of the Windows workgroup server operating system and desktop software code that helps rival PCs communicate with Windows servers was 'a bold stroke' that should answer both EU and U.S. regulators' concerns. .. He insisted that Microsoft had already complied in December with an EU order to supply technical information by handing over up to 12,000 pages of documentation and offering 500 hours of free technical support to rivals worth some $100,000. … An independent monitor nominated by Microsoft found last month that the documents were 'totally unfit for its intended purpose.'"

Move Comes After Justice Department Complaints. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Jacoby) reports, "The move came after the Justice Department complained in a court filing this week about Microsoft's compliance with U.S. legal requirements -- and six years after a U.S. judge found Microsoft violated the Sherman Antitrust Act against monopoly abuse. The Justice Department said the Redmond, Wash., software giant had provided inaccurate information to a technical committee, and described one incident as 'particularly troubling' because it delayed an investigative team that had traveled to India. The filing also said the company had 'fallen significantly behind' in complying with monitors' technical requests. … In 2001, the Bush administration dropped the U.S. government's case against Microsoft, but ordered it to change certain anticompetitive practices."

Guidant Accepts Boston Scientific's Takeover Offer. USA Today (1/26, Iwata) reports, "Medical device maker Guidant on Wednesday accepted Boston Scientific's $27 billion bid, rebuffing a lower offer from Johnson & Johnson and ending a long-running takeover war." USA continues, "The companies have been vying for an edge in the growing multibillion-dollar market for medical and heart devices, and Guidant's pacemakers, defibrillators and stents made it an attractive acquisition target. … The merger, to be completed early this year, will make Boston Scientific the world's No. 2 maker of implantable pacemakers and defibrillators. Boston Scientific also will gain share in the market for heart stent devices, which hold open blood vessels." USA adds, "Most Wall Street analysts and some Guidant investors had urged Guidant to take the pricier Boston Scientific offer, calling it a better long-term investment than J&J's deal. The combined company will have $9 billion in revenue in 2006, Boston Scientific says. … To help close the deal and appease antitrust regulators, Boston Scientific teamed with Abbott Laboratories. Abbott will pay Boston Scientific $6.4 billion in cash to buy Guidant's vascular intervention and endovascular businesses." … Approvals are needed from U.S. and European regulators, plus shareholders for both companies."

The New York Times (1/26, Feder) reports, "For Johnson & Johnson, Tuesday started with a morning conference call with analysts to discuss earnings and ended with William C. Weldon, the company's chief executive, and Robert J. Darretta Jr., the chief financial officer, attending a dinner for several dozen institutional investors at the '21' Club in New York. Throughout the day and evening, the company maintained a rigid silence about the one subject on everyone's mind — whether it would respond to a midnight deadline to counter Boston Scientific's bold $27 billion offer for Guidant." The Times notes that Johnson & Johnson released a statement yesterday "saying the company had 'determined not to increase its last offer for Guidant Corporation, because to do so would not have been in the best interest of its shareholders.' About the only comment was its reminder that Guidant was obliged to pay it a $705 million breakup fee by today. … It was a remarkably quiet conclusion to the biggest and most contentious takeover battle yet in the medical device industry. The outcome leaves Boston Scientific as the apparent winner of Guidant, the No. 2 company in the $10 billion market for defibrillators and other implantable devices that regulate human heartbeats."

BlackBerry Injunction Hearing Set For Feb. 24. The Wall Street Journal (1/26) reports, "BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. and NTP Inc. will appear in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia Feb. 24 for the court to consider a shutdown of U.S. sales and service of the popular wireless email device. In recent court filings, RIM, based in Waterloo, Ontario, argued a BlackBerry shutdown isn't warranted for various reasons, including recent preliminary moves by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office to reject NTP's wireless email patents. NTP, a Virginia patent holding concern, argues a BlackBerry shutdown is appropriate, since the court has already found RIM infringed on NTP's patents and case law calls for such a shutdown. The court could rule on the injunction as early as Feb. 24 or in the days following, an NTP lawyer said."

NYTimes Says Pixar-Disney Deal Is Chance To Reform Disney's Creative Culture. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) editorializes, "A company like" Pixar "— and a figure like Mr. Jobs, notable for his dynamic role at both Apple and Pixar — doesn't let itself be bought for money alone, though the money is certainly enticing enough. This is really an opportunity to infect, and change, the creative culture of Disney, which, back in its founder's day, used to be one of the most creative places around" but whose "animated films have been nothing to shout about in the past decade or so." For Pixar and Apple the deal has "only an upside," and "the same is true for Disney, especially if it keeps shedding the ways of Mr. Eisner's old company and allows itself to become what may turn out to be, in the end, Mr. Jobs's company after all."

Three ELF Activists Indicted On Ecoterror Charges In California. Reuters (1/26, Fitzgerald) reports, "A federal grand jury indicted three alleged 'eco-terrorists' on Wednesday on charges of plotting to blow up facilities like dams and cell phone towers. 'These three individuals planned to commit a number of dangerous and destructive acts in our region, all in the name of the Environmental Liberation Front,' U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott told a news conference in the California state capital." Eric McDavid, Zachary Jenson and Lauren Weiner were "arrested January 13 outside a retail store in Auburn, California, following six months of surveillance of McDavid by federal authorities. … The charges were not related to a separate 65-count indictment handed down on Monday in Washington involving 11 environmental and animal rights activists in the Western United States." Scott "said the trio rented a house east of Sacramento in the foothills where they engaged in bomb-making. At some point, the three were joined by an unnamed woman who was a government informant. 'Because of the exceptional work of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and the brave efforts of a confidential source they were prevented from carrying out their planned attacks,' the U.S. Attorney said."

EPA Seeks Ban On Chemicals Used In Cookware. USA Today (1/26, Weise) reports, "In a surprise turn Wednesday, the Environmental Protection Agency moved to eliminate the production of a suspected carcinogen used in the making of Teflon and other non-stick and non-stain coatings. The EPA has asked eight manufacturers that use a family of chemicals known as perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA, to reduce production 95% by 2010 and to stop using it altogether by 2015. … Environmentalists and consumer groups have long dogged the agency to act. 'The science is still coming in, but the concern is there, so acting now to minimize future releases of PFOA is the right thing to do for our environment and our health'" says Susan Hazen of EPA's Office of Prevention, Pesticides and Toxic Substances." According to the article, "EPA officials are calling for voluntary PFOA cutbacks because 'under the Toxic Substances Control Act, they don't have authority to ban it,' says Richard Wiles of the Environmental Working Group, a public interest group that has long fought to bring public attention to PFOA in the environment." Wiles says that if the chemicals are phased out, it "will be 'the single biggest action the agency has ever taken.'"

The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Eilperin) reports favorable coverage of the EPA for this action. It quotes Ken Cook, president of the Environmental Working Group, who says, "'This is one of those days when the Environmental Protection Agency is at its best. With its announcement today, the EPA is challenging an entire industry to err on the side of precaution and public safety, and invent new ways of doing business. … As harshly as we have singled out DuPont for criticism for its past handling of PFOA pollution, today we want to single out and commend the company and acknowledge its leadership going forward."

DuPont Targeted. USA Today and the Post both note that DuPont was a particular target in the PFOA deal. In the first paragraph of its story, The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Eilperin) says, "Eight U.S. companies, including giant DuPont Co., agreed yesterday to virtually eliminate a harmful chemical used to make Teflon from all consumer products coated with the ubiquitous nonstick material." Both the Post and USA Today note that DuPont recently agreed to a $6.5 million settlement with the EPA over charges that it hid information about the dangers of PFOA.

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 7, 2:50, Vargas) reported, "Today, the government asked companies to virtually eliminate" a chemical used to make Teflon "over the next nine years." Ross: "Today, the Federal government said DuPont had virtually agreed to eliminate any new emissions of the key Teflon chemical at its factories." Susan Hazen EPA: "This is the right thing to do. And we are going to move forward with it." The New York Times (1/26, Janofsky, 1.19M) adds, "DuPont immediately pledged to join the" voluntary program," along with "3M/Dyneon, Arkema, Asahi, Ciba, Clariant, Daikin and Solvay Solexis." The EPA says that "full compliance by the companies and their overseas affiliates would lead to a 95 percent reduction by 2010 in use of the substance, perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA, and to their total elimination by 2015."

Video Highlights Problems With Federal Mine Safety Oversight. NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 8, 2:30, Williams) reported, "Those two West Virginia mining disasters have now focused a lot of attention on mine safety in this country." A videotape tape shows "the perils of digging for coal. And the often lax oversight of this nation's mines." NBC (Myers) added, "This is the inside of Coal Creek Mine in southeastern Kentucky. Videotaped by a miner who smuggled a camera into work in June 2004 to document what he said were dangerous conditions." Edwin Pennington "is crushed under this slab of rock 200 feet long." One "safety official who investigated Pennington's death says his tragedy underscores a widespread problem in mines across the country. He says fines are too small to induce companies to fix hazards and the entire system has no teeth." Tony Oppegard, former Mine Safety & Health official: "The company has been going on about its business for the last year and a half without any consequences thus far."

Bush To Push For Reprocessing Of Spent Nuclear Fuel. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Fialka, 2.11M) reports, "The Bush administration plans to announce a $250 million initiative to reprocess spent nuclear fuel, a first step toward reversing a 1970s policy that rejected reprocessing as too dangerous to pursue." The Administration's "decision to put the money into its fiscal 2007 budget to test new technologies is part of an effort to jump-start the nuclear-power industry at a time when energy prices are high and concerns about global warming make nuclear power plants more acceptable." The Journal adds, "According to nuclear industry officials and others briefed on the proposal in recent weeks, the program could be announced as early as next week in President Bush's State of the Union address. If the technology works, it could vastly reduce the amount of spent nuclear waste that would have to be buried in underground storage, such as at Nevada's Yucca Mountain, set to open after 2012."

The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Baker, Linzer, 744K) adds the fuel proposal "is part of a broader push by the president for domestic and global nuclear energy. With worldwide energy demands on the rise and U.S. reliance on foreign oil increasing, Bush has held out nuclear power as a solution that will not affect global warming."

Gore Documentary On Global Warming Has Premiere At Sundance Festival. The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Booth, 744K) reports that ex-Vice President Al Gore's documentary on global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth," "had its world premiere at the Sundance Film Festival on Tuesday night before an enthusiastic audience that gave the former vice president and his movie a big standing O. Among the film's lessons: Earth's glaciers are melting, the polar bears are screwed, each year sets new heat records." The Post notes, "The core of the film is a one-man, ever-evolving multimedia slide show that Gore assembled himself. A little-known fact: Since his defeat by George W. Bush in 2000, Gore has traveled the globe with his bar graphs, staging event after event for small, invited audiences. Free of charge. And he's presented one version or another of this slide show, by his own estimation, a thousand times. … In the film, Gore presents the latest evidence to demonstrate how the accumulation of carbon dioxide and other pollutants of the industrial age are increasing temperatures."

Mueller Recuses Himself From Trade School Probe. Under the headline "F.B.I. Director Recused From Investigation Of Weld's Former School," The New York Times (1/26, Healy, 1.19M) reports in "Metro Briefing" that "The F.B.I. director will not play a role in the inquiry into Decker College, the Kentucky school once run by William F. Weld, because the director and Mr. Weld, a Republican candidate for governor, are friends and former colleagues, an F.B.I. spokesman said yesterday. … The New York Democratic Party had asked that Mr. Mueller recuse himself, according to a party spokesman. Mr. Weld has not been accused of any wrongdoing involving Decker, which declared bankruptcy last fall amid allegations of fraud."

Under the headline "Weld's Pal Off Inquiry," The New York Post (1/25, Dicker, 624K) reported yesterday, "FBI spokesman Richard Kolko told The Post that while the Decker probe was being handled by the special agent in charge of the Louisville, Ky., field office, Mueller himself is 'regularly briefed on significant investigations and cases.' And while Kolko insisted Mueller 'has not had a role in directing any part of this investigation,' he said, 'since the issue has been raised publicly, and to avoid even the appearance of any conflict, any decisions that would otherwise be made by the director in this matter will, instead, be handled by Deputy Director John Pistole.' Kolko's announcement came a few hours after state Democratic Chairman Herman 'Denny' Farrell joined D'Amato in urging Mueller to step aside. … Farrell said Weld and Mueller were 'good friends' during the 1980s when both served in the U.S. Attorney's office in Boston. He said Mueller had also contributed to Weld's unsuccessful U.S. Senate campaign against incumbent John Kerry of Massachusetts in 1996."

Minnesota Attorney Charged In Internet Pharmacy Scheme. The AP (1/26) reports, "A lawyer has been indicted (in Minneapolis) on federal charges alleging he helped an Internet pharmacy illegally obtain narcotics and helped its founder hide assets." The AP continues, "Daniel Adkins, who was general counsel for Xpress Pharmacy Direct, helped deceive legitimate pharmacies into supplying the narcotics that Xpress hawked over the Internet and by telephone, according to the indictment issued Tuesday." The AP adds, 'Federal authorities say Xpress filled about 72,000 illegal prescriptions for pain killers and other controlled substances, generating sales of about $20 million. Authorities shut down Xpress last May and company founder Christopher Smith, his accountant and a doctor who issued prescriptions were indicted in August. … The indictment alleges that Adkins helped Smith hide assets after they learned about the investigation. It also alleges that Adkins wrote to legitimate pharmacies from which Xpress ordered drugs, assuring them that Xpress was 'both legal and authorized by federal and state statutes.' … Adkins was charged with conspiracy to distribute and dispense controlled substances, wire fraud; unlawful distribution and dispensing of controlled substances and misbranding drugs. If convicted of wire fraud he could face up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine, the U.S. attorney's office said."

Drug Ring's Alleged Second-In-Command Pleads Guilty. The Knoxville (TN) News-Sentinel (1/26, Satterfield) reports, "Admitting crimes that could lock him away for life made Stephen 'Black' Ardis downright scared Wednesday. Ardis, who was captured on secret recordings expressing worries that an undercover agent he dubbed

'Superman' was on his trail, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to being second-in-command of a Detroit-to-Knoxville drug running operation. But the 26-year-old drug slinger made it clear before entering his plea that a possible life sentence was a scary proposition he wanted to avoid. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck said the massive amount of drugs Ardis conspired to put onto Knoxville's streets guarantees the Detroit man a 20-year prison term. … The drug ring was broken in November after a probe led by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Todd Lee and Knoxville Police Department Investigator Bruce Conkey. It was Conkey whom Ardis dubbed 'Superman' in a conversation secretly recorded by the agents during their investigation."

Prosecutor Delays Charges In Washington Bomb Case. The Tri-City (WA) Herald (1/25, Trumbo) reports, "Benton County prosecutors will need several weeks to decide potential charges against a Richland man who says he kept bomb-making material because he is a miner." The Herald continues, "Kevin D. Johnson, 49, was released from jail Friday, three days after Richland police arrested him at his home where they seized gunpowder, nitro-methane and about 20 pounds of ammonium nitrate. They also found six firearms." The Herald adds, "Prosecutor Andy Miller said Tuesday that no charges were filed during the 72-hour hold on Johnson because more investigation is needed. Items taken from the home also have to be analyzed by agents of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, he said. … 'To prove the elements of the case, we'd have to get the ATF to test the items,' Miller said. … Richland police Capt. Mike Cobb said an ATF agent told him Tuesday analysis of the items found at Johnson's home would be completed in two to four weeks. … Cobb said the investigation also involves 91 blasting caps that allegedly belonged to Johnson that were found Jan. 15 at a home in Franklin County. Cobb said officers discovered the caps in a closet of a man's home after they investigated a domestic violence complaint."

IMMIGRATION:

Daughter Of Former Chilean Dictator Pinochet May Seek Asylum In US. Reuters (1/26) reports, "The eldest daughter of former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet on Wednesday asked the United States to grant her political asylum after she fled tax charges in Chile, Chilean officials said." Reuters continues, "Lucia Pinochet Hiriart, 60, was being moved to an immigration detention center late on Wednesday after spending most of the day at Dulles International Airport near Washington, Chile's Foreign Relations Minister Ignacio Walker told local radio in Santiago. … Earlier, Interior Minister Francisco Vidal said Chile had been told that Pinochet Hiriart had asked for asylum. … 'In the coming two or three days we will have a decision from the United States which, I insist, will be a rejection (of asylum),' Walker said." Reuters adds, "U.S. officials would not confirm that Pinochet Hiriart had requested asylum. … 'Lucia Pinochet is currently in U.S. Customs and Border Protection custody at Dulles International Airport, pending resolution of her immigration status,' said Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security. … Pinochet Hiriart has been charged with tax fraud related to some $1 million in undeclared taxes and falsification of documents as part of a widening tax evasion and fraud investigation involving the Pinochet family."

Jury Finds "Survivor" Winner Hatch Guilty Of Tax Evasion. The AP (1/26, Henry) reports, "Richard Hatch, who won $1 million in the debut season of the reality show 'Survivor,' was found guilty Wednesday of failing to pay taxes on his winnings and taken straight to jail." The AP continues, "Hatch remained calm as the court clerk read the verdict. He waved goodbye to family members, then was handcuffed and taken into custody after U.S. District Judge Ernest Torres said he was a potential flight risk. … The charges carry up to 13 years in prison. Torres said he expected a sentence of between 33 months and 41 months, but said the time could be longer because prosecutors say Hatch committed perjury. Sentencing was scheduled for April 28." The AP adds, "Hatch, 44, was also convicted of evading taxes on $327,000 he earned as co-host of a Boston radio show and $28,000 in rent on property he owned. He was acquitted of seven bank, mail and wire fraud charges related to a charity, Horizon Bound, he planned to open for troubled youth. … Hatch's lawyer, John MacDonald, said he would appeal the verdict. He said Hatch was aware of the possibility of jail time."

Former Washington Man Wanted On Tax Charge Captured In Panama. The Puget Sound (WA) Business Journal (1/26) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice said Wednesday that former Renton resident David Struckman has been captured in Panama. Struckman had been charged by the Internal Revenue Service for running an operation that promoted tax-avoidance plans." He was arrested in Panama earlier this month and deported, the department said, and will be transported to Western Washington." The Journal adds, "The government alleges that Struckman and four others sold 'Global Prosperity' wealth-building products, including videotapes, CDs and seminars, which 'included fraudulent methods of income tax elimination.' .. The seminars cost as much as $37,000 to attend and, according to the government, the group then concealed income earned from the products by using bogus trusts and offshore bank accounts."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Full Senate Begins Debate On Alito Confirmation. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "The full Senate debate is under way on Samuel Alito's nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court. A day after the judiciary committee cast the divided vote over Alito, Republicans and Democrats are voicing fierce support and opposition to the President's choice for the high court." Alito "met today with Republicans senators whose majority votes are expected to seal his confirmation despite strong Democratic opposition."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 3, 1:00, Williams) reported, "As the full Senate began debating his Supreme Court nomination, Judge Samuel Alito took something of a pre-victory lap on Capitol Hill, thanking Republicans who helped move his nomination to the expected finish line. On the Senate floor, Democrats continued to call him a bad choice, while Republicans praised him." Currently, "Alito has enough support to be confirmed right now."

The AP (1/26, Holland) also says Alito "took a victory lap in the Senate on Wednesday, accepting congratulations from Republican leaders as lawmakers moved toward confirming him in a largely party-line vote." Reuters (1/26) adds Alito "appeared to have the votes for confirmation…as the Senate began a bitter debate."

The Washington Times (1/26, Hurt, 90K) says Republicans "rounded up the 60 votes they need to block any attempt to filibuster his nomination." Meanwhile, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy "called the vote on the nomination 'the vote of a generation.'"

Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Angle) reported, "Though Alito appears to be on track for confirmation and though it appears Democrats aligned against Alito do not have the votes to sustain a filibuster, Virginia's Republican Senator George Allen felt it necessary to issue a warning today." Allen: "My reaction is if they move forward with such a filibuster, my reaction is, 'make my day.' We will enjoy pulling the constitutional trigger to allow Judge Alito a fair up-or-down vote."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 6, 1:15, Vargas) reported, "Senators were divided along party lines." Sen. Hillary Clinton: "Roe v. Wade is at-risk. The privacy of Americans is at-risk. Environmental safeguards, laws that protect workers from abuse or negligence. Laws, even, that keep machine guns off the streets. All these and many other, are imperiled." Sen. Edward Kennedy: "The record demonstrates that we cannot count on Judge Alito to blow the whistle when the President is out of bounds. He is a long-standing advocate of expanding executive power." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist: "Judge Alito deserves to become Justice Alito. And those who oppose him are smearing a decent and honorable man and posing an unfair political standard on all judicial nominees."

Bush Meets With Alito's Former Clerks. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported the President met "with about 40 people, Republicans and Democrats, who've clerked for Judge Alito. It is another attempt to drive home the administration's insistence that Alito is qualified and deserves a quick and fair up or down Senate vote."

Novak Says Red State Democrats Who Oppose Alito Regret Vote. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (1/26) writes that Sens. Kent Conrad and Byron Dorgan of North Dakota, "Bill Nelson of Florida, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, Ken Salazar of Colorado, Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, and Mark Pryor and Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas are red state Democrats who voted to confirm Chief Justice John Roberts. While Roberts is no less conservative than Alito…these Democrats who voted for the chief justice have been under intense pressure from the left to oppose Alito. All such senators may be willing to risk a politically unpopular 'no' vote, partly thanks to disappointing Senate Republican candidate recruitment this year." Novak notes, "The contention that President Bush's nominee is outside the 'mainstream' is the major talking point against Alito, but polls show support for him and his endorsement of spousal abortion notification. That debate's outcome may determine whether senators who vote against Alito will suffer at the polls this year and in the years ahead."

NYTimes Urges Democrats To Filibuster Alito's Nomination. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) editorialized that Alito's "elevation will come courtesy of a president whose grandiose vision of his own powers threatens to undermine the nation's basic philosophy of government --- and a Senate that seems eager to cooperate by rolling over and playing dead. It is hard to imagine a moment when it would be more appropriate for senators to fight for a principle. Even a losing battle would draw the public's attention to the import of this nomination." The Times adds, "Senate Democrats, who presented a united front against the nomination of Judge Alito in the Judiciary Committee, seem unwilling to risk the public criticism that might come with a filibuster -- particularly since there is very little chance it would work. Judge Alito's supporters would almost certainly be able to muster the 60 senators necessary to put the nomination to a final vote. A filibuster is a radical tool. It's easy to see why Democrats are frightened of it. But from our perspective, there are some things far more frightening. One of them is Samuel Alito on the Supreme Court."

Roberts, Alito Appointments Called Bush's Greatest Domestic Successes Since 2003. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) editorializes, "With at least 52 Senators already on record in support, it's clear that -- short of some smear ex machina -- liberal Democrats can't stop Samuel Alito from being confirmed to a seat on the Supreme Court. So it's a good moment to consider what this says about our politics and what it means for the Court as it enters a new era. One conclusion is that the confirmation of both Chief Justice John Roberts and Judge Alito marks the most important domestic success for President Bush since his 2003 tax cuts." The "Alito-Roberts ascendancy also marks a victory for the generation of legal conservatives who earned their stripes in the Reagan Administration. … The Roberts-Alito Court also represents a notable, and greatly satisfying, rebuke for the legal left and its 'borking' strategy."

Bush Resubmits Nominee Previously Blocked By Democrats. The Washington Post (1/26, A3, Babington, 744K) reports the White House "renominated Brett M. Kavanaugh to the US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. President Bush nominated Kavanaugh, the White House staff secretary, in July 2003, but he fell victim to intense battles between Senate Democrats and Republicans over numerous judicial appointments. A May 2005 bipartisan pact averted a showdown over judicial filibusters and enabled some contested nominees to win confirmation. But it left Kavanaugh in limbo." The Senate Judiciary Committee's eight Democrats "complained last year that Kavanaugh took several months to answer their written questions about his qualifications. Other Democrats have noted that Kavanaugh, 40, has limited courtroom experience and helped independent counsel Kenneth W. Starr pursue the Monica S. Lewinsky case during the Clinton presidency."

Abramoff Prosecutor Among Nominees To Federal Bench. The AP (1/26) reports, "President Bush on Wednesday nominated one of the Justice Department's lead prosecutors in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe to a U.S. District Court seat." The AP continues, "Noel Hillman, chief of the department's public integrity section, was nominated for the federal judgeship in New Jersey, where he served in the U.S. Attorney's office under Michael Chertoff, now secretary of Homeland Security." The AP adds, "The White House was poised to nominate Hillman last summer, after New Jersey's two Democratic senators took the opportunity to weigh in on Hillman and other nominees in exchange for lifting their objections to another candidate Bush had nominated in 2003. … Hillman will step down as chief of the public integrity unit next week, but remain in the Justice Department's criminal division until he is confirmed, a department official said. Andrew Lourie, a career prosecutor in Miami, will lead the public corruption-fighting office on a temporary basis, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss personnel matters. … Lourie performed the same role until Hillman took over early in 2003."

Bush Suggests Government Will Not Bail Out GM And Ford. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Cooper, McKinnon, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush said General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. should develop 'a product that's relevant' rather than look to Washington for help with their heavy pension obligations, and hinted he would take a dim view of a government bailout of the struggling auto makers." In an Oval Office interview, Bush "said that his administration has discussed the development of new fuel technologies with the nation's top two auto makers, which might make them more competitive, but that he has had no talks about the companies' finances." Asked if he had spoken to GM Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner or Ford Chairman and CEO William Clay Ford Jr., Mr. Bush replied, "Not about their balance sheets. … And I haven't been asked by any automobile manufacturer about a bailout." Asked if the government should take "any pre-emptive action," he said, "I think it's very important for the market to function." Bush "suggested he felt optimistic about the companies' prospects."

WPost Says Detroit, Congress Should Embrace "Competition." In an editorial titled "Managing Detroit," the Washington Post (1/26, A24, 744K) says, "It's not clear whether the GM and Ford restructuring plans will be enough to avert bankruptcy. Their difficulties may take on a more political tone, particularly since the Midwest is a key battleground for presidential campaign strategists." But "Congress needs to keep Motown's troubles in perspective. They are the result of competitive pressures that most parts of the US economy take for granted every day. And it is precisely by embracing competition that the United States has become the world's most powerful economy."

Bush Unlikely To Push Large Initiatives In State Of The Union Speech. The New York Times (1/26, Stevenson, 1.19M) reports, "Having stabilized his political standing after a difficult 2005, President Bush is heading into his State of the Union address on Tuesday intent primarily on retaining his party's slim majority in Congress this year and completing unfinished business from his existing agenda." Unlike last year, "when he used the occasion to kick off an ambitious and ultimately failed effort to overhaul Social Security, Mr. Bush seems unlikely to reshape the political landscape with his speech on Tuesday, members of both parties said." The Times adds, "Administration officials and other Republicans in Washington said Mr. Bush would focus on several topics, including health care, spending restraint, illegal immigration and the nation's international economic competitiveness, as well as an unapologetic restatement of his national security policy. Much of the speech, they said, will be tied together under a broad theme acknowledging that the United States is going through transitions that involve wrenching dislocation as well as opportunity." His aides "portray Mr. Bush as undaunted by the plague of setbacks last year that loosened his grip on his party and drove down his poll numbers, which although up from their lows last fall remain at anemic levels."

Bush Urged To Tackle Medicare Reform. David Gratzer, a physician and senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M), "Bush will cite rising health costs as a major problem for Americans and their businesses, and he will outline steps to strengthen health savings accounts as a remedy." But "he is unlikely to mention Medicare reform -- and that would be a mistake. Indeed, if the president is serious about health reform, he will have to tackle Medicare. And he can start by re-engaging a debate from 1999." Seven years ago, Sen. John Breaux and Rep. Bill Thomas "completed the final report of the National Bipartisan Commission on the Future of Medicare. Considering various reforms, they eventually settled on a proposal modeled after the popular Federal Employees Health Benefits Plan (FEHBP), which covers nine million federal employees and their families. Instead of today's one-size-fits-all Medicare structure, they envisioned a program where seniors choose among competing private plans. Since then, Washington has debated the size and scope of Medicare expansion -- such as the prescription benefit -- but the program itself has yet to be fundamentally rethought." It "needs to be, because faced with Medicare's rising costs over the past four decades, the only real response has been a bipartisan exercise in wage and price controls."

Protestors Sue For Spot During State Of The Union. The Washington Post (1/26, A6, Barker, 744K) reports, "Organizers planning a protest during President Bush's State of the Union address next week say they have been denied a permit to hold the demonstration around the U.S. Capitol Reflecting Pool because that area has been reclassified as part of the security perimeter for the day of the speech. The organizers of the Tuesday protest, called 'World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime,' say the National Park Service and the U.S. Capitol Police initially offered them the Capitol Reflecting Pool as a demonstration site but changed their minds. Demonstrators have been told to confine their gathering to the gravel walkways on the Mall between Third and Fourth streets, farther from the Capitol. The grassy areas are fenced off because they are being resodded." Travis Morales, one of the organizers of the demonstration, "said the group was offered use of the area around the Capitol Reflecting Pool on Jan. 10 and that the site was not then part of any security perimeter. But on Jan. 19, he said, the group was told the security area had been expanded to include the Reflecting Pool. He called the change 'politically motivated,' adding that the Bush administration 'is trying to push us so far away that we can't be seen or heard. … A protest not seen and a protest not heard is not a protest.'" The demonstrators "filed a federal lawsuit yesterday seeking a court order that would enable them to gather at the Capitol Reflecting Pool. U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina will convene a hearing, possibly today."

Many Liberals Upset Kaine Was Chosen To Respond To Bush.

USA Today (1/26, Lawrence, 2.31M) reports, "Virginia Gov. Timothy Kaine lifted the Democratic Party's spirits last fall when he won in a conservative state and gave his fellow Democrats some ideas about how to replicate his success. The fruits of victory include the honor of being picked to respond to President Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday -- and the wrath of liberal bloggers wondering why Democrats didn't choose somebody else. Anybody else." The selection of Kaine, "a Roman Catholic who opposes gay marriage -- highlighted fault lines within the party. Bloggers on several liberal websites were furious for reasons including Kaine's looks, style and obscurity, his open talk about religion, his moderate positions and his inexperience in foreign affairs. 'What the hell are they thinking?' Arianna Huffington demanded on www.huffingtonpost.com. … Bloggers at dailykos.com, talkleft.com and other liberal sites showered cyberspace with alternatives: new faces — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer -- and famous faces -- Al Gore, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton."

Villaraigosa To Give Spanish-Language Response. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Chen, 958K) reports, "Congressional Democrats announced today that Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa will deliver the party's Spanish-language response to next week's State of the Union address. … This will be the third consecutive year that Democrats have offered a Spanish language response to Bush's speech. Two years ago, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico delivered the first such response. Last year, it was jointly given by then Rep. Robert Menendez, now a senator from New Jersey, and Sen. Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) added "Villaraigosa's remarks clearly will be aimed at helping Democrats reach out to Hispanic voters right here in the United States."

Effectiveness Of Health Savings Accounts Disputed. The New York Times (1/26, Freudenheim, 1.19M) reports, "Bush has made 'consumer-directed' health savings plans a cornerstone of his policy for addressing runaway medical costs, and he plans to push them again in the State of the Union address next week." But "so far there is little evidence that the approach is helping many consumers come to grips with the high price of health care," even though "the early results do offer some hope. More than two million people have signed up for the plans, which were created as part of Medicare overhaul legislation in 2003 but were not an option for many people until the health insurance sign-up season last fall. While that is a tiny fraction of the 180 million Americans with health insurance, some experts say the numbers show a notably fast adoption rate for a complicated new consumer program. By other measures, though, workers and employers have been slow to embrace health savings plans, which are intended to reduce corporate health care costs while giving individuals more control of their medical spending."

In his Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M), David Wessel criticizes Bush's "cure-all for health care," saying Bush argues for making "health care more like the market for tile and pipes." Adds Wessel, "Set aside the case that only a taxpayer-financed, government-organized solution works. A Republican president and Congress aren't going there, and a lot of Democrats are skeptical, too. … A bigger problem is that too many healthy (for now) Americans go without preventive care, and too many chronically ill Americans don't get care that would avoid costly, painful complications later. HSAs don't help there. And then there's the uncomfortable fact that 80% of health spending in the U.S. each year is spent on 8% of the population. Giving them tax breaks to buy health-insurance policies with $2,000 deductibles won't ensure that money is well spent."

Robert J. Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (1/26, 744K), "Americans want more health care for less money, and when they don't get it, they indict drug companies, insurers, trial lawyers and bureaucrats. Although these familiar scapegoats may not be blameless, the real problem is us. We demand the impossible. The changes we truly need are political. We need to reconnect people with the public consequences of their private acts. We should curb the subsidization of private insurance." Medicare recipients, "especially wealthier ones, should pay more of their bills." But "these changes won't happen because people don't want to see the costs. We don't have the health care system we need, but we do have the one we deserve."

Leavitt Says Government Moving To Solve Prescription Drug Program Problems. The Washington Times (1/26, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Administration officials yesterday told senators the new Medicare prescription-drug program has problems, but they're under control, and states will be reimbursed for covering seniors' prescription costs resulting from the glitches." Senators on the Finance Committee "seemed cautiously optimistic at the assurances, but some said Congress will still probably need to act. 'I think there's no question that the issue of prescription drugs will be back on the [Senate] floor in some form this year,' said Sen. Ron Wyden, Oregon Democrat." Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt said yesterday, "We've identified the problems, we're working on them and the plan gets better every day." He and Medicare chief Mark McClellan "had a private meeting yesterday with committee members to brief them on the situation."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 8, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "It is no secret the new Medicare prescription drug program is not off to a great start. Many elderly have been lost in the bureaucratic maze. Many have found themselves with no coverage at all." CBS (Andrews) added, "According to advocates for senior citizens, in thousands of cases so far, drugs might be covered under Medicare, but patients still need prior authorization before insurance actually covers the drug. The Center for Medicare Advocacy calls that sleight of hand. What's the sleight of hand?" Vicki Gottlich: "I think people were promised that they would be able to get all the drugs that they require, but they weren't told that they might have to go through a little extra." Andrews: "Medicare has ordered insurance plans to solve this saying, 'we expect prior authorization to be resolved at the point of service,' meaning the pharmacy counter. … So now in this transition to this massive new benefit, prior authorization is yet another complication in an already-troubled program."

OLC Urges Caution For Federal Employees On Nonprofit Boards. Government Executive (1/26, Pulliam) reports, "Agencies should be careful about allowing employees to serve on the boards of nonprofit organizations that have an interest in their work, according to a recent opinion published by the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel." GE continues, "Federal executives can serve as officers or directors at nonprofit organizations, a 19-page opinion released Jan. 11 stated. But agencies should take into account the appearance of an ethical violation before permitting employees to serve in a group that handles issues related to their government work. … 'Government employees [have a] . . . duty to "avoid any actions creating the appearance that they are violating the law ... or ethical standards,'" the Justice office's opinion said. … 'If an outside organization in which an employee is a director has been advocating its views directly to the federal government on a matter that the organization has identified as especially significant, there is a significantly heightened risk that the employee ... will at least appear less than independent in his judgments,' the legal counsel stated. 'And that risk ... calls for serious consideration by the employee's agency.' … Federal law requires government employees to recuse themselves from work activities when a nonprofit on which they serve has a financial interest in the matter. But just because nonprofits spend money advocating a position does not necessarily mean they have a financial interest in an agency action, according to the opinion." GE notes, "The case leading to the opinion originated in July 2004 when a senior executive at the Education Department was told by the Office of Government Ethics that election to the Senior Executives Association board of directors would result in a criminal conflict of interest due to his service on his department's Executive Resources Board."

Senate Committee Opens Hearings Into Lobbying Reform. USA Today (1/26, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports that after "weeks of calls for restrictions on how lobbyists influence Congress, lawmakers began Wednesday to grapple with the thorny details of just how to do it." The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee opened the first congressional hearing on reforms, and "lobbyists argued against proposals to ban privately financed trips for House and Senate members and their aides, saying travel helps them make good policy decisions in an era of globalization." And some senators "rejected calls for more restrictions, saying problems…are rooted in lawmakers' own behavior, the way Congress operates and a failure to enforce rules already on the books." The Washington Post (1/26, A6, Milbank, 744K) reports lawmakers "had no difficulty conceding they had a problem. But there was yawning disconnect between the problem and the proposed remedies. While most everybody agreed that Congress was being subverted by lawmakers' reliance on lobbyists for campaign cash, the proposals getting the most serious consideration yesterday were relatively minor: whether to ban lobbyist-paid lunches or a few million dollars' worth of privately funded congressional trips." Both newspapers quote Sen. Tom Coburn saying, "I don't believe lobbying reform's the problem; I believe Congress is."

However, CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Koppel) called the hearing "a bipartisan show of support for what Democrat Joe Lieberman called 'doing away' with what they believe is the faulty impression that their votes go to the highest bidder. The high-flying days of Congressional lobbying could be in for a rough landing as Democrats and Republicans alike rushed to put luxury vacations and expensive meals on the Congressional chopping block." The AP (1/25, Abrams) quotes Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairman Susan Collins saying, "The public's trust in Congress is perilously low." The panel's ranking Democrat, Sen. Joseph Lieberman, similarly said, "The status quo stinks and cries out for us to clear the air."

McCain Testifies In Opposition To Earmarks. The Washington Post (1/26, Branigin, 744K) reports Sen. John McCain, appearing as a witness before the panel, "was one of several senators to denounce earmarking, a practice he called 'disgraceful.' He outlined one of several proposals to tighten rules and require greater disclosure of lobbying activities. But he told the committee, 'We're not going to fix this system until we fix the earmarks.'" But "representatives of lobbying organizations urged the committee today not to overreact to what they described as the unscrupulous activities of one corrupt lobbyist," and Minority Whip Richard Durbin said the problem "goes beyond earmarks and that solving it must start with reducing the 'outrageous expense' of political campaigns."

Lewis Offers Steps For Earmarking Reforms. House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis writes in Roll Call (1/26), "The president's budget contains numerous earmarks inserted by nameless, faceless bureaucrats within each government agency. Teach for America, The Points of Light Foundation, and America's Promise are just a few examples of unauthorized, limited-scope initiatives that routinely receive a line-item request in the president's budget. Yet elected representatives know more about local, state or national priorities than the Beltway bureaucracy. It would be a mistake to ignore this expertise when determining how to allocate scarce federal dollars." Lewis calls for "curbing the appetite to spend by sharply reducing the number of earmarks in annual spending bills and making the appropriations process more open and transparent. In order to succeed, the House and Senate must jointly embrace these efforts. Specifically, the leadership of the House Appropriations Committee recommends the following: 1) Sharply limit the number of Member project requests. … 2) Require increased accountability, disclosure and transparency by requiring that Member request letters be made public prior to House consideration of each appropriations bill. … 3) Require that all project requests be submitted in writing to the appropriations subcommittee of jurisdiction via a Member-signed request letter or form. 4) Establish clearly defined criteria for all project requests and require Members to specify how each project meets the criteria. … 5) Increase the proportion of projects that have a dollar-matching requirement. … 6) Require all Congressionally approved projects to go through a formal executive branch contracting and auditing process. 7) Finally, require that all other committees adopt similar earmarking reforms."

Nelson, Coleman Call For Independent Commission. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Curtius, 958K) reports Sens. Ben Nelson and Norm Coleman, "convinced that Congress cannot overhaul its rules on ethics and lobbying in the politically charged atmosphere of an election year," called for the creation of an independent commission for the job. But their "proposal faced quick resistance from two senators leading the reform push," Lieberman and McCain, both of whom said they "feared creating an independent commission and that waiting for it to act would slow the momentum for change." McCain said, "I don't want to wait. We've got to act quickly."

House Democratic Leaders Float "Toughest Lobbying Reform Package Yet." Roll Call (1/26, Newmyer) reports House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, Minority Whip Steny Hoyer, and Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn "circulated principles" of the "toughest lobbying reform package yet" to Democrats, seeking their support. The measure would "force lawmakers to report when they are sponsoring earmarks, require them to pay fair market value for travel on private jets and create an office of public integrity to oversee these and other new lobbying rules. Details of the plan emerged after a day in which lawmakers on both sides of the Capitol traded barbs, with each party claiming to want a bipartisan solution, but finding no partner across the aisle."

GOP Ends Vestige Of "K Street Project." The Washington Post (1/26, A2, Birnbaum, 744K) reports the GOP has ended a "long practice of routinely summoning lobbyists to the Capitol to try to persuade them to hire their aides and colleagues," a "remnant of the K Street Project once championed by Rep. Tom DeLay." The Senate Republican Conference staff director said Wednesday that a "K-Street-job-vacancies memo -- the heart of Congress's remaining involvement in the effort these days -- will no longer be distributed during high-level meetings hosted by the conference on Capitol Hill between lawmakers and lobbyists."

Hill Staff May Rush To Lobbying Jobs Before Rules Change. Roll Call (1/26, Ackley) writes that while the two parties "might not agree on all things lobbying," they "seem united on doubling the current one-year cooling-off period for newly minted advocates. And that has Congressional staffers, who already had an eye toward employment on K Street, stepping up their job-seeking efforts. Lobbyists, headhunters and Capitol Hill aides speculate that a mini-exodus of staffers from both sides of the aisle may be coming as a result."

ASAE Opposes Proposal To Ban Privately Funded Travel For Lawmakers. The Washington Post (1/26, A23, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "The American Society of Association Executives (sometimes referred to as the 'association of associations') is weighing in on plans to overhaul lobbying laws. ASAE, like some other trade groups, is concerned Congress may being acting too fast. ASAE opposes a measure that would ban all privately funded travel for members of Congress because, it believes, the ban would discourage true fact-finding trips and meetings with diverse groups."

DeLay Unrepentant As Ethics Talk Dominates Washington. In his Washington Post (1/26, A25, 744K) column, George Will writes of a visit with Tom DeLay in Richmond, Texas, writing, "Most people, battered as he recently has been, would be curled up on the carpet in a fetal position. But DeLay is as direct and uncomplicated as the tool that supplies his nickname -- 'The Hammer' -- and his faults do not include being a whiner. Furthermore, he is not about to plea-bargain in the court of public opinion. He chafes under prudential reticence: His attorneys tell him not to trumpet the fact that the Justice Department told them he is not a target in the Jack Abramoff investigation. But about other matters, the bantam is belligerent." And in DeLay country, "unlike on the Potomac, the fever for reform is not high. To a visiting columnist who waxes censorious about earmarks for highway projects, DeLay responds with a notable lack of repentance: 'You just drove out on one.'"

Social Security Group Redefines Itself To Push For Lobbying Reform. The Washington Post (1/26, A23, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "Fresh off its success in raising a grass-roots wave of public opposition that helped block President Bush's plan to overhaul Social Security, Americans United to Protect Social Security has redefined itself. The name is shorter -- Americans United -- and the mission is broader: public corruption, education, health and energy costs, economic prosperity and such. Yesterday, Americans United unveiled a $1 million advertising campaign urging support for legislation proposed by Democratic lawyers aimed at tightening the restrictions on lobbying." The group "has received initial support from organized labor, including the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. Brad Woodhouse , director of communication, says Americans United hopes to raise $10 million to $20 million from labor, individuals and others."

Blunt, Boehner Make Case For Their Candidacies. Rep. Roy Blunt, a candidate for House Majority Leader, writes in USA Today (1/26, 2.31M), "House members cannot ignore recent scandals that have many questioning the credibility of our system. Republicans will regain Americans' trust by enacting tough penalties for those who break the law and focusing on our agenda of limited government, personal responsibility and growing the economy by returning money to the Americans who earned it. … Lobbying reforms should include new rules governing travel and disclosure and regulations subjecting shadowy, tax-exempt '527' political groups to the same standards as others who attempt to influence the process. Then the credibility of honest public servants will be not be questioned -- even when some try to paint them with the same brush as those who break the law."

Meanwhile, Rep. John Boehner, a candidate for House Majority Leader writes in USA Today (1/26, 2.31M), "House Republicans need leadership that will help provide a vision and a plan for renewal. We need a leader who will stand up to Democrats when they're wrong, but who has credibility to work with them when it's in the country's best interests.' Boehner adds, "As of now, I am the only candidate who has released a detailed plan that would help House Republicans regain the spirit and energy of 1994, embrace real reform and reclaim the vision responsible for our success."

USA Today Says Blunt, Boehner Not Credible Reformers. An editorial in USA Today (1/26, 2.31M) says, "The former majority leader, Tom DeLay, stepped down after he was indicted in a Texas fundraising case and linked to crooked lobbyist Jack Abramoff. So where is the GOP seeking this fresh face and new start? With two lawmakers -- Roy Blunt of Missouri and John Boehner of Ohio -- who have cozy relations with lobbyists and a penchant for accepting perks from corporate friends." USA adds, "A third candidate for majority leader, John Shadegg of Arizona, is less enmeshed with the lobbying establishment and high-powered fundraising. That's one reason he's given virtually no chance of winning." USA continues, "Both Blunt and Boehner have one point right: Voters are clamoring for change. That requires recognition of what's wrong and the will to do something about it. Lawmakers who've spent their careers accepting perks and raking in special-interest campaign cash don't make for credible reformers."

Cornyn Emerges As Senate GOP's "Self-Appointed Public Relations Man."

Roll Call (1/26, Pierce) reports, "With President Bush and Republicans struggling to regain their standing in public opinion as Senate Democrats hammer away daily at every perceived foible or folly committed by the ruling majority," Sen. John Cornyn "has made it his mission to strike back." Over the past year, Cornyn "has become a self-appointed public relations man for Republicans in Congress and the White House, filling a communications void that has developed in the Senate GOP leadership." Cornyn said, "I saw it as addressing this quick-response need that I don't think we had been set up for before, and really didn't need before the Democrats created their war room. It's not enough to come back later on, a week later, two weeks later, and respond. … A charge unrebutted is a charge believed." Cornyn has taken a key role in judicial nominations and also spearheaded "an aggressive effort among his colleagues in directing staff to send out partisan press releases, opposition research papers and talking points." He is now running for the "low-profile but still influential post of vice chairman of the Senate Republican Conference, which just happens to be the No. 2 'message' position."

First Lady's Approval Rating Is 82% In CNN/USA Today/Gallup Poll.

CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Crowley) reported, "In the latest CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll, 82 percent of Americans gave thumbs up to the way Laura Bush is handling her job. … Her approval rating is almost 40 points higher than her husband's." CNN added, "Despite that 82 percent approval rating, only 40 percent of Americans say they would like to see Mrs. Bush run for Senate. The truth is, when people see her as outside the world of politics, she is one of his biggest political assets."

Cheney Still A GOP Fundraising Draw.

Roll Call (1/26, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "Despite a recent spate of bad publicity, Vice President Cheney is still a big draw for GOP fundraising. The vice president is slated to be the headline attraction this evening at a fundraiser for Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio). Anyone can attend for a simple $1,000. But the most generous donors may have a picture snapped with the veep: Going for that 'max out' opportunity before Ohio's primary in May, the DeWine re-election campaign is charging political action committees $5,000 per photo op."

Hillary Clinton Says Bush Disregarding Cities' Needs In Favor Of Tax Cuts.

Reuters (1/25, Whitesides) reported, "Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton accused the Bush administration on Wednesday of ignoring the needs of cities in its politically driven zeal for tax cuts and told US mayors 'you are on your own.' Clinton, a potential White House candidate in 2008 who is seeking Senate re-election this year in New York, said that since the September 11 attacks President George W. Bush had reneged on his obligation to states and cities to pay for crucial security and social programs." Clinton said tax "cuts are desirable in the right political and economic climate but 'it is hard to square with the challenges we face at this time of terrorist threat.' At the federal level, 'the sense of urgency that marked the months after the 9/11 attacks has largely given way to politics as usual,' she said."

Clinton Stumbles Over Question On Her Time As Wal-Mart Board Member. The New York Daily News (1/26, McAuliff, 729K) reports that Sen. Clinton "easily pointed at Wal-Mart yesterday as not doing enough about health care but found it a little tougher when asked if she had ever suggested the retailer do more when she was on its board of directors. 'Well, you know, I, that was a long time ago, I have to remember,' she stammered, before pointing to her work on health care while First Lady. She sat on the Wal-Mart board from 1986 to 1992. Her spokesman insisted it's 'a very different company now.'"

Columnist Says Liberals Increasingly Unhappy With Clinton. Columnist Jonah Goldberg writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/26, 958K), "Liberals are sizing up Hillary Clinton for the umpteenth time, and they don't like what they see. … 'I will not support Hillary Clinton for president,' wrote Molly Ivins, the voice of conventional thinking on the left. 'Enough. Enough triangulation, calculation and equivocation. Enough clever straddling, enough not offending anyone.'" Goldberg adds, "The New Republic offers perhaps an even more devastating critique of Clinton for Democratic pragmatists: She can't win. Marisa Katz dismantled the myth that Clinton can appeal to 'red state' voters because she won in upstate New York. Turns out former Vice President Al Gore and Sen. John Kerry each did better in upstate New York than she did. … Meanwhile, a recent Gallup poll showed that 51% of Americans won't even consider voting for Clinton." Goldberg relates that there is "something oddly satisfying in the possibility that Clinton being herself is politically disastrous. And, if she's really just playing one more role according to some classically Clintonian political triangulation, there's something equally satisfying to the prospect that even her fans aren't falling for it anymore."

Obey, Frank To Propose Full Public Financing Of House Contests.

Roll Call (1/26, Kornacki) reports that Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.) "is joining with Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) to propose full public financing of all House elections. They announced Wednesday that they will introduce the plan, which would bar all candidates from fundraising and self-financing in their campaigns, when the House reconvenes next week." Obey's "plan would radically curtail the financial advantage most incumbents now enjoy, even making it difficult for some of them to pay for television ads. And even if Democrats were to unite behind it, the prospect on a vote in the GOP-controlled House is less than remote. … Beyond that, the plan also faces an almost certain constitutional hurdle, in the form of the Supreme Court's 1976 Buckley v. Valeo decision that equated campaign spending with free speech."

Kondracke Says House GOP Group To Unveil "Suburban Agenda" Next Month.

Roll Call Executive Editor Morton M. Kondracke writes in Roll Call (1/26), "A different kind of agenda -- different from the president's State of the Union address and the anticipated Democratic election year document -- is scheduled to be unveiled early next month to House Republicans: 'The Suburban Agenda.' It's the work of a group of 22 GOP Members from across the party's ideological spectrum and led by moderate Rep. Mark Kirk (Ill.), who's also tried to sell it to President Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove." Kirk said "this agenda is designed to answer the problems faced by a suburban family as it moves through its day." Kondracke notes, "There's clearly strategic political intent behind trying to build the 2006 GOP legislative strategy around the suburbs: More than half of U.S. voters live in the 'burbs, and these places, formerly Republican strongholds, have been trending Democratic in recent years. … The agenda is designed to keep Republicans in power, but many of the items -- electronic health records and anti-gang measures, for sure -- ought to be bipartisan. It wouldn't be surprising if there's a bidding war for the support of the suburbs."

Postal Service Opposes Collins Bill On Mail Rates.

The Washington Post (1/26, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The U.S. Postal Service headquarters launched a blitz yesterday to block a Senate bill, contending that the legislation, in combination with White House demands, could trigger a 20 percent increase in stamp prices in the near future. The bill's sponsors, Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), said they were 'outraged that the Postal Service would mislead senators.' In a statement, they said, 'Nothing in the bill would lead to rate increases.' Government agencies rarely risk incurring the wrath of committee chairmen who oversee their operations, as is the case with Collins. As head of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, she has made the overhaul of postal operations one of her priorities. Her bill would create a system of setting mail rates that she believes would give the post office greater pricing flexibility and would prevent it from raising rates each year in excess of inflation as measured by the consumer price index."

Federalist Society Protests Nightline Report On Scalia.

The Washington Times (1/26, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column "The Federalist Society yesterday called on ABC to investigate a report by its news show 'Nightline' that suggested Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia had done something unethical by participating in a legal seminar sponsored by the group. 'The report grossly misled viewers about a recent trip Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia took to teach a 10-hour course on the Constitution and separation of powers. 'Nightline' suggested that Justice Scalia's trip was a "judicial junket," and even strained to manufacture a link with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff,' Federalist Society President Eugene B. Meyer said in a letter yesterday to ABC News President David Westin. The program, which aired Monday, emphasized that Justice Scalia had missed the September swearing-in of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. because of his commitment to attend the legal seminar at a Colorado resort, suggesting that the jurist spent most of his time playing tennis and engaging in other frivolous pursuits."

High Court Urged To Look To Foreign Opinions In Interpreting Law. Felix G. Rohatyn, the United States ambassador to France from 1997 to 2001, writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (1/26, 1.19M), "Globalization has made it not only 'appropriate or useful' but vital to look at foreign laws" when interpreting our own. "When we require European support on security issues…our job is made more difficult by the intensity of popular opposition in Europe to our policy" on the death penalty. "Contempt for the laws of our allies is a major factor in our increasing isolation in the world," and "that is why is it is deeply troubling that the next member of the Supreme Court will most likely share Justice Scalia and Justice Thomas's" opposition to that view. "Taking the views of 450 million Europeans into account is not a sign of weakness on our part, nor is it a commitment to change our views" but "simply recognition that the laws of our most important allies, our biggest foreign investors, foreign employers, foreign customers and trading partners are worthy of our attention."

Home Sales Drop Sharply. USA Today (1/26, Knox, 2.31M) reports, "Sales of existing homes fell in December for the third-consecutive month, in a surprisingly sharp drop that signaled the housing market is cooling off faster than expected. Home resales declined 5.7% from November to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 6.6 million, the slowest since March 2004, the National Association of Realtors said Wednesday. Western states, notably California, suffered the worst, with home sales in the region skidding 11.4% from November and from December 2004." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Preciphs, 2.11M), however, adds that even if "sales of existing homes fell in December to their lowest level in three months," they "still set a record for the year." The New York Times (1/26, Bajaj, 1.19M) also reports "the housing market registered a fifth consecutive year of increased sales." The data, nonetheless, "appear to suggest that the era of rapidly increasing sales may be coming to a close."

Stocks Down. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) reports, "Stocks ended a two-day rally yesterday as a worsening profit outlook for oil companies and homebuilders, two of the market's best performers during the last 12 months, sent prices lower." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "fell 2.18 points, or 0.2 percent, to close at 1,264.68, its first drop this week. The Nasdaq composite index lost 4.60 points, or 0.2 percent, to 2,260.65. The Dow Jones industrial average dropped 2.48 points, or less than 0.1 percent, to 10,709.74, helped by a gain in General Motors." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Patterson, 2.11M) and USA Today (1/26, 2.31M) also report the stock numbers.

Oil Industry Defends Record-High Profits. ABC World News Tonight (1/25, story 4, 2:30, Vargas) reported, "Some breath-taking numbers from the oil industry today. Conoco/Phillips said it made 13.5 $13.5 billion last year, an increase of 66% from the year before. The record-high profits are the result of record-high oil and gas prices people are paying at the pump and to heat their homes. So, the oil industry is feeling the heat. Today, it launched a counterattack." ABC (Stark): "Today the oil industry tried to argue that it's not just the companies themselves who benefit when profits are high. At the gas pump, where prices are once again increasing, news of the huge oil company profits had consumers up in arms." After "all the numbers are in, analysts expect oil industry profits for the fourth quarter to be up at least 46% over a year ago. The industry today was quick to go on the defensive, pointing out its earnings are just slightly above average for all corporations, just over 7 cents for every dollar spent. It also argued that what's good for big oil is good for average Americans." Stark concluded: "So, for oil companies and those who own shares in them, it has been a boom year. But for many consumers, it's a bust." Vargas: "Indeed it is."

Greenspan To Open Consulting Firm. When he leaves the Fed at the end of the month, Greenspan plans to set up a consulting firm, Greenspan Associates, in Washington, DC, the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) reports. The Journal adds, "One of his first hires will be Michelle Smith, who the Fed said yesterday will leave her job as director of its office of board members to join Mr. Greenspan's new firm. … In addition, the Fed said David W. Skidmore, Ms. Smith's deputy, would become the board's chief spokesman and Rose Pianalto Cameron will oversee other public information activities.

Greenspan Opposes Banking Loophole. Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan opposes a regulatory loophole that allows corporations to own banks. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Wysocki, 2.11M) says Greenspan's opposition puts him "into the middle of an effort by Wal-Mart Stores Inc. to establish a bank. Mr. Greenspan's salvo, outlined in a 12-page letter to Congress that was reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, is the latest in a controversy over the separation of commerce and banking. Wal-Mart, the Bentonville, Ark., retailer, is trying to obtain a state banking charter in Utah, using precisely the exemption in the banking laws opposed by Mr. Greenspan." The Journal adds that the remarks "could be Mr. Greenspan's last major statement to Congress as Fed chairman."

Investors Were Skeptical When Greenspan Took Over Fed Chair. USA Today (1/26, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Investors jittery about how incoming Federal Reserve chairman Ben Bernanke will pan out can take some solace -- folks weren't sure some guy named Alan Greenspan was up to snuff either. Investors didn't take the news so well on the day in June 1987 when Paul Volcker announced he was leaving the Fed after eight years and Greenspan was named to his position. Bond markets took their worst one-day beating in more than five years, and the dollar fell." USA adds, "In many ways, Bernanke — although widely respected in economic circles — is more of an unknown to the public than Greenspan was in 1987. … But no matter how well they knew Greenspan, people in 1987 were still nervous about him taking over the Fed."

Dow Chemical Loses Appeal On Life-Insurance Policies. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Matthews) reports, "A federal appeals court ruled Dow Chemical Co. is liable for $22.2 million in back taxes and interest for claiming tax-income losses on thousands of life-insurance policies it took out on its employees. … The ruling is a victory for the Internal Revenue Service, which for the past decade has been cracking down on companies that take out life-insurance policies on their executives and employees, often without their knowledge, in order to reduce their corporate-tax bill." The article says that only Dow Chemical had prevailed against the IRS in these cases, but lost that victory on appeal. The article explains that companies took out these insurance policies "to generate tax deductions with minimal cash outlay. They did this by taking a tax deduction for the interest they paid on loans taken out against the insurance policies, while allowing the policy to build value tax-free."

Ney Announces He Will Seek Reelection. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "A leading target in the influence peddling investigation isn't letting the probe keep him from the campaign trail. Congressman Bob Ney announced today that he is running for re-election. The Ohio Republican recently gave up his committee chairmanship. State party officials have urged him to give up a seat as well if he is indicted. Ney denies any wrongdoing."

The AP (1/26, Hammer) notes that in stepping down as chairman of the House Administration Committee earlier this month, Ney "acknowledged that his ties to Abramoff were a distraction from his duties, particularly as Republicans push an ethics reform agenda -- part of which must be implemented by the Administration Committee. But Ney spokesman Brian Walsh said no such distraction has affected Ney's work for his district, where he's known for hands-on constituent service and independence from GOP trade and labor policies."

The New York Times (1/26, Hauser, 1.19M) relates that Ney, in a statement, said "that the campaign this year promises to be a 'vigorous' one 'and I am ready for the fight.' 'I look forward to joining my friends and supporters, including the many state and local officials backing my re-election bid, as we kick off the 2006 campaign this Thursday and Friday,' he said." Ney "is referred to as 'Representative No. 1' in court documents filed in connection with the corruption scandal surrounding" Abramoff. Ney's statement "said he would announce his re-election bid at a campaign rally in Dover tomorrow evening and then travel to the southern part of the district for a second rally in Chillicothe on Friday at noon."

Roll Call (1/26, Whittington) adds, "Chillicothe Mayor Joe Sulzer and Dover Law Director Zack Space are vying in the May 2 Democratic primary for the chance to face Ney, who has held the expansive 18th district seat since 1994."

Ehrlich Says Stem-Cell Funding Decisions Should Be Based On Science. The Washington Post (1/26, B4, Wagner, 744K) reports that Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich (R) "is pushing a plan to spend $20 million next year on stem cell research," but "is not committing himself on the question that has stirred the most controversy: whether the money should be used primarily for work on stem cells derived from human embryos or from less controversial adult stem cells." Ehrlich, in an interview, said, "I'm not going to make that decision. … The point here is that the decision should be a function of the science. These are fundamentally science questions, not political questions." Ehrlich "would leave it to a state-founded technology corporation to decide whether to provide grants for work on adult stem cells or work on embryonic stems cells, which many scientists say holds greater promise but some in his party consider tantamount to abortion." Ehrlich, "who has supported stem cell research since his days in Congress," said, "The strong pro-life members know the administration does not share their views on this issue, but we wanted to try to lower the temperature on the politics. … I wanted to try to keep everyone's eye on the ball, and I believe this approach accomplishes that goal."

Republicans Say They Have Bipartisan Support For Stem-Cell Bill Filibuster. The Washington Times (1/26, Ward, 90K) reports that Democratic and GOP Maryland state senators on Wednesday vowed "to stop a bill that would promote the creation of embryos for research. 'If [Senate President Thomas V. Mike] Miller wants to do this extraordinary thing, he will get a filibuster that lasts as long as he wants it to last,' said Senate Minority Whip Andrew P. Harris, Baltimore County Republican. Senate Minority Leader J. Lowell Stoltzfus said he had more than the minimum 19 votes to filibuster. 'We think we have 20,' said Mr. Stoltzfus, an Eastern Shore Republican." The Times notes, "There are 14 Republicans in the 47-member Senate, which means six Democrats have agreed to filibuster. Sen. Paula C. Hollinger, Baltimore County Democrat, is sponsoring the Senate bill in support of embryonic stem-cell research for the second year. … 'I'm sure they will filibuster, and I'm sure we will round up the votes,' she said. Mrs. Hollinger also said she would fight for the bill and against the filibuster for 'as long as it takes.'"

Ford Released From Hospital.

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 9, 0:10, Vargas) reported, "Gerald Ford was released from the hospital today. He spent the last 12 days being treated for pneumonia at the Eisenhower Medical Center near Rancho Mirage, California. His doctors say he is doing well."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 7, :45, Williams) added, "At 92, he is the oldest living former president. His spokesperson said he's doing well but it's safe to say doctors will be keeping a close eye on him."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Rosenblatt, 958K) reports, "Ford, 92, originally had been scheduled to leave Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage on Jan. 19, but doctors kept him for additional treatment."

Professors Say Maryland Wal-Mart Defeat Stems From Government-Employed Voters.

Steve H. Hanke, professor of applied economics at Johns Hopkins University, and Stephen J.K. Walters, professor of economics at Loyola College in Maryland, write in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M), "The consequences of" Maryland's "legislature's override of Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich's veto of their 'Fair Share Health Care Act' on Jan. 12 will be tragic for some of the state's neediest residents." The reason for the override is that legislators "are simply eager for Big Labor's votes and money and therefore subservient to its interests." Estimates show "that as much as a third of the state's economic activity stems from federal employment and purchases," that "sector where revenues appear to arrive automatically and inefficiency never leads to bankruptcy," so "many Marylanders are simply unmindful of the necessities of survival in the private sector." This elects legislators who "often behave as if business is a problem to be solved." However, "legislators should be mindful that companies like Wal-Mart are not the enemy but rather front-line soldiers in a real war on poverty."

Hamas Wins Palestinian Elections; Government Resigns.

The AP (1/26) reports this morning, "The Islamic militant group Hamas said Thursday it won control of the Palestinian parliament and officials from the ruling Fatah Party confirmed the estimate -- though Palestinian election officials delayed the release of preliminary official results." The claim by Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh "was based on reporting by Hamas activists who observed the counting in the polling stations, the group said. He said Hamas had won about 70 seats, enough for a majority in the 132-seat parliament. … Officials with Fatah also said that Hamas had won about 70 seats, which would give the Islamists a majority in the 132-seat parliament. They spoke on condition of anonymity because counting in some districts was continuing."

Meanwhile, CNN.com (1/26) reports, "In a stunning development ahead of official election results, Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qorie said he and the rest of the Palestinian Authority government will resign in the wake of militant group Hamas' apparent victory in historic elections. The announcement was an acknowledgment that election results showed Hamas had won a majority of seats in the 132-seat Palestinian Legislative Council, supplanting the ruling Fatah party." This announcement came before official election results had been released, CNN.com reported. According to the article, Qorie's office "said it will be up to Hamas to form a new government."

Previously, most reports had referred to exit polls showing a narrow Fatah win. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Leggett, 2.11M) reports that "according to Beir Zeit University's exit poll, the ruling Fatah party emerged victorious with 46% of the vote and Hamas captured about 40%, making its Reform and Change party the second-most popular among voters. Independent parties accounted for the difference. Final results are expected today." The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 5, 2:00, Schieffer) reported that "exit polls show that a militant group dedicated to Israel's destruction did very well, maybe even well enough to gain a role in the Palestinian government." NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 4, 1:30, Williams) showed Ali Zarbawi, Birzeit University saying, "Hamas will be an active opposition, a very strong opposition, but Fatah is going to lead the government."

USA Today (1/26, Gutman, 2.31M) adds "about 1 million Palestinians voted Wednesday in parliamentary elections that threaten to end the ruling Fatah Party's decade-long monopoly over Palestinian politics." The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Wilson, 744K) headlines its story "Hamas Makes Strong Showing In Vote," while the Washington Times (1/26, Mitnick, 90K) titles its reprot "Fatah Edges Hamas In Polls." The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Prusher, Mitnick, 61K) and Los Angeles Times (1/26, King, 958K) run similar reports.

Bush Touts Palestinian Elections But Says He Will Not Deal With Hamas. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site,, the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush, in an Oval Office interview, declared that he isn't ready yet to deal with the radical Palestinian Islamist group Hamas no matter how well it does in Wednesday's Palestinian elections. Speaking to The Wall Street Journal as Palestinians were electing a new parliament, Bush lauded the Middle Eastern trend toward democracy that produced Palestinian elections, but he said that Hamas isn't a suitable partner for diplomacy until it renounces its position calling for the destruction of Israel. 'A political party, in order to be viable, is one that professes peace, in my judgment, in order that it will keep the peace,' the president said. 'And so you're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility. And the answer is: Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you.'"

The Washington Post (1/26, A19, Kessler, 744K) reports "yesterday's better-than-expected electoral showing by a group labeled a terrorist organization by the United States greatly complicates the administration's diplomacy in the region, U.S. officials said yesterday.' Hamas, "which is dedicated to the destruction of Israel, appears to have ridden a wave of popular disgust at the perceived corruption and incompetence of the ruling Fatah Party. Exit polls indicate Fatah will have only a slim edge over Hamas in the Palestinian Legislative Council, giving Hamas a strong claim to a role in the government." The results "suggested the risks inherent in the Bush administration's campaign to bring democracy to the Middle East." Administration spokesmen "officially celebrated the 'historic moment' for the Palestinians while officials privately reeled at the outcome."

All three network news programs briefly noted Bush's pledge the US would not deal with Hamas unless it renounces violence. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 2, 0:20, Woodruff) reported, "The Bush Administration declared the election 'historic' and called this 'a great day for the Palestinian people.' But President Bush made clear the US will not deal with Hamas, no matter how well it did in the election. He told 'The Wall Street Journal' today 'We view Hamas as a terrorist organization. We don't deal with Hamas. … I don't see that changing.'"

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 6, :30, Schieffer) reported, "Hamas may have won a lot of Palestinian votes, but they got no vote of confidence from President Bush in a 'Wall Street Journal' interview today. The President says he will not deal with Hamas unless the group renounces its call for Israel's destruction."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, lead story, 3:10, Woodruff) reported "Israel's new foreign minister holds out little hope." Israeli Foreign Minister Tsipy Livney: "The essence and the reasons of the existence of the Hamas is not because they want to gain some political gains in the conflict. They are talking about demolishing the state of Israel, to erase the state of Israel from earth."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 4, 1:30, Williams) in its coverage also noted, "President Bush told 'The Wall Street Journal' today he would not deal with Hamas unless it renounces its call for the destruction of Israel."

The New York Times (1/26, Erlanger, Myre, 1.19M) reports "the acting prime minister of Israel, Ehud Olmert, said his country could not accept a situation in which Hamas would be part of the Palestinian Authority if the group remained armed with unchanged goals."

Carter Hopes Hamas Will Moderate Stance And Renounce Violence. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, lead story, 3:10, Woodruff) reported, "What no one knows is if Hamas will change, now that it has gained political power. Former President Jimmy Carter came to monitor today's election elections. There are some that believe Hamas will be pragmatic." Former President Carter: "That's my hope. Everybody hopes Hamas will be pragmatic. Because one thing is, if not for their own benefit but maybe for the benefit of the people they represent. Because no doubt if Hamas is not, as you say, pragmatic, then there will be a reduction in foreign assistance."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 5, 2:00, Hawkins) reported "Former President Jimmy Carter, who is leading international election monitors here, says bringing Hamas into the system may soften its hard-line positions." Carter: "My hope is and my prayer is that this will be a moderating influence on Hamas, that they'll see the responsibility in the government itself that they will moderate their position, forgo violence and terrorist acts."

Sharon's Absence From Stage Said To Make Peace Process Uncertain. The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported that former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon's medical condition "leaves Israel with many unresolved matters, including that wall being built in the West Bank." CBS (Pizzey) added, "The most troublesome and obvious symbol of the unfinished business Ariel Sharon has left behind is the security wall separating Israelis and Palestinians on the West Bank. It wasn't Sharon's idea, but he made it a reality, an unplanned but now integral feature of the so-called road map that is supposed to lead to a peace deal. The problem for those who built on Sharon's legacies is that his plans and policies were like this wall: Only gaps that only he seemed to know how to fill."

Iran Open To Russian Enrichment Of Their Uranium. The Washington Post (1/26, Finn, 744K) reports that Ali Larijani, head of Iran's Supreme National Security Council," said "that his country was open to a compromise proposal from Russia that it enrich uranium for Iran on Russian soil," but added that that "the idea needed fine-tuning in advance of further talks scheduled for the middle of next month." The New York Times (1/26, Myers, 1.19M) adds that Larijani "indicated that no agreement had been reached and that significant details remained to be negotiated" and "warned that Iran would begin enriching uranium on an industrial scale if Iran's nuclear program was referred to the United Nations Security Council." His "remarks made it clear that further discussions on it would not take place until later in February, after the meeting at the atomic energy agency's headquarters in Vienna."

Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Rosen) reported that the head of Iran's national security council, "said in Moscow today Iran now takes a positive view of the so-called Russian proposal, which the Iranians previously rejected. The proposal would have Russia enrich uranium and ship the resulting nuclear fuel to Iran for nonmilitary use."

The AP (1/26, Gutterman) adds that President Bush said "Russia's proposal offered the best chance for resolving the impasse, adding 'it's important for us to exhaust all diplomacy' in dealing with Iran."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/26) says "Chief negotiator Ali Larijani also reiterated Iran's threat to renew enrichment activities if it is referred to the United Nations Security Council." The Washington Times (1/26, 90K) runs the same AP story. The Washington Post (1/26, A21, Finn, 744K) runs a similar report under the headline "Iran Says It Is Open To Russian Plan On Nuclear Program," while the New York Times (1/26, Myers, 1.19M) titles its report "Iran Welcomes Russia's Offer To Enrich Uranium Jointly; Details Remain."

Iran's Non-Cooperation Said To Be At Heart Of The Standoff. Knight Ridder (1/26, Landay) reports, "Iran's…obfuscation, conflicting answers and stonewalling on…the enrichment program are at the heart of the crisis over its nuclear program." It is "only by reconstructing the complete history and extent of Iran's nuclear work" that the IAEA can "determine the truth. So far, that's been impossible," and while "Iran has filled some gaps and is promising to fill the rest," IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei said "in a Nov. 18 report to the IAEA board…that 'there still remain issues to be resolved' and Iran's 'full transparency is ... long overdue.'"

Blix Says Bush Administration Overemphasizing Possible Military Action. Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Rosen) reported that "one of the world's best-known weapons inspectors, one who clashed with the Bush Administration before, is criticizing it again now for its approach in the current standoff. Hans Blix, the chief UN weapons inspector in Iraq prior to the war, argued the Administration is overemphasizing the potential for US military interaction in Iran."

Washington Backs Off Linking Iran Vote To India Nuclear Deal. The AFP (1/26) reports, "Washington moved to unlink a landmark US-India civilian nuclear deal with how New Delhi votes on the Iranian nuclear question at a key meeting of the UN atomic watchdog agency." The US Ambassador to India, David Mulford, "had warned Wednesday that a historic deal giving American nuclear technology to India might fall through if New Delhi did not vote against Iran at the February 2-3 meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA)." However, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "we deal with the Indian Government on these two issues as separate issues."

Reuters (1/25) added that "Mulford, told the Press Trust of India news agency that if India decided not to vote against Iran, 'the effect on members of the U.S. Congress with regard to the civil nuclear initiative will be devastating.'" He was also quoted "as saying the deal would 'die,'"

The AP (1/26, Rosenberg) adds, "The State Department in Washington said later that Mulford wasn't speaking for the U.S. government."

Reuters (1/26, Hafezi) also covered this story.

US Envoy Says China's US's Approach To Iran Differ. The New York Times (1/26, Kahn, 1.19M) reports, "China and the United States want to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, but their 'approach may differ' on the best tactics to achieve that result, Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick said after a round of meetings on the subject in Beijing." He also "called the diplomatic discussions fluid and said there were still differences over what steps should be taken to respond to what Western powers say is a covert program by Iran to build nuclear bombs." This suggests "hat China, despite heavy lobbying, had left some doubts as to whether it is prepared to back a proposal…to get the United Nations Security Council involved in deciding how to handle Iran's nuclear program."

Annan Doesn't Expect IAEA To Be Ready In February To Refer Iran To Security Council. Reuters (1/26, Leopold) reports, "U.N. chief Kofi Annan said on Wednesday he doubted that a U.N. nuclear watchdog would be able to come to a decision by early February on referring Iran to the Security Council over its nuclear programme," adding that "Mohamed ElBaradei, the director-general of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, did not expect to have a report on Iran ready until the end of February, for the IAEA's regular board meeting in March."

Iran Accuses British Military Of Aiding Bombers. The Washington Post/Reuters (1/26, A17) reports, "Iran accused the British military on Wednesday of cooperating with bombers who killed eight people in southwest Iran, an allegation Britain described as ludicrous. A little-known group campaigning for independence for Iran's Arab minority asserted responsibility in a Web statement for Tuesday's attacks on a bank and government building in the oil city of Ahvaz." Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki "said that London's involvement was clear and that Tehran would make strong protests." A spokesman in British Prime Minister Tony Blair's office "said Iran's allegation 'deserves to be treated with scorn by the whole international community.'"

UN Peacekeepers To Maintain Monitoring Of Israeli-Lebanese Border. The New York Times/Reuters (1/26) reports, "The members of the United Nations Security Council have agreed that United Nations peacekeepers should keep monitoring the Israeli-Lebanese border for six more months, the current Council president said on Wednesday." Lebanon wanted "a renewal of the mandate of the United Nations' peacekeeping mission for the border area for a year, until Jan. 31, 2007." Yet "the 15 Security Council members instead reached a consensus on an extension until July 31."

Frist Says US, International Community Must "Ramp Up The Pressure" On Syria. In a New York Sun (1/26) op-ed, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist writes, "A year ago this month, a car bomb killed the former Lebanese prime minister, Rafic Hariri. An ongoing U.N. investigation has implicated the Syrian government in the murder. The Syrian president, Bashar al-Assad, may have played a personal role. Several additional high-profile bombings have occurred in the last several months. Enough is enough: Syria's actions in Lebanon have proven that it has no desire to play by the rules of civilized nations. Now, the United States and its partners need to ramp up the pressure on Damascus. We need to push Syria away from its homegrown brand of Arab fascism and toward democracy, peace, and an authentic end to its interference with Lebanon's affairs. We should start by increasing and expanding our funding for prodemocracy groups in Lebanon and Syria. In the coming Congress, I plan to support legislation that will do just that."

Bush Administration Criticizes Mexico's Plan To Distribute Border Maps. Following an announcement Tuesday by Mexico's National Human Rights Commission that it will print and distribute maps showing immigrants the safest routes to cross the border into Arizona, Mexican President Vicente Fox distanced his government from the group, saying that it was an "autonomous commission." However, the Washington Times (1/26, Kralev, Seper, 90K) reports, "The Bush administration yesterday accused the Mexican government of facilitating illegal entry into the United States after Mexican officials said they would distribute maps of dangerous border areas and posters with safety instructions and other tips. … 'We oppose in the strongest terms the publication of maps to aid those who wish to enter the United States illegally,' said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. 'It is a bad idea to encourage migrants to undertake this highly dangerous and ultimately futile effort.'" Meanwhile, "Rafael Laveaga, spokesman for the Mexican Embassy in Washington, said the NHRC is an independent body and receives no government funds."

Hutchison, Border Sheriff Seek Investigation Of Suspected Mexican Military Incursions. The Washington Times (1/26, Seper, 90K) reports Zapata County Sheriff Sigifredo Gonzalez Jr., who heads the Texas Sheriff's Border Coalition, demanded yesterday "that the US and Mexican governments investigate incursions into the United States by heavily armed drug escorts dressed in Mexican military uniforms 'before someone gets killed.'" He "said a growing number of suspected incursions and violence aimed at the area's law-enforcement officers is making the border 'a pretty dangerous place.'" Also yesterday, "Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas Republican, said she was 'deeply concerned' about the possible incursions and asked Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to 'fully investigate this matter and report to Congress the details and confirm whether or not Mexican military officials were involved. … The Mexican government has denied that the men in any of the incidents were soldiers, saying that some drug smugglers dress in military-style uniforms, carry automatic weapons and drive military-style vehicles."

Kyl Says Border Encounters "Undermine Efforts" To Keep Drugs Out Of US. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Marosi, Lopez, Connell, 958K) reports, "Armed Mexican government personnel made unauthorized incursions into the United States five times in the last three months of 2005, including one incident last month in Southern California, according to confidential Department of Homeland Security records. … The records obtained by The Times provide new details on more than a dozen incursions into the US, including the five most recent ones." Meanwhile, "US Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar said "that incursions have declined by more than 50% since 2002. Still, with assault rates against agents at record highs, any incursion is taken 'very seriously.' However, "US Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) said in an interview Wednesday that this week's incident in Texas was 'about as serious as it gets' and noted that dozens of reported incursions have occurred in his state. The encounters seriously undermine efforts to stop the flow of drugs coming across the US border and suggest possible cooperation among Mexican authorities and traffickers, he said."

Mexico Said To Be Helping US Secure Southern Border From Terrorists. Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Bowers, 61K) reports, "A top priority of the United States government is to prevent a determined terrorist from crossing the US- Mexico border. It is also becoming a primary mission for Mexico - and the first place it's focusing on is the 375-mile, desolate stretch of land that abuts Arizona. In addition to sharing intelligence and cooperating on investigations with its US counterparts in Arizona, Mexico last year set up three checkpoints along known human-smuggling routes on its side of the border and plans to add two more. Between August, when the checkpoints became operational, and December, Mexican officials stopped 1,277 non-Mexicans (OTMs, for 'other than Mexicans') from crossing into Arizona, according to a Mexican government report obtained by the Monitor. The report shows that most of the OTMs came from Central and South America, but seven are listed as Iraqis." Meanwhile, "the US government is apprehending record numbers of illegal immigrants on the Arizona side of the border."

State Legislators Considering Immigration Legislation. USA Today (1/26, Cauchon, 2.31M) reports, "Frustrated by slow action in Congress, state legislatures are debating whether to increase border enforcement at their own expense, fine employers who use undocumented workers and get local police involved in deporting them." However, "like Congress, legislatures are divided on what to do about the estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants who provide a low-wage workforce in the USA." It "is one of the hottest issues as 37 legislatures convene this month. Last year, states considered 300 immigration laws and approved 40." Meanwhile, "Congress is considering changes to immigration policies — a border fence, a guest worker program — but it's uncertain whether action will be taken this year."

Provision Of Immigration Bill Compared To Nazi Practice. Andrew S. Grove, a member of the board of overseers of the International Rescue Committee, in an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/26, A10, 2.11M) writes that the recently passed "Sensenbrenner-King" immigration bill "scares me because it has the potential of turning neighbor against neighbor -- and of changing our country into a place of fear and mistrust. … The bill contains a provision punishing anyone who 'assists, [or] encourages . . . a person who . . . lacks lawful authority to remain in the United States' to remain here." Grove states, "This could change the nature of our society in a way that I have seen firsthand. As a Jewish child hiding from the Nazis in Hungary, I saw how the persecution of non-Jewish Hungarians who hid their Jewish friends or neighbors cast a wide blanket of fear over everyone. This fear led to mistrust, and mistrust led to hostility, until neighbors turned upon neighbors in order to protect themselves. Is this what we want?"

Mexican Presidential Candidate Seeks To Boost Profile. The New York Times (1/26, McKinley, 1.19M) reports on Mexican presidential candidate Felipe Calderón's efforts to succeed President Vicente Fox. After "a bitter primary fight last year, Mr. Calderón transformed himself from a little-known former energy commissioner into the best hope for the president's right-of-center party. He is running a strong second in most opinion polls to the leftist former mayor of Mexico City, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, and many political strategists say he has a chance to win the election on July 2." Yet, "outside the capital's opinion-makers and party insiders, surveys show that one in five Mexican voters still do not know who Mr. Calderón is, and as the presidential campaign officially kicked off last week, he made his first tour to try to change that."

Musharraf Vows To Construct Natural-Gas Pipeline To Iran.

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Champion, Kempe, 2.11M) reports, "Pakistani president Pervez Musharraf "said his country would build a planned natural-gas pipeline from Iran without India's participation if talks among the three nations continue to produce no result." His "threat came at a delicate time for Gen. Pervez Musharraf, while he is having to balance domestic public opinion and relations with the U.S., India and Iran." At the World Economic Forum he "said Pakistan had opened bilateral talks with Tehran to build a gas pipeline that would run from Iran." But India has "expressed concern about recent attacks on existing gas and power lines in Baluchistan, the region of South Western Pakistan through which a pipeline from Iran would pass. Gen. Musharraf played down the threat posed by Baluchistan militants, dismissing the conflict as limited to one isolated local tribe." His "tough line on the pipeline talks contrasts with that of his prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, while in New York last week."

OPEC Will Refrain From Cutting Oil Output.

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Bahree, 2.11M) reports that OPEC "is widely expected to refrain from trimming output levels when its oil ministers meet in Vienna next week, but Iran remains a wild card." The Journal notes, "With the price of oil nearing records recently, an OPEC decision to continue pumping oil at close to capacity should reassure markets of plentiful supply, something Saudi Arabia appears to favor and the U.S. seems to be counting on. In short, there is no economic incentive for OPEC to trim output when market forces have sent billions of extra dollars pouring into the coffers of oil-rich countries anyway." But Iran "could use the OPEC meeting to send a warning to Western Europe and the U.S., both big oil importers." Meanwhile, "U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman says he has been in regular contact with oil producers. 'By and large, they seem to be understanding that we have a situation where there needs to be more oil rather than less oil in the world,' Mr. Bodman said this week."

South Korea Ignores US Call For Action On North Korean Financial Activity. The Washington Times (1/26, Salmon, 90K) reports, "A day after the United States urged South Korea to take an active stance against what it contends are North Korea's illicit financial activities, Seoul refused to say whether it would take action and made clear it opposed any attempt at regime change in Pyongyang." South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun said, "When it comes to the North Korean regime, raising issues about it or pressuring it or sometimes wishing for its collapse, on that position of some Americans, we do not agree." The Times notes, "By 'some Americans,' Mr. Roh appeared to be referring to hard-liners in the Bush administration who favor toppling North Korean strongman Kim Jong-il."

US, South Korea Close To Reaching Free Trade Deal. The Washington Post (1/26, D6, Blustein, 744K) reports, "The United States and South Korea are very close to launching negotiations for a free-trade agreement, which would be the most economically significant free-trade pact for Washington since the North American Free Trade Agreement." Yet "both sides have been reluctant to start formal talks until they are reasonably confident that the negotiations would end in agreement. South Korea's farmers are bitterly opposed to opening their country's agricultural markets, and their political clout could scuttle a deal." While "plans to launch the U.S.-Korea talks could still founder, officials and other sources who have spoken recently with negotiators said an announcement is likely to materialize before long. Asked about the prospects, one administration official replied, 'How do you say 'soon' in Korean?'" And "Rob Portman, the U.S. trade representative, heightened the speculation Friday when he told reporters, 'We'll be announcing some additional [free-trade agreement] partners soon. As I think you will notice, they will not be with small economies because I do think we need to move on to some larger economies.'"

"Gas War" Between Russia And Ukraine Leads To European Shortages. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, White, Crawford, 2.11M) reports, "Bickering over natural-gas shipments intensified between Moscow and Kiev has reduced supplies of Russian gas to Europe, led to shortages in several countries and fueled energy-security anxieties across a continent gripped by an arctic cold snap." Few experts "expect a repeat of Russia's New Year's gas cutoff to Ukraine. … But as details of the Jan. 4 deal have emerged, doubts have grown about whether it sets the stable foundation for supplies and exports to Europe that its backers claim." Despite reassurances from both countries, "the two sides yesterday failed to reach agreement on the details of implementing the Jan. 4 compromise, intended to halt what is known as the 'gas war' in the region."

Putin Claims Alleged British Spies Linked To NGOs. The Washington Post (1/26, A16, Finn, 744K) reports, "Russian President Vladimir Putin on Wednesday linked the scandal to foreign financing of nongovernmental organizations in Russia, a connection that grass-roots activists say is tangential and being used to smear their work." Putin said, "The situation is regrettable, as we have seen, when attempts are made to use secret services to work with nongovernmental organizations and when financing is carried out through secret services' channels." The UK government "has refused to comment on the espionage charges, but has denied it was doing anything illegal with nongovernmental organizations." And "Russian authorities have so far presented no evidence that the alleged spy ring recruited human rights activists." Yet the claims have been "seized on by many Russian politicians. The lower house of parliament, by a vote of 401 to 6, passed a resolution Wednesday condemning the involvement of foreign intelligence services with the private groups."

The New York Times (1/26, Myers, 1.19M) notes, "Putin's "remarks intensified a furor" that "could worsen relations with Britain and other countries as Russia presses its assault on European and American financial support of groups that criticize the Kremlin." Putin "said Russia was still considering whether to expel the four diplomats, all mid-ranking secretaries in the British Embassy, indicating for the first time that they had not yet been expelled or withdrawn, though the espionage that was alleged was reported to have been uncovered last fall."

Google Complies With Chinese Censorship. The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 10, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "Google has launched a new search engine today in China, but in order to do it, it had to agree to restrictions from the communist government." CBS (Gonzales) added, "Just last week, Google stood up to another government, the US government, and refused to turn over personal information the Justice Department wants for its defense of an anti-pornography law." Larry Magid, CBS technology analyst: "The fact that they're making a strong, stand firm with the Justice Department over privacy and then being very loose with the Chinese over censorship, I find a little bit disturbing." Gonzales: "Both decisions actually make good business sense for Google. The company can't afford to spook American users, and it has to get a foothold in the world's largest market."

GOP Lawmaker To Question Google's Move. The Financial Times (1/26, Kirchgaessner) reports, "Google will be called to task in Washington next month following a controversial decision by the internet search engine to launch a China-based version of its website that will censor results to avoid angering the country's Communist government." Rep. Chris Smith's decision "to call for a February 16 hearing to examine the operating procedures of US internet companies in China, represents the first signs of what could become a serious backlash against Google and other internet companies in Washington that are perceived as capitulating to the Chinese government."

Zoellick Sends Message About Strengthening US Relations With China.

The Washington Post (1/26, A16, Cody, 744K) reports that deputy secretary of state Robert Zoellick's appearance with a Chinese panda "was seen at least in part as a signal to China about where he wants to steer U.S.-Chinese relations. The official New China News Agency received his message 10-4. It immediately transmitted a happy photo of Zoellick and Jing Jing around the country, illustrating the government's view that good U.S.-China relations are essential and, in fact, getting better and better." His "gesture, in another reading, could also be seen as a signal of where he stands in the Washington debate about China. Interpreted that way, becoming a public panda-hugger was an eloquent endorsement of the view that engagement with Beijing is the best path for the United States and that China's emergence as an Asian power does not have to mean conflict in the Pacific." Zoellick's trip "also included specific talks on issues that could be seen as a test of the U.S.-Chinese engagement his panda photo was meant to symbolize. These, he said, included China's stand on the effort to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, China's role in diplomacy to persuade North Korea to eliminate its nuclear weapons program and China's currency policies at a time of soaring U.S. trade deficits."

Concerns Raised Chinese Economic Growth May Be Too Rapid. The Washington Post (1/26, D1, Goodman, 744K) reports, "Led by surging exports, China's economy grew by 9.9 percent last year, the government announced Wednesday, underscoring the swiftness by which this once insular communist country has remade itself into a global trading power." But "the news also increased concern that China could be growing too fast, despite measures aimed at cooling the hottest parts of the economy. Aggressive investment has produced too many factories, heightening trade tensions with the United States as China exports surplus wares such as steel, depressing prices globally. Chinese officials worry that unneeded plants could deliver a crippling era of deflation -- falling prices -- which hurts profits and reduces incentives for companies to invest. Such a syndrome kept Japan mired in recession and unemployment for much of the past 16 years."

Report Suggests China Has Fewer AIDS Cases. The New York Times (1/26, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "China countered the long-held suspicion that it has undercounted the number of people with H.I.V. and AIDS by releasing a new, more extensive estimate on Wednesday that found the opposite: that the country had actually overestimated its number of cases." The new WHO and United Nations AIDS program report "lowered the country's estimated number of H.I.V. and AIDS cases to 650,000 from the official figure of 840,000 released by the government in 2003. Many experts and AIDS workers have long believed that China has at least 1.5 million cases, possibly far more, and some expressed skepticism that the new figure was any more reliable than past estimates."

European Commission Proposes "Nordic-Style" Economic Reforms.

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Echikson, 2.11M) reports, "The European Commission presented a new plan to reinvigorate Europe's economies, calling for a Nordic-style, seemingly social-democratic approach rather than an Anglo-Saxon free-market model." The report "gave the most praise to northern European countries that are increasing spending on research and development universities and pursuing interventionist jobs policies." It "also called for the creation of a competitive, continent-wide energy program, and support for small and medium-size businesses." It represents Commission President José Manuel Barroso's attempt to recover the initiative after a tough first year in office. Many of his previous plans for jump-starting Europe's economies have faltered."

Sri Lankan Factions To Resume Peace Talks.

The New York Times (1/26, Senanayake, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports, "In a measure of how intractable this country's ethnic conflict is, the warring parties agreed Wednesday to begin talking to each other again, after more than 18 months of deadlock over a site for peace talks and with scores of killings in the meantime." The negotiations "would focus on strengthening an all-but-ineffectual four-year-old cease-fire agreement. They are scheduled to take place in Geneva, starting as early as February." While "modest," the agreement "represents a major breakthrough in the decade-long war."

African Worshipers Mix Islam With Christianity.

The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, McLaughlin, 61K) reports that "worshipers at 'The True

DOJ_NMG_0141974

Message of God Mission' say it's entirely natural for Christianity and Islam to coexist, even overlap. They begin their worship by praying at the Jesus alcove and then 'running their deliverance' - sprinting laps around the mosque's mosaic-tiled courtyard, praying to the one God for forgiveness and help. They say it's akin to Israelites circling the walls of Jericho - and Muslims swirling around the Ka'ba shrine in Mecca." The group represents "a window on an ongoing religious ferment in Africa. It's still up for debate whether this group, and others like it, could become models for Muslim-Christian unity worldwide or whether they're uniquely African. But either way, they are 'part of a trend,' says Dana Robert, a Boston University religion professor."

Villagers Flee Nigerian Troops. The New York Times/Reuters (1/26) reports, "Villagers fled Nigeria's lawless delta on Wednesday amid fears of military reprisals after a wave of attacks on foreign oil companies by ethnic Ijaw militiamen." Reuters adds, "The army deployed more troops to major installations, and oil companies tightened security around offices a day after heavily armed men stormed the headquarters of the Italian oil firm Agip, robbing a bank on the premises and killing eight policemen and a civilian."

Annan Denies Arranging Deal For Son's Car. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Farley, 958K) reports that after his son, Kojo Annan, agreed to reimburse Ghana for the import duties on a car he misidentified as belonging to his father, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan "welcomed news of his son's move. 'It was the right thing to do. … He knew I wanted him to sort it out, clean it up. It was between him, his lawyer and the government." Asked if "he, as secretary-general, secured the tax break for his son, Annan said, 'Absolutely not. It was done behind my back.'"

Former Surfer Volunteers For International Disaster Relief. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 11, 2:20, Wright) reported, "The remarkable story of one American making so much of a difference. He was a laidback, California surfer, until he saw the damage done by the tsunami" ABC (Wright): "If relief organizations had special forces, Matt George would be a Green Beret. He's a one-man trauma ward, in what may be the coldest clinic on earth. A builder doing what he calls extreme home makeovers. And he delivers supplies where no aid workers have gone before."

Pinochet's Daughter Seeks Asylum In US. The Washington Post (1/26, A20, Reel, Constable, 744K) reports, "The oldest daughter of the former Chilean dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet was detained Wednesday at Dulles International Airport outside Washington, where she requested political asylum, a Chilean official said." Lucia Pinochet "had been served with a subpoena over the weekend in Chile, along with her mother and three siblings. They had been ordered to appear in court on Monday…on tax fraud charges connected to a probe of her father's illegal bank accounts." A DHS spokesman "said she was in U.S. custody at the airport in Virginia 'pending resolution of her immigration status.'" And "Chile's Interior Minister, Francisco Vidal, said U.S. Ambassador Craig Kelly informed his government that Pinochet, sought on an international arrest warrant, had requested asylum. U.S. officials said they could not comment on that issue."

Success Of Bush Allies In War In Iraq Contrasted With Opponents' Downfall. Columnist Mark Steyn in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) writes, "Remember the conventional wisdom of 2004? Back then, you'll recall, it was the many members of George Bush's 'unilateral' coalition who were supposed to be in trouble, not least the three doughty warriors of the Anglosphere -- the president, Tony Blair and John Howard -- who would all be paying a terrible electoral price for lying their way into war in Iraq. The Democrats' position was that Mr. Bush's rinky-dink nickel-&-dime allies didn't count: The president has 'alienated almost everyone,' said Jimmy Carter, 'and now we have just a handful of little tiny countries supposedly helping us in Iraq.' (That would be Britain, Australia, Poland, Japan . . .) Instead of those nobodies, John Kerry pledged that, under his leadership, 'America will rejoin the community of nations' -- by which he meant Jacques Chirac, Gerhard Schröder, the Belgian guy." But now "Bush, Blair, Howard and Koizumi are all re-elected, while Mr. Chirac is the lamest of lame ducks, and his ingrate citizenry have tossed out his big legacy, the European Constitution; Mr. Schröder's government was defeated and he's now shilling for Russia's state-owned Gazprom ('It's all about Gaz!'); and the latest member of the coalition of the unwilling to hit the skids is Canada's Liberal Party, which fell from office on Monday. John Kerry may have wanted to 'rejoin the community of nations.' Instead, 'the community of nations' has joined John Kerry, windsurfing off Nantucket in electric-yellow buttock-hugging Lycra, or whatever he's doing these days."

WSJournal Honors Memory Of Free Market Leader Of Hong Kong. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) editorializes, "Hong Kong's prosperity since World War II is sometimes referred to as a 'miracle.' But miracles require the intervention of a deity, whereas Hong Kong's remarkable economic growth between 1945 and its handover to China in 1997 owes a great deal to the nonintervention of a mortal man, John James Cowperthwaite, who died over the weekend at the age of 90." As Financial Secretary from

1961-1971, Cowperthwaite "was the architect and guardian of the greatest natural experiment in free-market capitalism in the postwar world." The Journal concludes, "Other would-be central planners could learn a lot from what John Cowperthwaite didn't do."

NYTimes Applauds African Union Rejection Of Sudan Leadership. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) editorializes, "The African Union did the right thing in rejecting Sudan's bid for the rotating presidency of the organization. Allowing President Omar Hassan al-Bashir of Sudan to become Africa's face to the world would have sent just about every wrong message imaginable." But while "rebuffed for now, Mr. Bashir was promised the group's presidency in 2007, and for now the chair will go to the Congo Republic, hardly a model of human rights. Giving Sudan the African Union presidency next year will be just as unacceptable as it was this year."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senators Predict Congress Will Establish Military Commissions For Detainees Soon. The Financial Times (7/3, Alden) reports, "The US Congress looks set to co-operate with President George W. Bush in devising rules for military commissions to try alleged terrorist detainees. This follows last week's historic Supreme Court decision that struck down the president's claim that he could set the rules on his own authority." US lawmakers' reaction to the ruling dominated the Sunday political shows. GOP Sen. Arlen Specter, appearing on CBS's Face the Nation (7/2, Schieffer), said, "The Judiciary Committee had hearings on Guantanamo last June. And I made a trip there, and it's been apparent to us for some time that the Supreme Court was going to impose some restrictions. And we had legislation ready to go. And I think that we should now have hearings in the Judiciary Committee, which we've scheduled for July 11th." M The Washington Times (7/3, Pfeiffer) notes Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, "told CBS that his panel will 'have hearings in a couple of weeks.'"

Sen. Lindsey Graham, also a Republican, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace) said, "I think what we will do this month, I hope, is to get some input from the great legal minds of our time, particularly military lawyers, retired and active duty military judge advocates. … And I would hope Congress would have hearings about what to do in light of this decision and that we will sit down together…in August, write legislation and hopefully vote by September."

The New York Times (7/3, Toner) "both parties were treading carefully in a political and legislative terrain suddenly reconfigured by the Supreme Court. Most leaders on Sunday pledged bipartisan cooperation, but some fault lines were clear." Democratic Sen. Charles E. Schumer "said on 'Meet the Press' on NBC that 'this White House has felt it could just change things unilaterally.' Mr. Schumer added, 'Had they come to Congress a few years ago on this issue, my guess is they would have gotten most of what they wanted.'" But "in light of the court ruling, Mr. Schumer called on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to create an independent commission to conduct 'a top-to-bottom legal review of all of the administration's ongoing antiterror measures.'" USA Today (7/3) reports "senior Democrats called for a broader review of whether Bush overstepped his war powers," and notes Schumer's comments.

On ABC's This Week (7/2, Stephanopoulos), Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein said, "This is the time for the Congress to come together, both political parties, and we can do this, and the President, and work out the parameters of whether it is a special authorized commission, whether it is a military tribunal. But that gives the detainees the rights that the Constitution provides, and this is our strength. It is not our weakness." And Democratic Sen. Jack Reed, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace), said, "The President declared that he essentially was operating in his own capacity as commander in chief, and I think the court reined him back, and I think it's appropriate. … What it insists is that the President come to the Congress and in a deliberate fashion and a democratic fashion we give him the authority that he needs."

In an analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (6/3, Schmitt) says the ruling "has apparently presented the Bush administration and its allies in Congress with two choices -- both fraught with risk. They can use the GOP majorities in the House and Senate to put a quick congressional seal of approval on something close to the existing system, but run the risk that it too will be struck down by the high court." Or "they can follow the path suggested by the court and devise a system embracing the procedural and other principles of the U.S. Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Convention, but risk the possibility that few, if any, of the alleged terrorists will be convicted." And "both choices, as well as attempts to chart a middle course, could set off the kind of protracted, internally divisive debate that the White House and GOP political strategists would not relish with the November elections approaching."

McCain Contends "All Of Us" Would Like To See Guantanamo Shut Down. Sen. John McCain, on ABC's This Week (7/2, Stephanopoulos), said, "All of us and the president has said he'd like to see Guantanamo shut down, but it's not Guantanamo itself, it's the status of these detainees. And I believe that if we use the Supreme Court decision correctly, we will move forward and adjudicate these cases."

Experts Offer Tips On Complying With Court Ruling On Guantanamo Tribunals. Time (7/10, Thornburgh) reports that the Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld says that if the Bush Administration wants to hold special military tribunals to try terrorism suspects at Guantnamo Bay, "it can't just declare them legal -- it needs to work with the other branches of government to make them so." Time notes that while the ruling was a "rebuke to the Administration's claim that it alone can decide how to defend Americans from terrorism," the High Court did not say "Guantnamo has to be closed. In fact, there are plenty of people who believe it's possible to comply with the court's ruling while protecting American citizens and extracting useful intelligence from detainees." Time lists several ways the Administration can fix Guantanamo, including working with Congress, repatriating the "small fish," who have been determined not to have committed any hostile act against Americans or their allies, processing the habeas corpus cases, living by the Geneva rules and lifting the "veil of secrecy" over the prison.

Bush, GOP Seen As Likely To Utilize Hamdan Decision As Campaign Issue. The Washington Post's Dana Milbank, on The Chris Matthews Show (7/2, Matthews) said, "Bush will be celebrating Hamdan the way the Muslims celebrate Ramadan. … Now he can campaign against the Supreme Court, they can put legislation before the congress that gives him exactly what he wants, force the democrats to vote against them and say 'those guys want to release all the terrorists.' It's going to be the 2002 and 2004 campaign all over again." Later in the program Milbank added, "It's Max Cleland all over again. You need one issue, one sort of wedge, and…this is exactly what the president wants."

The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace), said, "This is going to be a great debate for Republicans in Congress for the next few months. … Democrats are either going to have to basically acknowledge that the president has been right all along by authorizing what he wanted, and they're going to have to rebuke the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Geneva Conventions, or the Democrats are going to be in the position of saying that Al Qaida deserves protections like normal prisoners of war or like normal people in the American justice system."

WSJournal Says Case Should Be Election Issue. The Wall Street Journal (7/3) editorializes, "The Court's opinion masks its own power grab by asserting that the executive must defer more to Congress in designing military commissions." But "the Court's own deference to Congress is selective in the extreme, as it simply chose to ignore the clear intent of the Detainee Treatment Act that Congress passed only last December." The Journal adds, "We…certainly hope the Administration presses its case for military commissions to the Congress, including just how much due process protection the Members think al Qaeda detainees really deserve. An election is coming in which the prosecution of the war on terror will again be a major issue. By all means let's debate the proper care and handling of Osama's bodyguard."

GOP Lawmakers Blast Court's Interpretation Of Geneva Convention. The AP (7/3, Yost) reports, "Two Republican senators said Sunday that Congress must rein in the Supreme Court ruling that international law applies to the Bush administration's conduct in the war on terror." On Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace) Sen. Lindsey Graham criticized the "Geneva Convention aspects" of the Hamdan decision, calling them "breathtaking." Graham argued that the "question for this country is should Al Qaida members who do not sign up to the Geneva Convention, who show disdain for it, who butcher our troops, be given the protections of a treaty they're not part of. My opinion -- no. They should be humanely treated, but the Geneva Convention cannot be used in the war on terrorists to give the terrorists an opportunity to basically come at us hard without any restrictions on how we interrogate and prosecute."

Sen. Mitch McConnell, on NBC's Meet The Press (7/2, Mitchell) said, "a very disturbing aspect of the decision was that the court held common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions applicable to American servicemen. Now this means that American servicemen potentially could be accused of war crimes. I think Congress is going to want to deal with that as well when it enacts these military commissions, and I think we need to do it soon. And so we'll be dealing with that in the coming weeks. … I think we will have to act on this very soon, either in July or in September. Certainly in the next couple of months."

Rep. Peter King, on CNN's Late Edition (7/2, Roberts) noted that "the Geneva Conventions apply to soldiers of established armies, of established governments, not to terrorists who are on the run, who are basically rag-tag operations and do not swear allegiance to a particular country. … Because if we apply the Geneva Convention to them, that means all you ask them is their name, rank and serial number."

Kristol Says Court Committed "Act Of Judicial Imperialism." The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace), added, "What the court did find -- let's just be literal about this -- is that Common Article III of the Geneva Conventions applies to Al Qaida. That is a breathtaking finding. It is contrary to every understanding of what that article has meant for the last 50 years. It is a pure act of judicial imperialism. … And I think the Congress is going to have to repudiate the court."

Stevens Opinion Said To Reflect 1946 Ruling Penned By Rutledge. The Washington Post (7/3, A19, Lane) reports in its "Full Court Press" column, "Justice John Paul Stevens wrote last week's Supreme Court opinion striking down President Bush's plan to put suspected terrorists on trial before military commissions. But in a real sense, the opinion's author was Wiley B. Rutledge, the justice for whom Stevens clerked during the court's 1947-1948 term, and for whom he has expressed great admiration in the years since." Rutledge's "most famous dissenting opinion came in 1946, when he wrote that the majority of the court was wrong to deny a petition for habeas corpus by Tomoyuki Yamashita, the Japanese general sentenced to death by a U.S. military commission in the Philippines for atrocities committed by his troops. … It is hard to imagine anyone less popular in the United States than Yamashita. But the man whose case was before the court last week, Osama bin Laden's former aide, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, might qualify. Nevertheless, Stevens defended not Hamdan, but Hamdan's rights."

GOP Intensifies Criticism Of Media Over Anti-Terrorism Program Leaks.

The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 4, 2:20, Mitchell) reported, "A battle between the press and the White House is heating up tonight." CBS (Calvi) added Rep. Peter King has "cosponsored a congressional resolution condemning press reports that revealed a secret government program. The program was designed to monitor millions of bank transactions to try to catch terrorists." President Bush (Wednesday): "There can be no excuse for anyone entrusted with vital intelligence to leak it and no excuse for any newspaper to print it." Calvi: "'The Wall Street Journal,' 'The New York Times' and the 'Los Angeles Times' all reported on the surveillance program on the same day, but it's been 'The New York Times' that's been the focus of criticism, including by the editorial page of the 'Wall Street Journal.'" Bill Keller, Executive Editor, "The New York Times": "The 'Times' is an easy target for conservatives partly because our opinion pages tend to be pretty tough on the Bush Administration." Calvi: "Now, the Administration is considering its options." Rep. King "tells CBS News he'll be asking the Attorney General to investigate how the information was obtained by the 'Times' and file criminal charges against any leakers and reporters who refuse to reveal those sources."

McCain Calls For Prosecution Of Terror Money Tracking Program Leakers. The New York Post (7/3, Orin) reports that Sen. John McCain has ""joined the chorus of critics who say The New York Times was wrong to out a top-secret terror money-tracking program, and he called for prosecuting the leakers." Speaking on ABC's This Week, McCain said, "Tracking the money is always a vital tool, and members of Congress were kept informed and agreed to this program," adding, "So, no, I don't think [the Times] should have published it." The Post adds, "McCain also challenged the Times' claim that it didn't reveal any real secrets, saying, 'If The New York Times thinks the story was inconsequential, the legitimate question is: Why was it on the front page?' Asked if the Times should be prosecuted, McCain replied, 'I think we should go after the leakers first.'"

Document Outlines Bali Bombers' Final Hours.

The New York Times (7/3, Bonner) reports from Indonesia on "the playbook for a suicide bombing, including even a minute-by-minute choreography of the bombers' final hours. The Indonesian police uncovered the document from the computer of one of the planners of an attack last October in Bali, which killed 20 people when three men walked into separate restaurants and blew themselves up." The document "offers a rare glimpse into the minds of the most cunning terrorist plotters and of the kind of meticulous planning that lies behind their operations. It also shows what even a small, local group with few resources can do, and the difficulty of thwarting their plans." The 34-page document, titled "The Bali Project," was "found on the computer of Azhari Husin, a Malaysian-born engineer educated in Australia and Britain who became a master bomb maker and was one of the most dangerous terrorists in Southeast Asia until he was killed in a shootout with the police last November." The document "was given to The New York Times by a person who requested anonymity because it had not been officially released. It was first reported on by Tempo, an English-language weekly newsmagazine here."

WSJournal Says Islamists Should Not Turn Somalia Into Refuge For Terrorists. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/3) says, "There's no appetite in the US for a large military intervention in Somalia, but that doesn't mean the new regime should think it is immune from outside attention. So here's a suggestion: Send an emissary to the new Islamist government and propose a deal: Hand over the 1998 embassy bombers, refuse safe harbor to al Qaeda operatives, do not invade Somaliland and Puntland. Agree to that, and we will be able to get along. Don't agree, and the US will do what it must to disrupt any terrorist camps or terrorist activity within its borders. … The Somali Islamists need to understand that if they attempt to turn their country into another refuge for terrorists, it will end as badly for them as it did for the Taliban."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

L.A. Police Chief, Others, To Press Homeland Security For Greater Sharing Of Intelligence. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Winton, McGreevy) reported, "Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton said Friday that he and other big-city police chiefs will meet this month with top Homeland Security officials amid complaints that the federal agency isn't doing enough to share information with local law enforcement nationwide." Bratton said it is not so much that DHS doesn't "share intelligence," but that "they don't have intelligence." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke described the upcoming meeting as "an opportunity for the secretary to sit down with the chiefs of police for major cities and talk about information sharing." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "wants to 'listen to the concerns of the police chiefs and personally work to address the concerns,'" said Knocke.

The AP (7/1) reported that Bratton said, "The good news is: We've seen some significant improvements in intelligence provided over the last year." The AP continued that Knocke "said that last year the federal agency provided more than 1,200 bulletins, notices and other dispatches to local law enforcement agencies." However, he added that DHS is "the first to say there is more work to be done."

WRC-TV Washington, DC (6/30) reported on its website that DC Police Chief Charles Ramsey is among those "complaining about a lack of information sharing during terror threats." Ramsey told NBC4 that he had sent a letter to Secretary Chertoff "and he has agreed to meet sometime in July along with out key staff people, and I'll have some of the police chiefs who are also concerned. Then we'll sit down and talk about it."

WAR NEWS:

Sunni Lawmakers Boycott Iraqi Parliament. The New York Times (7/3, Semple) reports, "The main Sunni Arab political bloc began a boycott of Parliament on Sunday to protest the kidnapping of a Sunni legislator and threatened to withdraw its members from the prime minister's cabinet unless the lawmaker was freed within the next 48 hours." The "walkout" was "the first serious disruption in Iraq's new government and reflected the fragility of the power-sharing arrangement in the face of the relentless sectarian violence overwhelming the nation." The legislator, Tayseer Najah al-Mashhadani, and eight of her guards "were kidnapped by people suspected of being Shiite militiamen on Saturday while driving into Baghdad from her home north of the capital."

The Washington Post (7/3, A15, Partlow) reports, "The decision by the Sunni Accord Front, which holds 44 seats in the 275-member parliament, threatens to pull the legislature apart." Sunni legislators "blamed the abduction on Shiite-led militias aligned with the majority political parties in Iraq. Some accused the Iraqi security forces, who were near the kidnapping site in the Shaab neighborhood, of standing by and allowing Mashhadani's convoy to be captured." The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Roug) also reports the story.

Iraqi Government Publishes "Most Wanted List." The Financial Times (7/3, Negus) reports, "The Iraqi government on Sunday published a "most wanted" list topped by family and former associates of deposed president Saddam Hussein who reportedly finance and direct the insurgency." The list, "planned in parallel with the government's national reconciliation plan – suggests that the government considers a reconstructed Ba'ath party to be its most dangerous foe."

The AP (7/3, Juhi) notes Saddam's "wife and eldest daughter are among 41 people on the Iraqi government's most wanted list, along with the new leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, a top official announced Sunday." Saddam's wife, Sajida Khairallah Tulfah, "was No. 17, just behind the ousted leader's eldest daughter, Raghad. Sajida is believed to be in Qatar, and Raghad lives in Jordan, where she was given refuge by King Abdullah II."

ABC World News Tonight (7/2, lead story, 2:50, Brown) reported, "Remember the deck of cards the US military put out just after the war? Most of those have since been killed or captured, and the violence continued. The list of 41 names was released by the national security adviser here, who said they're all killers. And will be hunted down, one by one. He said the international police agency, Interpol, has been informed." Mouwafak Al-Rubaie, Iraqi National Security Adviser: "This list shows those who are trying to destroy our country." The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 3, 1:55, Cowan) said it was "the latest step in the government's security crackdown that has failed so far to stem the violence in Iraq."

Violence Continues In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 2, 0:10, Mitchell) reported, "Another bloody day in Iraq. South of Baghdad, four were killed and 22 wounded after a bomb went off. This one day after a car bomb in a Baghdad market killed more than 60."

Further Details Of Alleged Iraq Rape Surface. The Washington Post (7/3, Knickmeyer) reports the version of the alleged rape and murders by US GIs told by a neighbor, Omar Janabi. It gives the victim's age as 15 and contains his account of finding the family's bodies, as well as graphic descriptions of the bodies from death certificates. The Post writes, "The case is at least the fourth American military investigation announced since March of alleged atrocities by U.S. forces in Iraq. The rape allegation makes the Mahmudiyah case potentially incendiary in Iraq. Rape is seen as a crime smearing the honor of the family as well as the victim in conservative communities here."

Senate Intelligence Committee "Statements" Investigation Stalled. In the National Review (7/17), Byron York says the Senate Intelligence Committee "is engaged in a protracted investigation of the public statements of President Bush, Vice President Cheney, top administration officials, lawmakers in the House and Senate, and even officials of previous administrations to determine whether they exaggerated, cherry-picked, misrepresented, or otherwise manipulated intelligence in the run-up to the war." But it is "not going well. In fact, the 'statements investigation' is the main roadblock to completion of what is called 'Phase Two' of the committee's probe of pre-war intelligence." After Democrats "first proposed to investigate only Bush administration officials," Chairman Pat Roberts "pointed out that many members of Congress, as well as many members of the Clinton administration, had also made statements about Iraq's supposed WMD capabilities." But Roberts added when "senators evaluate each statement in light of the intelligence that was available at the time, he proposed, they should do so blindly — that is, not knowing the identity of the speaker, so they would not allow any biases to influence their judgment on the appropriateness or inappropriateness of the statement." It would "not be an exaggeration to say that Democrats — behind the scenes, of course — went bonkers over that suggestion." What had "started as a way to criticize the Bush administration threatened to backfire on Democrats."

Bush Seen As Uninterested In Seeking Democratic Support For Iraq Policy. In the New Republic's TRB column (7/10), Peter Beinart says, "Why doesn't George W. Bush want to win in Iraq? Seriously. The past several weeks have forced him to choose between two big goals: Demonizing Democrats to help the GOP retain control of Congress and fostering a domestic climate that gives the new Iraqi government the best chance to survive. And, again and again, he has chosen door number one." Swallowing the concessions needed from the US to secure the Iraqi government "will require a bipartisan bargain -- the kind of ceasefire required for difficult domestic changes like reforming Social Security or the tax code." But "over the past several weeks, President Bush has done exactly the opposite. Rove and company immediately wielded Zarqawi's death as a partisan club, saying that, if Democrats had their way, he'd still be loose."

Raid Reveals Tensions Between US Forces, Afghan Government. The New York Times (7/3, Gall) reports from Kabul, "A joint military raid by American and Afghan forces on an unobtrusive house here in the capital on March 20 has pointed up the tensions between the American military and the Afghan Defense Ministry over the conduct of counterinsurgency raids, particularly in Kabul, the Afghan defense minister says." The raid "was led by masked American special forces, and included eight members of a unit of the Afghan National Army. The involvement of Afghan soldiers prompted the defense minister, Gen. Abdur Rahim Wardak, who had no advance notice of the raid, to bar Afghan Army personnel from taking part in any raids on houses or compounds."

Two British Soldiers Killed. The Washington Post (7/3, A16, Tran) reports, "An insurgent attack on a British base killed two soldiers and an Afghan interpreter, military officials said Sunday, while at least 20 insurgents were killed in clashes and coalition airstrikes." An AH-64 Apache attack helicopter "crashed Saturday in an accident in southern Afghanistan, killing one crew member, the US military said."

Pakistani Journalist Sees Dire Situation In Afghanistan. Ahmed Rashid, a Pakistani journalist, writes in the Washington Post (7/3, A21), "The current political and military meltdown in Afghanistan was entirely predictable and avoidable. For the past three years Afghans, their president, Hamid Karzai, and foreign experts have been warning that the failure of the United States and the international community to provide sufficient economic, military and reconstruction resources to the fledgling Afghan government would lead to a Taliban resurgence and disillusionment among the Afghan people. That is exactly what has happened." But "there is still a way out of the mess if the international community and the Afghans pull together, rather than being at odds with one another. Karzai set the ball rolling late last month by calling for a joint strategy in a critical meeting with the most important foreign players in Kabul." Rashid adds the UN Security Council "needs to give the UN officials in Kabul the responsibility for coordinating the international response to the crisis and economic and political strategies with the Afghan government."

US Military Faces Shortfall In Special Forces Troops. USA Today (7/3, Brook) reports, "The Army, Navy and Air Force face shortages of elite special operations forces that are playing a leading role in the war against terrorism, military records show." The shortfall of Army special operations, Navy SEALs and Air Force "combat controllers persists as the Pentagon seeks to expand the forces by 15% over the next four years to bolster the anti-terrorism campaign. One reason for the shortage is the intense training. The Navy says only 35 of 166 candidates will qualify as SEALs." USA Today adds, "Retention also is a problem. Some veterans can make $780 a day as civilian security contractors in Iraq, says Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J., chairman of a House Armed Services subcommittee that oversees special operations troops. Bonuses as high as $150,000 have helped stanch that loss, he says."

Pentagon Officers Said To Be Resisting Rumsfeld, Cheney On Iran Bombing Plans. In the New Yorker (7/10-17), Seymour Hersh writes that included with the Bush White House's offer to Iran to negotiate over its nuclear program if it suspended its uranium enrichment program included "an unspoken threat: The US Strategic Command, supported by the Air Force, has been drawing up plans, at the President's direction, for a major bombing campaign in Iraq. Inside the Pentagon, senior commanders have increasingly challenged the President's plans, according to active duty and retired officers and officials." Senior officers "have told the Administration that the bombing campaign will probably not succeed in destroying Iran's nuclear program. They have also warned that an attack could lead to serious economic, political, and military consequences for the US." A retired four star general, "who ran a major command, said, 'The system is starting to sense the end of the road, and they don't want to be condemned by history. They want to be able to say, 'We stood up.'" The New Yorker adds the "discord over Iran can, in part, be ascribed to Rumsfeld's testy relationship with the generals. They see him as high-handed and unwilling to accept responsibility for what has gone wrong in Iraq." But Rumsfeld is "not alone in the Administration where Iran is concerned; he is closely allied with Dick Cheney, and," a Pentagon consultant said, "'the President generally defers to the Vice President on all these issues,' such as dealing with the specifics of a bombing campaign if diplomacy fails."

Iran Rejects Western Deadline On Nuclear Proposal. The New York Times (7/3, Fathi) reports, "Iran on Sunday again rejected a deadline to respond to an international proposal to end the standoff over its nuclear program, saying it would respond a month. 'We do not consider such statements as constructive and invite them to wait for our answer until next month,' said Hamidreza Assefi, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, the ISNA news agency reported. The next month in the Iranian calendar begins July 23." Assefi "was responding to a statement made at a meeting of the Group of 8's foreign ministers on Thursday in Russia, during which they demanded Iran make a 'clear and substantive' response to the proposal in a week. P resident Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had previously said Iran would give its answer around Aug. 23."

Iran To Cut Refined Oil Imports, Ration Gasoline. The Washington Times (7/3, Mihailescu) reports, "Iran, which relies on imports for almost half its refined petroleum products, plans to halt those imports and introduce gasoline rationing later this year, the government announced." The decision "appears related to a plan to allow the nation's heavily subsidized gasoline to spike in price in order to reduce the smuggling of fuel to neighboring countries, a practice that aggravates shortages and costs the country billions of dollars every year."

DOJ:

Kennedy Emerges As Swing Vote On High Court. The Christian Science Monitor (7/3, Richey) notes that with the addition of President Bush's two nominees, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, the supreme Court "has grown more conservative." The Monitor also notes that Justice Anthony Kennedy "will likely decide how far to the right the law moves under the new lineup of justices at the nation's highest court." According to the Monitor, "In years past, Kennedy shared the swing-vote designation with O'Connor. But with her departure he occupies the court's decisive center alone. That puts Kennedy in an even more powerful position than O'Connor, legal analysts say. … Kennedy's power was on full display last week when he joined the court's liberal wing to forcefully strike down President Bush's plan to put terror suspects on trial before military commissions at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba."

Roberts Court Seen As Less Contentious Than Rehnquist's. Time (7/10, Rosen) reports that that Supreme Court's first year under Chief Justice John Roberts "has not been ordinary. As evidenced last week when the court struck down the Bush Administration's use of military tribunals, the Justices are suddenly unafraid to talk to one another in personal terms." By the time the Court adjourned for the summer, "the usual decorous costume drama that is a Supreme Court term had morphed into something much closer -- in vitriol, tension and drama -- to a soap opera." Time notes, however, that despite "the impression left by its rush of final decisions, the Roberts court is, at least so far, less fractured than the court led for 19 years by William Rehnquist. Almost half its decisions this year had no dissents, compared with 38% in Rehnquist's final term, and the tally of 16 cases decided by a 5-to-4 vote is seven fewer than under Rehnquist."

GOP To Focus On Judicial Confirmations. The Washington Times (7/3, Hurt) reports, "In coming weeks, Republicans on Capitol Hill plan for the first major push on judges since Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. were confirmed to the Supreme Court." In "the nearly six months since Justice Alito was confirmed, only 14 federal judges have been seated." That's "the slowest six-month period since early 2004, according to documents kept by the Department of Justice's Office of Legal Policy." The Times adds, "The plans for renewed emphasis on judges comes after a consortium of conservative leaders expressed deep displeasure with both the White House and Republican leaders on Capitol Hill in recent months over the slowed pace of confirmations." The conservatives wrote "a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell and other Republican leaders in the body." The "83 signers of the letter…include such conservative icons as Paul Weyrich, Alan Keyes, Richard Viguerie, Abigail Thernstrom, David A. Keene, L. Brent Bozell III and Bill Donohue."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Impact Of US Abramoff Probe Into Ex-Guam Governor Remains Unclear. The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/3, Kang) reports, "The fallout over the federal investigation of a possible link between disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Democratic Gov. Carl Gutierrez remains unclear. The U.S. Department of Justice on Friday issued a report on the replacement of Frederick Black as the island's U.S. Attorney, in which lobbyist Jack Abramoff told investigators he was helping Gutierrez get rid of Black. Gutierrez on Saturday denied those allegations. Former Guam delegate and Democratic gubernatorial candidate Robert Underwood, in a phone interview from Seattle, said the case warrants further investigation. In particular, he said, inquiries should be made into whether Abramoff received monetary compensation of any kind and where that money might have come from. Gutierrez on Saturday said he nor his administration never paid Abramoff for any lobbying efforts." Underwood "went on to say that if any additional information of a conspiratorial nature is revealed in subsequent investigations, those responsible should be prosecuted. Accountable 'First of all, the voters should hold them accountable and secondly the law should hold them accountable,' he said."

The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/3, Daleno) reports Gutierrez "praised a recently released federal investigation into the removal of former acting U.S. Attorney Fred Black, saying Black's smear of his replacement, Leonardo Rapadas, is a 'prime example of his operations.' Gutierrez yesterday released a written statement responding to the report, accusing Black of blocking local attempts at self-government. During a Saturday interview with the Pacific Daily News, Gutierrez denied statements in the Department of Justice report that lobbyist Jack Abramoff was working on his behalf to get Black removed." Gutierrez "acknowledged meeting with Abramoff during a dinner in the nation's capital, where the topic of Black's nomination came up, but he did not elaborate on what happened after that, saying only that he found it 'interesting' that Abramoff wanted to meet him. A Justice Department Office of Inspector General report, released Friday in Washington, D.C., states that Abramoff told federal investigators he began working on behalf of Gutierrez, who was governor at the time, to lobby for the removal of Black when certain Gutierrez administration officials were under federal investigation."

The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/2, Limtiaco) reports, "Former Democratic Sen. Mark Charfauros yesterday acknowledged that he probably was lobbyist Jack Abramoff's closest friend on Guam, but he disputed a U.S. Department of Justice report released yesterday." Charfauros said he "did ask his friend Abramoff for help in securing a confirmed U.S. Attorney for Guam, but said he was not working with Gutierrez on the matter and did not send the e-mail stated in the report. 'No way. I'd like to see that e-mail. That didn't happen. I never filed any kind of e-mail, saying that nominations are gonna come out of Carl Gutierrez. Carl Gutierrez had nothing to do with this whole issue,' Charfauros said." The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/2, Daleno, Tamondong) reports Abramoff "has told federal investigators and said in e-mails that he worked on behalf" of Gutierrez to remove Black.

Tenet CEO Faces Challenge Of Moving On After Settlement With DOJ. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Rundle) reports Trevor Fetter "inherited a financial and legal morass in 2003, when he took the top job at Tenet Healthcare Corp., the big hospital operator. Now, with most of the company's legal woes behind him, Mr. Fetter is turning to his next task: moving on." Tenet last week "agreed to pay the Justice Department $725 million to settle a host of investigations, including allegations that it gamed the Medicare system to generate lucrative payments it didn't deserve." Fetter's "biggest challenge will be to persuade doctors to send more patients to Tenet hospitals, many of which languished as Tenet conserved cash in anticipation of the Justice Department settlement. Today, those hospitals lack the latest CT scanners and other high-tech equipment that doctors crave."

Austin Banker Nearing Victory In S&L Case. The Austin American-Statesman (7/3, Elder) reports, "Austin real estate developer Alfred Hughes was close to giddy when he acquired an El Paso savings and loan in 1988. 'We're sitting on top of the world,' he said after federal regulators approved the purchase. 'We're very comfortable working in a regulated environment.' Less than two years later, regulators shuttered El Paso Federal Savings and Loan. For the past 16 years, Hughes has been trying to collect the $46.5 million he says the government cost him by improperly closing and then liquidating the institution. Among the assets Hughes lost when the thrift closed was his ownership of 4,500 acres of Steiner Ranch in western Travis County, now a development of high-end homes." While the "legal battle may roll on, in a continuing echo of the massive savings and loan crisis of the 1980s and early 1990s, Hughes won a big victory last month. Senior Judge James Merow of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims awarded Hughes the full amount, ruling that a 1989 federal law had unfairly imposed new financial requirements on thrifts."

BP Traders Lost $10 Million, Court Documents Show. Bloomberg (7/3) reports, "The three BP Plc traders accused by regulators of attempting to corner the U.S. propane market lost $10 million when they failed to sell their inventory, court documents show. The traders in February 2004 sought to make more than $20 million by holding most of the propane on a pipeline that ships the heating fuel from a hub in Texas to the U.S. Midwest and Northeast, according to transcripts filed June 28 with the U.S. District Court in Illinois by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. Instead, they were stuck with much of the fuel as the market plunged on March 1." BP, "which made $2.8 billion trading oil and gas in 2005, and other oil companies are facing increased scrutiny from U.S. regulators and lawmakers as near-record oil prices have boosted gasoline, heating oil and natural gas prices to records in the past year."

Levin, Coleman Want More Oversight Of Energy Markets. The Financial Times (7/3, Grant) reports United Kingdom energy firm BP, "has suspended three Houston-based traders at the centre of an alleged propane price manipulation scheme, as alarm rose in Washington over the need to police energy markets. Senior US senators have warned congress that 'too many trades' are occurring without regulatory oversight." Sen. Carl Levin said, "It's time to put the cop back on the beat in these markets to make sure ordinary Americans aren't ripped off." The Times adds Levin's "call, in a bipartisan report to congress last week by the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, is the clearest sign yet that lawmakers believe the US energy markets are still open to manipulation years after the collapse of Enron exposed the weakness of lightly regulated energy markets." Sens. Levin and Norm Coleman "urged congress to 'eliminate the Enron loophole' by extending the power of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the US futures industry regulator, to oversee over-the-counter (OTC) energy markets."

Bermuda Unit Said To Be At Center Of Refco Collapse. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Mollenkamp, Mcdonald, Mckay) reports on the failure and bankruptcy filing of hedge fund manager Refco, "one of the largest and swiftest failures in recent Wall Street history. Refco, one of the world's largest commodities brokerages, was a global trading hub for corporations, government agencies, individual clients and hedge funds. And yet its spectacular collapse came out of nowhere." There are "thousands of big and small investors trying to recover about $1.8 billion of assets missing from client accounts." The "inside story of Refco's collapse" is now "emerging in federal bankruptcy-court proceedings in lower Manhattan and in related civil and criminal actions. At its center is Refco Capital Markets Ltd. of Hamilton, Bermuda. Court proceedings have uncovered a host of unusual practices by the Bermuda unit that appear to have contributed both to Refco's rapid growth and to its catastrophic fall."

SEC Sues To End German Bond Investment Scheme. USA Today (7/3, Smith) reports Las Vegas investor Jeffrey Weston "has been snapping up Germany Weimar Republic bonds from the 1920s on the premise that $1,000 in IOUs payable in gold then are today worth about $1 billion apiece," persuading "dozens of investors to give him $7.7 million to purchase the antique certificates, which lost much of their value after Adolf Hitler came to power in 1933." Last week, the Securities and Exchange Commission "said Weston had spun a fantastic tale while spending $2 million of investors' money on a house and cars and tucking away $454,000 more in Swiss bank accounts." The SEC "sued to halt Weston's promotions, freeze his funds and recover what authorities say might be only pennies on the dollar. The FBI and Texas authorities also are investigating, court records show."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Issues New Subpoena For Jefferson Emails. Roll Call (7/3, Bresnahan) reports, "The Justice Department has issued a new subpoena for e-mails from Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who is at the center of an ongoing bribery and corruption investigation." The subpoena, "approved by a federal grand jury in Alexandria, Va., was sent last week to James Eagan, Chief Administrative Officer of the House." The Jefferson probe "is being overseen by the US attorney's office in Alexandria." The subpoena "was read into the Congressional Record on Thursday evening, as required under House rules, but did not specify that Jefferson was the target of the request."

Indictment Seen As Wild Card In Ney's Electoral Chances. USA Today (7/3, Lawrence) reports, "There's often a caveat these days when Ohio Republicans talk about re-election prospects for their embattled congressman, Bob Ney. As state Rep. Clyde Evans put it at a recent GOP barbecue, 'Unless he's indicted, I think he'll do very well.'" Ney "hasn't been charged and says he has done nothing wrong. He also says he'll run even if he's indicted. … Some of Ney's past backers, however, say an indictment would change their votes. Some already are considering a switch to Democrat Zack Space, 45, an attorney and hotel developer from Dover."

Government Corruption Cases Persist In Connecticut. The Washington Post (7/3, A3, Fahrenthold) reports the "past few years have revealed so many tales of graft, malfeasance and all-purpose criminality by public servants in Connecticut that it's hard to choose the most brazen." A "tradition of bad behavior by officeholders persists here, despite numerous prosecutions and attempts at reform. If more proof were needed, it has come in the past few weeks, with three new scandals involving current or former big-city mayors." When Gov. John Rowland "resigned, pleaded guilty and was sentenced in March 2005 to a year and a day in jail, 'everybody thought that was going to be the end of it,' said John M. Orman, a professor of politics at Fairfield University in Fairfield, Conn. Instead, he said, the continuing parade of misdeeds has helped the state live up to a new nickname, 'Corrupticut.'" The Post adds the "recent scandals here include the tearful, nationally televised admission on June 20 by Bridgeport Mayor John M. Fabrizi (D) that he had used cocaine while in office." Other cases "include a former mayor and city council member from Middletown -- who pleaded guilty late last month to fraud for embezzling money from his law clients -- and a new charge against Joseph Santopietro, the former mayor of Waterbury."

Missouri Supreme Court Ruling Alters Rules For Sex Offenders. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/2, Franck) reports, "Thousands of offenders would no longer be required to provide information for Missouri's sex offender registry after a ruling Friday by the Missouri Supreme Court, according to the lawyer behind the litigation. While the high court upheld the constitutionality of the state's sex offender registry law, it ruled that the statute should not apply to nearly all of those convicted of crimes prior to 1995, when the law took effect. One key exception is sexually violent predators, who will stay on the list regardless of when their crimes occurred. Just how many of Missouri's more than 11,000 registered sex offenders would be affected by the ruling was unclear Friday. Tim Hull, a spokesman for the Missouri Highway Patrol, which maintains the list, said officials must review the ruling in detail. But Arthur Benson II, the lawyer who brought the case, estimates that thousands would no longer have to be registered as sex offenders. Currently, the registry includes offenses from 1979 to the present. Crimes committed during more than half of those years would not be included in the registry." Benson said the ruling "addresses 'the height of unfairness' in the current law, which requires people to register even for crimes they committed years before the registry law was conceived."

Denver Post Urges Online Safety Precautions For Minors. The Denver Post (7/3) editorializes, "There has been a great deal of concern recently - among lawmakers, in the courts and in the media - about the dangers faced by children on the Internet. Indeed, the statistics about online predators are frightening. Just in the last three years, 7,600 offenders have been caught and arrested for sexual solicitations. According to a U.S. Department of Justice survey, 1 in 5 girls and 1 in 10 boys admitted to being sexually solicited on the Internet. The Internet has proven to be a riveting tool for children - it provides an incredible opportunity for students to gain a broader view of the world, collect research for school projects, and keep in contact with family and friends. … It doesn't make sense to deal with Internet risks by locking up your children's computer, but it's vital for parents and guardians to monitor their online use. Through awareness, parent-child communication and a few safety precautions, kids and teens can appreciate the benefits of the Internet while dodging most of the dangers."

Irving, Texas, Police May Be Chastised Over Amber Alert. The Dallas Morning News (7/2, Mosier) reports, "The Irving Police Department could face an informal reprimand for issuing an Amber Alert for 2-year-old Elian Majano, who disappeared from a park more than a week ago and is still missing. Evidence of abduction is a requirement for activating the regional alert system, but Police Chief Larry Boyd said there was no such evidence in this case. The task force that runs the local system reviews each alert to determine whether it was warranted. There were 'no signs of abduction, but we couldn't rule it out,' Chief Boyd said."

ABC News Poll Finds 65% Favor Death Penalty For Murder. ABC World News Tonight (7/2, story 6, 0:30, Harris) reported, "Today marks 30 years since the United States Supreme Court ruling that reinstated the death penalty. A new ABC News poll finds that support for capital punishment has fallen over the past decade, but when it comes to the worst crimes, most Americans remain in favor of it: 65% approve of executing people convicted of murder. Since July 2nd, 1976, 1,029 people have been put to death in this country, more than a third of them in Texas."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Hollywood, Florida, May Seek More Time In Religious Discrimination Lawsuit. The Miami Herald (7/3, Wright) reports Hollywood, Florida, "is expected to ask a federal judge today for more time to settle a religious discrimination lawsuit brought against the city by an Orthodox synagogue. Jury selection is scheduled to start at 9 a.m. before Judge Joan Lenard in U.S. District Court in Miami. The city last week offered a last-minute deal to end the five-year dispute with the Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch. Now, the congregation wants time to consider the offer. Even if the settlement is accepted, Hollywood leaders may face a fresh round of lawsuits -- this time from neighbors concerned that the deal would allow the synagogue to expand without their input or city approval."

La Tuna Federal Prison Inmates Claim Rights Violations. The El Paso Times (7/3, Roberts) reports, "Inmates held at the various La Tuna federal prison facilities are convinced they have been denied visits, thrown in 'the hole' for minor infractions and denied access to the prison law library because they went public with a lawsuit claiming the federal Bureau of Prisons isn't following its own procedures. Requests for interviews with two of the inmates have been denied twice by La Tuna officials who said it was for the safety of the prisoners. By mail, those inmates have said they want to be interviewed. In that correspondence, they have claimed they are experiencing retaliation for their lawful actions." But La Tuna spokesman Israel Jacquez said, "That's just simply not true. These guys went to the press. That's their right. ... If we believe a staff member is retaliating against an inmate, no matter how frivolous the allegation may be, it is referred to the office of internal affairs."

Texas Redistricting Verdict Could Result In "Ripple Effect." The Washington Times (7/3, Aynesworth) reports last week's Supreme Court ruling "on the constitutionality of the 2003 Tom DeLay-led Texas redistricting coup was a distinct victory for the Republican Party, but it could spawn some interesting fallout." In order to make the 23rd CD compliant "with the Voting Rights Act, some predict that several additional districts will have to be retooled." Rep. Henry Bonilla said, "Anyone who thinks there isn't going to be a ripple effect when countless counties are traded with other congressional districts is not seeing the big picture." The Times ads the "worst that could happen from the Republican viewpoint, several political analysts say, is that Mr. Bonilla might lose the reconstituted 23rd District."

Hitchens Says Congress Should Not "Waste" More Time On Flag Amendment. Christopher Hitchens writes in Wall Street Journal (7/3) that the "so-called 'flag-burning' amendment should never be allowed to waste any more congressional time. … It's easy enough to boast that 'these colors do not run.' However, those who mistake the symbol for the essence are manifesting not a show of spirit for the former but a pathetic lack of confidence in the latter."

WPost Praises McConnell Stance On Flag Burning Amendment. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the recent Senate debate over a flag burning amendment "managed to bring out some of the worst in politicians of both parties. … If there is a hero in this episode, it is the man who would succeed Mr. Frist as leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Mr. McConnell could have put the amendment over the top by abandoning his opposition. To his credit, he didn't, and he was joined by two other Republicans, Sens. Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) and Robert F.

Bennett (Utah). As Mr. McConnell explained in a column posted on his Senate Web site, 'No act of speech is so obnoxious that it merits tampering with our First Amendment. Our Constitution, and our country, is stronger than that.'"

ANTITRUST:

US Investigating Kosher Slaughterhouses For Possible Antitrust Violations. The Asbury Park Press/AP (7/3) reports, "The federal government is investigating kosher slaughterhouses and suppliers for possible antitrust practices, according to a lawyer for one of the firms. AgriProcessors Inc., the world's largest kosher slaughterhouse, received a grand jury subpoena requesting documents and was cooperating with the investigation, attorney Nathan Lewin said Friday." It was "not immediately clear exactly how many slaughterhouses and suppliers were involved in the probe. The U.S. Department of Justice did not immediately return a phone call for comment from The Associated Press late Friday."

Second Quarter Merger Activity Was Prolific. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Berman) reports a "strong first quarter for mergers continued in the second quarter, as deals rolled in from seemingly every sector: Banks, stock exchanges, oil companies, real-estate firms and consumer-products companies. It was one of history's largest and most diverse corporate-buying sprees, with nearly $1 trillion in deals around the world." The "frenetic deal-making produced the third most-active quarter since Thomson Financial began keeping track in 1985. It amounted to more than $916 billion of announced transactions, according to Thomson, up about 35% from about $676 billion a year earlier."

Despite Consolidation, Growth Opportunities Elusive For Commercial Satellite Industry. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Pasztor) reports that while "consolidation and cost cutting have swept across the commercial-satellite industry," the "surviving operators are finding growth opportunities as elusive as ever." Intelsat Ltd. and PanAmSat Holding Corp. "are set to complete a $3.2 billion merger today, creating a closely held company whose fleet of more than 50 orbiting spacecraft will make it the largest and most diversified global satellite-services operator." But in "an industry with huge capital-investment needs and average annual growth rates hovering around 3% or less, the combined company faces major integration, personnel and marketing challenges to break out of that historical slow-growth pattern."

The Washington Post (7/3, D1, Witte) reports Intelsat Ltd. of Washington will "become the world's largest commercial satellite operator today when it completes its purchase of the firm that had been its toughest domestic competitor." The combined company "will lose money. PanAmSat earned $72.7 million last year, but Intelsat lost far more, about $325 million. Already deep in debt, Intelsat is borrowing heavily to finance the purchase."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Agent Came Close To Linking Cole, 9/11 Plots. The New Yorker (7/10-17, Wright) reports on the story Ali Soufan, who, at the time of the attack on the USS Cole in 2000, was "the only FBI agent in the city [New York] who spoke Arabic, and one of only eight in the country." Soufan's language skills, "his relentlessness, and his roots in the Middle East made him invaluable in helping the FBI understand al Qaeda, an organization that few Americans were even aware of before the embassy bombings." During the Cole investigation, an al Qaeda suspect told Soufan "that several months before the Cole attack he and one of the bombers had delivered thirty-six thousand dollars to Khallad, the one-legged al Qaeda lieutenant, in Bangkok. The money," the suspect added, "was meant only to buy Khallad a new prosthesis." But Soufan "was suspicious of this explanation," because "money always flowed toward an operation, not away from it. He wondered if al Qaeda had a bigger plot underway." In November, 2000, "a month after the Cole bombing, Soufan sent the agency the first of several official queries. On Soufan's behalf, the director of the FBI sent a letter to the director of the CIA, formally asking for information about Khallad, and whether there might have been an al Qaeda meeting somewhere in Southeast Asia before the bombing. The agency said that it had nothing." But if the agency "had responded candidly to Soufan's requests, it would have revealed its knowledge of an al Qaeda cell that was already forming inside the US," which eventually became the 9/11 conspiracy.

Post-9/11 Criticism, Private Sector Pay Driving Senior Officials From FBI. Under the headline "An Exodus of Agents," Time (7/10, Bennett, Zagorin) reports in its "Notebook" section, "Office birthday parties must make FBI Director Robert Mueller a little nervous these days." The rumors that Deputy Director John Pistole "was going to bolt for a lucrative job in the private sector" when he turns 50 this month "got so loud that Pistole took it upon himself to assure Mueller that he wasn't leaving," citing, in part, the departure of "so many other senior officials." Time adds, "Years of pummeling by the press and Congress, plus wrenching changes produced by the bureau's shift in focus to antiterrorism, have depressed morale, even in the highest ranks. That has coincided with lucrative employment offers to agents from firms desperate for experienced security chiefs in the wake of 9/11." Time notes, "Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee have been debating whether the brain drain at the FBI poses a threat to national security," and "Mueller seems to agree. When promoting agents to senior-executive levels, he 'is trying to extract some promise as to how long they are willing to stay,' says Michael Mason, who runs the administrative side of the FBI." Sen. Charles Grassley "suggested to TIME that 'the FBI needs to appeal to the patriotic spirit of its senior managers.' But beyond that, the bureau is offering few tangible perks to make working there more attractive. … Mason, however, is optimistic that the new generation of agents will make the sacrifices necessary for the job."

Blagojevich Says He Acted To Identify, Punish Hiring Misconduct. The AP (7/2, D'Alessio) reported, "Gov. Rod Blagojevich insisted Saturday that misconduct in his administration is limited to isolated events by people who are soon punished, even though his own inspector general found a top Blagojevich aide took part in a 'concerted effort' to subvert the law. 'As you police the system, every so often you're going find some people who violate the rules. The test of leadership is what do you do about it? Do you act and do you pursue it? Do you work with other law enforcement agencies to ferret more of it out?' he said. 'Those are the things we've been doing.'" The AP noted, "Blagojevich acknowledges he has been interviewed by the FBI. Prosecutors have issued subpoenas for hiring records and other information from state agencies, but Blagojevich won't say which agencies."

Former Illinois IG Alleged Hiring Fraud Connected To Blagojevich's Office. The Chicago Tribune (7/2, Long, Chase) reported, "Far-reaching allegations of state hiring abuses detailed by the governor's executive inspector general can be summarized in the report's account of one employee who still works at the Illinois Department of Employment Security. George Rada got his job when the agency violated state hiring practices, then he became a key conduit for Gov. Rod Blagojevich's patronage office to improperly influence hiring at the agency, according to the report obtained by the Tribune." The Tribune noted, "The September 2004 report by then-Inspector General Zaldwaynaka 'Z.' Scott said Rada and an associate, Surami 'Sudi' Garcia, effectively ran the human resources division in the agency instead of the personnel directors they served."

Chicago Tribune Hopes Fitzgerald Will Complete Probe Before Election. The Chicago Tribune (7/2) editorialized, "The FBI and the office of Illinois Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan have been digging into reports of state hiring abuses since last year. But Friday's disclosure that the feds have 'implicated multiple state agencies and departments' in politically motivated hiring comes as Blagojevich must stand uneasily for re-election." The "voters deserve what they didn't get in 1998 before Ryan was elected governor: a sense of the nature and sweep of a federal investigation. … Our hope…is that to the extent possible, the federal investigation of the Blagojevich administration either culminates or collapses before voters must make their quadrennial choice." Playing on Blagojevich's prior election pledge, the Tribune added, "What Illinois does need is an end to business as usual."

Longtime Scarpa Girlfriend Emerges As Key Witness Against DeVecchio. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (7/3, Hays, McShane) reports Linda Schiro, longtime girlfriend of Colombo family associate Gregory Scarpa Sr., "has emerged as a key witness against an FBI agent accused in what a prosecutor has labeled one of the worst cases of law enforcement corruption in the nation's history." R. Lindley DeVecchio "allegedly fed Schiro's late boyfriend inside information that led to four mob slayings," but DeVecchio lawyers question her credibility, saying that "her story has changed drastically over time." However, "authorities insist that Schiro's initial reluctance to detail the relationship between the agent and the mob capo was motivated by fears for her life. Only recently was she persuaded to tell the truth, they say."

Judge Waiving DeVeccio House Arrest To Watch Holiday Fireworks. The Washington Post (7/2, A2, Whoriskey) reported Lindley DeVecchio "wants to see fireworks this Fourth of July. Trouble is, he has been charged with four counts of second-degree murder related to some mob slayings" and is "under nightly house arrest in Sarasota, Fla. But to the astonishment of prosecutors, a judge last week granted DeVecchio's request that he be allowed to see the Sarasota fireworks 'in light of the defendant's service to the U.S. government.' DeVecchio is a former FBI agent. 'We've been opposed to the whole bail thing from the beginning,' said Jerry Schmetterer, a spokesman for the district attorney's office in Brooklyn, N.Y."

FBI Investigating West Virginia's "Prince Of Pork." ABC World News Tonight (7/2, story 5, 2:45, Harris) reported in its "Your Money" segment that Rep. Alan Mollohan, dubbed the "Prince of Pork," is "very good at bringing home the bacon for his district. So good, in fact, that the FBI is now taking a hard look at whether this Democrat from West Virginia is breaking the law." ABC (Cochran) noted that Mollohan has earmarked "half a billion dollars over the past ten years" for organizations in his district, and "those dollars provided lucrative contracts and high salaries for his supporters. Investigators want to know whether in return those supporters helped Mollohan become a multimillionaire.

… Mollohan says he inadvertently misstated some transactions but insists he did nothing illegal." Mollohan: "I'm proud of the efforts we've undertaken…and if being the 'Prince of Pork'…merits that designation, then I'm proud of that."

Illinois Man Pleads Guilty To Hoax Terror Threat. The Chicago Tribune (7/2) reported, "A man accused in a terrorism hoax pleaded guilty in the case Friday and faces up to 41 months in prison." Gilbert Romero "in June 2005 told the FBI that a terrorist attack was to be carried out against the Chicago headquarters of a U.S. company. The claim came after Romero was detained in Lake County on state charges, according to his plea agreement."

IMMIGRATION:

Sensenbrenner Suggests Voters Would Punish GOP If Senate Bill Enacted. GOP Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner, in a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (7/3), responds to the Journal editorial "The Tancredo Republicans." Writes the congressman, "House Republicans are committed to enacting border security and immigration legislation, but not if it makes the current situation worse. … In November, voters will judge members of Congress based upon whether they lead with an understanding of voters' concerns, as House Republicans are committed to doing, or whether they ignore voters by enacting legislation, such as the Senate amnesty bill, that the public doesn't support."

House GOP Believes Enforcement-Only Immigration Bill Is Political Winner. In the National Review (7/17), Kate O'Beirne says, "Rather than merely blocking action on a Senate bill they refuse to support, a unified House GOP caucus has decided to go on offense in order to wring the maximum political credit from being on the right side of their reading of public opinion." Because House Republicans "fear the appearance of compromising with a Senate bill they are convinced is wildly unpopular, they have -- according to a leadership aide -- no intention of taking part in a conference to hammer out differences between the House and Senate unless 'there is a sea change in either public or Senate opinion.'" Congressional Republicans "who will be facing the voters are firmly convinced that backing border security now will mean job security in November."

LATimes Criticizes Senate Negotiators. The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Last week saw the first narrowing of the chasm between the Senate's recent comprehensive immigration bill and the House of Representatives' punitive enforcement-only package from December. Trouble is, the overtures are all going in the House's direction. … Pro-reform senators are making two classic negotiating mistakes: confusing their opponents' line-in-the-sand intransigence with a negotiating ploy, and elevating the importance of making a deal above its actual content."

Border Arrests Rose In 2006. The Washington Times (7/3, Seper) reports, "US Border Patrol agents have detained 901,428 foreign nationals seeking to sneak into the United States in the past nine months -- more than 3,300 a day -- up from the 890,358 apprehended in the same period last year." Border Patrol spokesman Michael Friel "said the number of apprehensions, monitored since the Oct. 1 start of fiscal 2006, was a 1 percent increase over detention totals in the first nine months of fiscal 2005. H e also said that although arrests had edged up, the number of apprehended non-Mexicans, known as "other than Mexicans" or 'OTMs,' had declined by about 16 percent."

Mexican Program Uses Remittances To Assist College Students. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 6, 3:35, Mitchell) reported, "Most Mexican immigrants do maintain strong ties with their homeland, sending nearly $20 billion home last year." CBS (Pinkston) added that in Indaparapeo, "many families here depend on money sent by relatives living abroad, but Indaparapeo does something no other community does. In addition to helping individual relatives, the residents of this town and those who have migrated to the US are transforming their entire community, one student at a time." 47 low-income students "are sponsored by an innovative scholarship program funded by Indaparapeans in the United States and operated by residents still living in Mexico." Thanks to "matching funds from the Mexican government, each student receives a monthly stipend of up to 1,500 pesos, about $150, enough to pay for tuition even at some private universities. In exchange, scholarship recipients are required to participate in community service projects such as lending a hand to children with special needs or tutoring high school students in nearby villages. The goal is to connect scholarship recipients more closely to their communities with the hope that they will use their skills in Mexico after graduation."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Name Connaughton To Lead Maritime Administration. The Washington Times (7/3) reports, "Last week, President Bush announced that he would nominate Sean T. Connaughton to lead the Maritime Administration at the Department of Transportation." Connaughton, a lawyer, "unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination for lieutenant governor last year, losing in the primary to William T. Bolling. Mr. Bolling went on to win the seat." Connaughton "has served as a senior transportation associate for the American Petroleum Institute."

Coburn Plan Seeks To Inform Public On Government Spending. The New York Times (7/3, Deparle) reports, "Exasperated by his party's failure to cut government spending, Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, is seeking cyberhelp." Coburn "wants to create a public database, searchable over the Internet, that would list most government contracts and grants -- exposing hundreds of billions in annual spending to instant desktop view. … While advocating for openness, Mr. Coburn is also placing a philosophical bet that the more the public learns about federal spending, the less it will want." Coburn's plan, "hailed by conservatives, is also sponsored by a Democrat, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, and applauded by liberal groups that support activist government. The result is a showcase of clashing assumptions and the oddest of coalitions, uniting Phyllis Schlafly, a prominent critic of gay rights, with the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force." The House "unanimously passed a version of the proposal in late June, though in a form that had drawn outside criticism. The House bill creates a database that would omit contracts, which typically go to businesses, but would include about $300 billion in grants, which usually go to nonprofit groups." Liberal "critics see a revival of what they call old partisan efforts to 'de-fund the left,' by reducing grants to liberal groups or adding conditions that limit their activities."

USDA Program Benefits Farmers Even In Good Years. A front page story in the Washington Post (7/3, Morgan, Cohen, Gaul) reports on the loan deficiency payment, a little-known USDA program that was "intended to boost farmers' incomes when prices are low. The farmers do not have to sell at distressed prices to collect the money. They can bank the government payments and sell when prices are higher. Since September, the program has cost taxpayers $4.8 billion. Most of that money -- $3.8 billion -- went to farmers…who sold at higher prices, according to a Washington Post analysis of USDA payment data." According to the Post, "The LDP has become so ingrained in farmland finances that farmers sometimes wish for market prices to drop so they can capture a larger subsidy."

Feingold, Obama Pushing Senate To Adopt Ethics Reforms As Rules Change. Roll Call (7/3, Newmyer) reports, "In a bid to salvage some progress from the fizzling drive to overhaul lobbying and ethics laws, Democratic Sens. Russ Feingold (Wis.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) are pushing their colleagues to adopt as a rules change a slate of reforms from a package the Senate passed months ago." A resolution the pair introduced late last week "would immediately ban gifts, meals and tickets from lobbyists, require pre-approval for privately funded trips and expand revolving-door prohibitions, among other items." While the Senate approved the changes, 90-8, "as part of a broader reform package in March, that bill has stalled awaiting House action." The House "approved its version of the measure in May but has yet to name conferees, and negotiations over the bills have run aground on disagreements about campaign finance and earmark provisions." Roll Call adds, "Obama and Feingold wrote to Senate leaders last week, asking their resolution be adopted as soon as Senators return from the July Fourth recess." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's office "did not respond to a request for comment." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, "who has sought to portray a GOP 'culture of corruption' as a central theme in his party's midterm messaging, stopped short of a full-throated endorsement of the approach."

Bush's Fitness Seen As Remarkable As He Turns 60. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 10, 2:40, Mitchell) reported, "The first wave of baby boomers turns 60 this year, and the big day for President Bush comes on Thursday." Ten predecessors "have turned 60 in office, but it's a good bet none was as healthy as number 43." CBS (Axelrod) added, "As the Baby Boomer-in-Chief approaches his birthday this week, he's in top shape, even if he does seem to be dreading the big six-oh just a bit." President Bush (June 7): "I know I'm not supposed to talk about myself, but in a month I'm turning 60. For you youngsters, I want to tell you something, when I was your age, I thought 60 was really old. [laughter] It's all in your mind. It's not that old. Really isn't." Axelrod: Bush's fitness is "a remarkable feat considering that during his five years in office, this President has dealt with 9/11, wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and a constant threat of terrorism." Bush "doesn't just look healthy. He's got the resting heart rate of an athlete, at 47 to 52 beats per minute. His blood pressure is 110/64. His total cholesterol is 178. His doctors proclaimed him in excellent health and fit for duty, and he actually lost eight pounds last year."

Professor Questions Whether MBA Has Made Bush Better President. Charles R. Kesler, a professor of government at Claremont McKenna College, writes in the Los Angeles Times (7/3), "George W. Bush is the first president with an MBA (from Harvard Business School, no less), but it's not clear that being a master of business administration has made him a better chief executive. The disarray in Iraq, the debacle after Hurricane Katrina -- these aren't exactly the kinds of triumphs that the alumni office likes to boast about." Kesler adds, "It's hard to say what President Bush absorbed from his management studies. We can only draw inferences, though eventually historians may know more. … Bush's management style is long on decisions and short on explanations. … On ordinary rhetorical occasions, Bush and his text seem hardly acquainted. On great occasions, he tends to overshoot the mark, calling for impossibilities such as an "end to evil." He lacks a rhetorical mean, much less the rhetorical mien that served Ronald Reagan so well."

Bush, McCain Rapprochement Seen As Based On Pragmatic Considerations. The New York Times (7/3, Rutenberg, Nagourney) reports that after "years of competitive and often contentious dealings, President Bush and Senator John McCain of Arizona are building a deepening if impersonal relationship that is serving the political needs of both men." Given their "history of intense rivalry and sometimes personally bitter combat, their newfound partnership is seen by some Republicans as born more of political calculation than personal evolution. Either way, it could prove valuable to Mr. McCain in his efforts to win the Republican presidential nomination in 2008 by sending a signal to Mr. Bush's conservative base and fund-raising network that, at a minimum, the White House will not stand in the Arizonan's way." Aides said "a thaw that began when Mr. McCain campaigned alongside Mr. Bush in the 2004 election has continued through the tougher days of Mr. Bush's second term." But for "all the talk of reconciliation, both sides describe the relationship between arguably the two highest-profile leaders of the Republican Party as almost entirely professional, a little stiff and the product of the pragmatic calculation by two politicians who see potential gain in striking a peace with a powerful rival." Bush "appears to have stronger ties to Mr. McCain than to the other likely presidential candidates." There has been "a steady stream of Bush advisers who have ended up in Mr. McCain's orbit. Most recently, Republicans close to both candidates said that Nicolle Wallace — who just stepped down as Mr. Bush's communications director and has long been close to the president — was likely to serve in some formal or informal role in a McCain campaign. Her husband, Mark D. Wallace, Mr. Bush's deputy campaign manager in 2004 and now an ambassador-level representative to the United Nations, is already lending advice." Wayne L. Berman, a "longtime supporter and fund-raiser for Mr. Bush, has signed on to help Mr. McCain." Karl Rove was "said by associates to have put aside his suspicion and dislike of Mr. McCain." White House press secretary Tony Snow said, "On a series of very tough issues, McCain's been there."

OTHER NEWS:

Emanuel, Dean At Odds Over Party Strategy. Roll Call (7/3, Kornacki) reports, "A letter to Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean from Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, has set off a new round of sniping over party strategy and resources between allies of the two party leaders." Emanuel, who "reportedly stormed out of a May meeting with Dean, penned a letter, dated June 22, to the party chairman demanding $100,000 per targeted district from the DNC to defray the cost of the DCCC's proposed field operation, several individuals who have read the letter said." Attached to the letter was "a sample field plan for a district, itemizing various projected expenses, down to details such as $1,500 for T-shirts. The expense plan was dated June 26, although it was unclear when Dean actually received the missive." Dean "loyalists took the letter as hostile in nature, coming as it did after months of coy suggestions by Emanuel that Dean and the DNC were shirking their financial obligations to the DCCC's election year effort. … On top of that, Dean's backers contend he is not low-balling the DCCC on field operations as Emanuel suggests, and that the $20,000-per-district figure was simply a number being bandied about during negotiations, which were still proceeding when Emanuel wrote the letter."

GOP Sees Chance To Increase House Majority. The Washington Times (7/3, Pfeiffer) reports, "Congressional Republicans say they have a strategic advantage in their effort to increase their House majority, even as national polls show Democrats with a significant lead heading into this year's elections." The National Republican Congressional Committee says that "despite the polling edge for the Democrats, Republicans are targeting conservative districts that went for President Bush in 2004. 'We're competing for red turf held by Democrats,' NRCC spokesman Jonathan Collegio said."

Democrats May Need Only A Few States For "Wave." In his Roll Call column (7/3), Stuart Rothenberg says, "The last major national political wave, in 1994, didn't sweep over all areas of the country with equal force. In some states, Congressional Democrats suffered minimal losses, while in others Democratic House seats fell in bunches." For Democrats "to take the House this year, they may need one or two states to deliver a significant number of wins, not just an isolated victory. Which states give Democrats the best chance to score victories in bunches?" Democratic operatives "have been suggesting that at least a handful of states are ripe for a Democratic wave: New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Indiana."

Voters Seen As Needing Solid Reason To Dump Incumbents. Roll Call (7/3, Duran) reports the "surprisingly easy victory that Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah) scored over his primary opponent last week has been heralded as a win for President Bush's immigration policy." But wealthy developer John Jacob's "defeat in the Beehive State's 3rd district holds other lessons for both Republicans trying to dislodge incumbents in primaries and Democrats hoping to flip Republican-held seats in November." Just as the "victories of newly elected Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) and Reps. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) and now-ex Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) demonstrated in recent primaries, voters still need a reason to dump incumbents or switch party control of a House seat."

GOP Pressing "Suburban Agenda." In his Roll Call column (7/3), executive editor Morton Kondracke notes Rep. Dave Reichert's effort to persuade GOP colleagues "to back a bill enabling school districts to tap into national criminal databases before they hire employees." The School Safely Acquiring Faculty Excellence Act "passed the House almost unanimously in June — the first legislative success for the GOP's 'Suburban Agenda,' a set of bills designed to appeal to the majority of American voters who live in the suburbs." The agenda "is the brainchild of Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.), one of Congress' most effective moderates, who has sold it to a growing group of conservatives and the House GOP leadership." Kirk said, "Washington may think this is small-bore. It's not the war on terror. But this is an agenda that people care about in their everyday lives — their kids' safety, health care, their ability to send their kids to college." Kondracke adds that besides the "school safety measure, the agenda includes a national '401Kids' savings account for college, a screen to block predators from contacting children at online chat rooms and a bill setting standards for computerizing health records."

Conservative Republicans Now Opposing 527 Reform. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Cummings) reports that in 2004, "Republicans were organizing against new, loosely regulated political groups that were raising money to attack President Bush." Now, "illustrating how roles often reverse in politics, some of the party's conservative activists are trying to stop legislation that would choke off those groups." The dispute "centers on a House bill that would curtail funding for organizations nicknamed 527s, for the section of the tax code that governs them." But the "rich liberals who spent heavily to oust Mr. Bush" in 2004 "aren't investing in 527s this election cycle, even though the stakes are high, with control of Congress in play." In the 2006 campaign so far, "it is right-leaning 527s that are most active. The Club for Growth, a conservative economic-issue group, is leading the charge to kill the Republican bill that would shut down 527s. The Club for Growth received $8 million in donations during the 2004 cycle; for this cycle, its donations as of May tally $5.1 million." The Club's "allies include social conservatives, gun-rights groups and college Republicans. Their campaign could stall congressional efforts to enact anticorruption legislation -- a response to a spate of ethics scandals -- because the House attached 527 language to its rewrite of lobbying laws."

Mormon, Muslim Presidential Candidates Face Voter Uneasiness. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Mehren) reports that even as "anti-Semitism and anti-Catholicism are fading as voter taboos," a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll found "uneasiness about some religions persists. Thirty-seven percent of those questioned said they would not vote for a Mormon presidential candidate -- and 54 percent said no to the prospect of a Muslim in the White House." In addition, "21 percent said they could not vote for an evangelical Christian. Only 15 percent replied that they would not vote for a Jewish presidential candidate. Just 10 percent of those polled were unwilling to cast ballots for a Catholic chief executive." The nationwide survey "of 1,321 adults was conducted June 24-27. The poll has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points, poll director Susan Pinkus said." With "no likely Muslim candidate on the presidential horizon, the poll numbers present the greatest threat to a potential contender from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (as the Mormon Church is formally known)," Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts. Emory University analyst Merle Black said, "It is something he will have to address. It will be a challenge. It doesn't necessarily kill him as a candidate, but he may have to talk in more detail than he ever has before about his faith."

New Jersey Budget Impasse Could Shutter Casinos, Close Beaches. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 8, 1:45, Mitchell) reported, "A budget impasse has forced the Garden State to start shutting down its government. The impact may soon be felt by out-of-state visitors like beachgoers and gamblers." CBS (Chen) added that as New Jersey's legislature failed to meet its budget deadline over the weekend, Gov. Jon Corzine shut down nonessential state function and "right away, no more lottery tickets sold, no more drivers license issued either, 45,000 state workers immediately furloughed, road crews suspended, a nice bonus on a holiday weekend, but right after the Fourth of July, state beaches and parks could close and the casinos will as well." Gov. Corzine "wants to increase the sales tax to bring in more revenue. Fellow Democratic lawmakers say that's unnecessary -- the upshot, no deal, and now, no budget."

The AP (7/3, Santi) reports Atlantic City's casinos "were ordered to close Wednesday, the latest casualty of a state government shutdown that entered its second day Sunday after the Legislature failed to adopt a budget by its July 1 deadline." The 12 casinos, "which require state monitoring, have waged a court battle to remain open, and an appeals court was weighing the matter Sunday." Gov. Corzine "said Sunday there was 'no immediate prospect of a budget.' State parks, beaches and historic sites also were expected to shut down Wednesday." If the casinos "shut down, the state would lose an estimated $2 million in tax revenue each day they stayed closed." The budget talks "became heated this year as Corzine, a Democrat, proposed increasing the state sales tax from 6 percent to 7 percent to help overcome a $4.5 billion budget deficit."

Virginia Gay Marriage Ban Spurs Fundraising Boom. The Washington Post (7/3, B2, Jenkins) reports the proposed state constitutional amendment "that would ban same-sex marriage in Virginia has sparked an aggressive fundraising effort, with each side of the debate hoping to secure hundreds of thousands of dollars for their cause." Virginia voters "will decide Nov. 7 whether the state constitution should be amended to define marriage solely as a union between a man and a woman. The amendment also would place a ban in the constitution on civil unions, which already are illegal in Virginia." To "help rally amendment opponents, the Commonwealth Coalition, a Richmond-based group, has set an ambitious goal of raising $3 million, organizers said. They want to fund a barrage of radio and television ads in the fall." Meanwhile, the Family Foundation Action, "which is organizing amendment supporters, has set a best-case-scenario fundraising goal of $900,000, although activists and volunteers said they expected to raise less than that." Both sides "have created Internet fundraising mechanisms and appealed to potential voters through churches and community events across the state. Activists said they plan a direct mailing campaign throughout the summer and fall."

Critics Say Petitions To FDA Delay Approval Of Generic Drugs. Lawmakers are taking a close look at an FDA procedure designed to alert the agency to scientific and safety issues, amid concerns that it may getting subverted by the brand-name drug industry. A front page story in the Washington Post (7/3, A1, Kaufman) reports that leaders in the generic drug industry and some at the FDA "complain that 'citizen petitions' -- requests for agency action that any individual, group or company can file -- are being misused by brand-name drugmakers to stave off generic competition." They say the filing of a petition "triggers another round of time-consuming and often redundant reviews of the generics by the FDA, which can take months or years. In the process, consumers continue to pay millions of dollars more for the brand-name drugs." The Post adds, "Statistics collected by the staff of Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), who has introduced legislation with Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) that would rein in industry-filed citizen petitions, show that 20 of the 21 brand-name petitions settled by the FDA since 2003 were ultimately rejected."

Weather Delays Space Shuttle Launch For Second Day In A Row. For the second day in a row Sunday, the launch of the space shuttle Discovery was postponed due to stormy weather. The AP (7/3, Dunn) reports, "Launch officials said they would try again Tuesday, on the Fourth of July, after giving the work force some rest and a chance to replenish the shuttle's on-board fuel. The weather was expected to improve by Tuesday, although rain was still in the forecast."

ABC World News Tonight (7/2, story 2, 2:15, Stark) reported, "NASA will use the next 48 hours to replenish fuel cells on Discovery in the hopes of having enough energy on board for a third spacewalk. And they'll also need to replenish some of the experiments planned for orbit, including thousands of fruit flies which have a short lifespan. A scrub also means NASA once again has to drain 500,000 gallons of fuel out of the tank. But Tuesday's forecast is better -- a 60% chance of favorable weather."

Astronauts May Have To Perform In-Flight Repairs To Shuttle Tiles. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 5, 2:25, Cobiella) added, "Since the Columbia disaster when a piece of foam broke away and dealt a fatal blow to the shuttle's wing, astronauts have had to take on the job of in-space repairman. NASA has removed 35 pounds of foam from Discovery's external fuel tank, but it's still far from perfect. … NASA has said that minor damage is unavoidable and putting an astronaut so close to the delicate tiles on the shuttle's wings and underbelly carries its own risk, and all of NASA's in-flight fixes for these fragile tiles are still experimental. So if this Discovery crew were to perform another choreographed repair 230 miles above the Earth, it wouldn't know whether it was a success until they were safely back down."

Academic Bill Of Rights Taking Hold In Many States. The Washington Times (7/3, Richardson) reports that three years after conservative activist David Horowitz began promoting his Academic Bill of Rights in Colorado, the manifesto, which says students should be graded and faculty should be hired without regard to political or religious beliefs, has been introduced in 18 states. Meanwhile, "Students for Academic Freedom, the campus watchdog group founded by Mr. Horowitz, has established chapters on more than 150 campuses. Student governments at a dozen universities have approved resolutions supporting the Academic Bill of Rights. In April, Princeton University became the first institution of higher learning to pass a version of the Student Bill of Rights by a vote of the entire student body, surprising even Mr. Horowitz, who had no hand in the election." However the Times notes that for all Horowitz's success in raising the issue, "no state has actually approved an academic freedom bill, despite the flurry of hearings and committee votes."

Lawmakers Say Spot On Colbert Show Raised Profiles With Constituents. The Washington Times (7/3, Bellantoni) reports that members of Congress who appear on segment of Comedy Central's "The Colbert Report" known as "Better Know a District" usually "end up looking silly. But several lawmakers said doing the spoof spot…actually has raised their profiles back home, particularly among young folks." GOP Rep. Phil Gingrey "said there was an unexpected byproduct of doing the show -- attention from young constituents and House staffers. Rep. Earl Blumenauer of Oregon had a similar experience when his 3rd District was profiled in May. … But Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, regrets his appearance and called Mr. Colbert a 'third-rate' comedian." Colbert "so far has targeted 25 members in the 435-member House, splicing and dicing sometimes two-hour-long camera sessions into five-minute clips."

Pelosi Recommends Lawmakers Not Participate In Colbert Spoof. Roll Call (7/3, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi was asked about the segment during her press conference last Thursday. Pelosi said, "Well, it is humorous; I wouldn't recommend that anyone go on the show. I would think it would be okay to go on if you were live to tape, but don't subject yourself to a comic's edit unless you want to be made a fool of."

House, Senate Clash Over Proposal For Walkway On Capitol's East Front. The Washington Post (7/3, A19, Kamen) reports in its "In the Loop" column that the biggest fight between the House and Senate "may have occurred last week over a House proposal to build a fenced walkway that would run across the now-closed east front of the Capitol -- the area where the long-delayed Capitol Visitor Center is being built. … Senate detractors say this proposal is exceptionally stupid, even for Congress. … The Upper Chamber folks rather uncharitably say the mysterious fence dips to only four feet high so Hastert and House members can walk down the steps and have their pictures taken with constituents." A House aide "said these things are being overblown."

Former DHS Official Says FEMA Director Should Be Allowed To Focus On Disaster Response. Adm. James Loy, former commandant of the US Coast Guard and former deputy secretary of Homeland Security, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (7/3) writes that following "a time-honored pattern," Congress' "impulsive first response" following Hurricane Katrina may be "followed by years of 'perfecting' the original legislation." Loy continues that none of the pending bills that address FEMA's position within DHS "address the central problem: The Homeland Security Act of 2002 diluted the FEMA director's focus on the agency's core mission -- response and recovery -- by requiring him to wear an additional hat as the DHS under-secretary for emergency preparedness and response (later changed to the under-secretary for federal emergency management)." As adjustments are made to the original legislation to fix FEMA, Loy says "we should ensure that the FEMA director can focus all of his time, energy and talent on guiding the agency in responding effectively and efficiently to the American people in the event of a disaster. That is best accomplished by restoring FEMA's independent agency status, offloading the director's responsibilities of being double-hatted as an under secretary and keeping the agency and the director inside DHS with direct access to the secretary during a crisis."

Carter Says FOIA Should Be Amended To Keep Pace With International Standards. Former President Jimmy Carter writes in the Washington Post (7/3, A21), "Our government leaders have become increasingly obsessed with secrecy. Obstructionist policies and deficient practices have ensured that many important public documents and official actions remain hidden from our view." Carter adds, "In the United States, we must seek amendments to FOIA to be more in line with emerging international standards, such as covering all branches of government; providing an oversight body to monitor compliance; including sanctions for failure to adhere to the law; and establishing an appeal mechanism that is easy to access, speedy and affordable. We cannot take freedom of information for granted. Our democracy depends on it."

Thornburgh Says Media Shield Law Must Be Carefully Crafted. Former Attorney General Richard Thornburgh writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/3), "Ever since then-New York Times reporter Judith Miller went to jail for 85 days last year rather than comply with a subpoena for her sources in the Valerie Plame case, the media has been pushing for a federal shield that would grant reporters unprecedented special protection from revealing sources during litigation. The Senate is now taking steps toward providing such a reporter-source privilege with the Free Flow of Information Act, which is likely to be sent to the floor for a vote over the next few weeks." Thornburgh notes that for the long term, "the bill has troubling implications. In its current form it contains a shield so broad -- and a definition of journalism so vague -- that it upends what up to now has been a reasonable balance between protecting reporters from disclosing sources and preserving the right to the fullest possible access to truth in the courtroom for plaintiffs and defendants." Thornburgh concludes by noting that "given the potential for abuse of that critical role, any media shield must, in the interests of justice, be carefully crafted."

Schwarzenegger's Conservative Former Aide Reverses Support For Term Limits. Rob Stutzman, former deputy chief of staff for communications for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, writes in the Los Angeles Times (7/3), "About 20 years ago, the notion of term limits for officeholders became dogma for the center-right. … Fourteen years have passed since California voters approved legislative term limits, restricting Assembly members to a trio of two-year terms and state senators to two four-year stints. I have always been a loyal conservative supporter of term limits…as a suitably blunt instrument to correct the arrogance of elected officials not mindful enough of those who elected them. … But after 16 years of working in California politics, I've changed my mind. We were wrong. Term limits haven't delivered what we hoped for. They have, in fact, harmed the public interest." It is "high time to admit that term limits haven't worked."

New Republic Says Baucus Should Be Dropped From Finance Panel. The New Republic (7/10) says in its lead editorial that Democratic Rep. Max Baucus uses "his influence as the top Democrat on the Finance Committee to systematically undercut his party and enable George W. Bush's most egregious domestic legislation. So why does his party entrust him with so much responsibility?" Indeed, the Democrats' "only real victory of the last five years -- stuffing the administration on Social Security -- came after Harry Reid cautioned Baucus against freelancing with the White House. Well, we'll do Reid one better and suggest he boot Baucus from the Finance Committee altogether."

Author Says US Is Better At Educating Girls. Author Christina Hoff Somers writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/3) that in a report from Education Sector, a new Washington think tank, policy analyst Sara Mead, "denies that American boys are in trouble academically." Mead "hopes that the nation can have a reasonable 'conversation' about gender issues 'without unfairly undermining the gains girls have made in recent decades.'" Somers adds, "One looks in vain in Ms. Mead's report for any indication that anyone is undermining girls. She seems to think that concern for boys means shortchanging girls. But it does not -- because education is not a zero sum game." Somers adds, "We are strikingly better at educating young women than young men. Boys need our attention. It is difficult to understand why an organization devoted to improving education should regard the current concern for boys as a threat to girls' progress."

Author Says "Boy Crisis" Is "Little More Than A Myth." Author Judith Warner writes in the New York Times (7/3) that the Education Sector study confirms that the "near-ubiquitous belief that our nation's boys are being academically neglected and emotionally persecuted by teachers whose training, style and temperament favor girls" is "little more than a myth." Warner adds, "Talk of the boy crisis is a diversion. It draws attention from the real reasons so many white suburban parents sense that their sons are in trouble. Those reasons aren't academic; they're behavioral and emotional."

Mallaby Calls Concept Of Energy Independence "Pipe Dream." Sebastian Mallaby writes in the Washington Post (7/3, A21), "This month's Group of Eight summit in Russia takes statecraft to a whole new level. Global leaders have 'energy security' on the agenda. But judging by what they say and do, they don't always understand the subject. … As Daniel Yergin has written recently in Foreign Affairs, real energy security requires setting aside the pipe dream of energy independence and embracing interdependence." Mallaby adds, "If the G-8 summit can spread the word about this interdependence, it will do some good. But the nationalistic conception of energy security is worse than useless. By encouraging a competitive scramble for resources that could spiral into conflict, this sort of security talk only creates insecurity."

Herbert Makes Case For Minimum Wage Increase. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (7/3), "The federal minimum wage, currently $5.15 an hour, was last raised in 1997. Since then, its purchasing power has deteriorated by 20 percent. Analysts at the Economic Policy Institute and the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities jointly crunched the numbers and determined that, after adjusting for inflation, the value of the minimum wage is at its lowest level since 1955." Herbert adds, "Polls have shown that Americans overwhelmingly favor an increase in the minimum wage. But the low-income workers who would benefit from such an increase are not part of the natural G.O.P. constituency. Thus, the stonewall. … There is no justification — none — for condemning the nation's lowest-paid workers to this continuing slide into ever deeper economic distress."

Pastor Says Americans Need Formal Day Of Rest. Henry G. Brinton, pastor of Fairfax Presbyterian Church in Virginia, writes in USA Today (7/3) reports, "For all the attention paid this past year to public displays of the Ten Commandments, you'd think people would spend as much energy trying to follow them. When it comes to the Fourth Commandment -- 'Remember the Sabbath Day' -- that's not the case. … The problem with ignoring the Sabbath is that it hurts us as individuals, families and communities." Brinton adds, "We need a formal day of rest. A true Sabbath gives us time to refresh and renew ourselves, regain proper perspective and redirect our lives to what is good and true and worthwhile. … We can learn from men and women in the European Union, who work hard but still enjoy an average of five weeks of paid vacation per year. They often remark that they don't 'live to work,' as we do — instead, they 'work to live.'"

NYTimes Says Congress Should Intervene To Clarify Clean Water Act. The New York Times (7/3) editorializes, "Senator James Inhofe, a conservative Republican from Oklahoma, and Senator Lincoln Chaffee, a liberal Republican from Rhode Island, are at opposite ends of the earth on environmental issues. But both found themselves equally mystified by the recent Supreme Court decision on the Clean Water Act. The decision did nothing to clarify which waters were protected under the act and which were not. Both agreed that only Congress can end the confusion. Both are right. Without Congressional intervention, the certain outcome is endless litigation and a steady decline of the nation's streams and wetlands."

WPost Sees Promise In Ruling On Vermont Campaign Finance Laws. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the Supreme Court's decision last week striking down Vermont's campaign finance laws "may prove more silver lining than cloud. The Vermont rules never stood much of a chance; they are so strict as to present genuine problems. The important feature of the case is not its specific result but the way the court -- and its two newest justices -- reached that result. On this point, the decision is promising." Despite "an opportunity to declare themselves hostile to campaign finance regulation in general, both signed on -- Justice Alito somewhat equivocally -- to the court's long-standing doctrine that appropriately crafted contribution limits can survive constitutional scrutiny. This is a far more significant development than the fate of Vermont's statute. It suggests that, notwithstanding the turnover in the court's personnel, a revolution in campaign finance law may not be in the offing."

NYTimes Says US Must Improve Science Education. The New York Times (7/3) editorializes that the US must do something about the "horrendous state of science education at both the public school and university levels." The Howard Hughes Medical Institute has "awarded grants to 50 universities aimed at providing richer undergraduate science education as well as mentoring and early research experiences with working scientists. Many of the grants will be used partly to advertise the virtues of scientific study not just at universities but also in high schools and middle schools. These programs send a powerful message at a time when the country needs to be paying attention to remaking science education. Congress, which has been casting for ways to address this problem, would do well to emulate them."

WPost Says Maryland Governor's Race Should Be "Hard-Hitting, Substantive Campaign." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich "has spent four years compiling a so-so record. He has diminished a handful of modest victories and sensible policies by displaying a tin ear for political ethics and a pointlessly petulant style of governance that has compounded the partisan venom in Annapolis." Those qualities "may help explain why Mr. Ehrlich… begins his campaign for reelection so far behind his Democratic rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley." The Post adds, "Wouldn't it be nice if the campaign looked and sounded like a contest of ideas between two grown-ups, and not a locker-room smack-down. That will be the real test of both candidates -- whether they have the capacity to wage a hard-hitting, substantive, mature campaign that is about Maryland and Marylanders, not just about Bob Ehrlich and Martin O'Malley."

Personnel News. Roll Call (7/3, Ackley) reports in its "K Street Files" column, "Carolyn Doyle, a former aide to Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), has left her position as senior federal affairs representative at the MWW Group. … Karen Reidy, most recently with the former MCI, has joined the telecom trade association COMPTEL as its vice president for regulatory affairs. … Cable giant Comcast Corp. has picked up a new lobbyist. Peter Filon comes to the company as senior director, federal government affairs, from the House Energy and Commerce Committee, where he has served as minority counsel. PR power-shop Qorvis Communications has signed Jim McGann as managing director. … The US Tuna Foundation has a new president. Anne Forristall comes to the fishy lobby from MGN Inc., where she advised a range of clients on legislative strategy. Lisa McGreevey is joining the hedge fund industry's primary trade group, the Managed Funds Association, as executive vice president and chief operating officer. … The public policy and law group at Dickstein Shapiro has added Brian Finch as counsel. … Benjamin McKay has been promoted to senior vice president of federal government relations at the Property Casualty Insurers Association of America. Trading one heavy-hitting Wall Street CEO for another, the Financial Services Roundtable has named Citigroup chief Charles O. Prince to replace newly confirmed Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson as chairman of the group."

The Washington Post (7/3, C1, Kurtz) reports that Jonathan Wald, who was fired as executive producer of the Today show, and Josh Howard, who was forced to resign as executive producer of 60 Minutes II, have "landed at CNBC, where they are helping to retool programming on a business channel that has struggled in the ratings since the dot-com bust six years ago."

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP:

New York Times: "Crisis Postponed At The U.N." An editorial in the New York Times (7/3) says the UN "steered clear of a financial shipwreck last week, but it also steered clear of approving urgently needed management reforms. That is a standoff, not a solution. If the less-developed countries blocking those reforms continue to dig in, the United Nations will suffer in diminished public credibility and greater resistance to dues-paying by some of the largest contributor nations, including the United States." The UN "cannot function effectively in the 21st century under budget and management rules that were originally devised for a much smaller organization. Successive embarrassments like the oil-for-food scandal should have made that painfully clear."

"Protecting All Waters." The New York Times (7/3) editorializes, "Senator James Inhofe, a conservative Republican from Oklahoma, and Senator Lincoln Chaffee, a liberal Republican from Rhode Island, are at opposite ends of the earth on environmental issues. But both found themselves equally mystified by the recent Supreme Court decision on the Clean Water Act. The decision did nothing to clarify which waters were protected under the act and which were not. Both agreed that only Congress can end the confusion. Both are right. Without Congressional intervention, the certain outcome is endless litigation and a steady decline of the nation's streams and wetlands."

"How To Educate Young Scientists." The New York Times (7/3) editorializes that the US must do something about the "horrendous state of science education at both the public school and university levels." The Howard Hughes Medical Institute has "awarded grants to 50 universities aimed at providing richer undergraduate science education as well as mentoring and early research experiences with working scientists. Many of the grants will be used partly to advertise the virtues of scientific study not just at universities but also in high schools and middle schools. These programs send a powerful message at a time when the country needs to be paying attention to remaking science education. Congress, which has been casting for ways to address this problem, would do well to emulate them."

Washington Post: "Campaign Finance Bellwether." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the Supreme Court's decision last week striking down Vermont's campaign finance laws "may prove more silver lining than cloud. The Vermont rules never stood much of a chance; they are so strict as to present genuine problems. The important feature of the case is not its specific result but the way the court -- and its two newest justices -- reached that result. On this point, the decision is promising." Despite "an opportunity to declare themselves hostile to campaign finance regulation in general, both signed on -- Justice Alito somewhat equivocally -- to the court's long-standing doctrine that appropriately crafted contribution limits can survive constitutional scrutiny. This is a far more significant development than the fate of Vermont's statute. It suggests that, notwithstanding the turnover in the court's personnel, a revolution in campaign finance law may not be in the offing."

"Flagging Rhetoric." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the recent Senate debate over a flag burning amendment "managed to bring out some of the worst in politicians of both parties. … If there is a hero in this episode, it is the man who would succeed Mr. Frist as leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Mr. McConnell could have put the amendment over the top by abandoning his opposition. To his credit, he didn't, and he was joined by two other Republicans, Sens. Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) and Robert F. Bennett (Utah). As Mr. McConnell explained in a column posted on his Senate Web site, 'No act of speech is so obnoxious that it merits tampering with our First Amendment. Our Constitution, and our country, is stronger than that.'"

"Mr. Ehrlich In The Ring." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich "has spent four years compiling a so-so record. He has diminished a handful of modest victories and sensible policies by displaying a tin ear for political ethics and a pointlessly petulant style of governance that has compounded the partisan venom in Annapolis." Those qualities "may help explain why Mr. Ehrlich… begins his campaign for reelection so far behind his Democratic rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley." The Post adds, "Wouldn't it be nice if the campaign looked and sounded like a contest of ideas between two grown-ups, and not a locker-room smack-down. That will be the real test of both candidates -- whether they have the capacity to wage a hard-hitting, substantive, mature campaign that is about Maryland and Marylanders, not just about Bob Ehrlich and Martin O'Malley."

Wall Street Journal: "After Hamdan." The Wall Street Journal (7/3) editorializes, "The Court's opinion masks its own power grab by asserting that the executive must defer more to Congress in designing military commissions." But "the Court's own deference to Congress is selective in the extreme, as it simply chose to ignore the clear intent of the Detainee Treatment Act that Congress passed only last December." The Journal adds, "We…certainly hope the Administration presses its case for military commissions to the Congress, including just how much due process protection the Members think al Qaeda detainees really deserve. An election is coming in which the prosecution of the war on terror will again be a major issue. By all means let's debate the proper care and handling of Osama's bodyguard."

"A Somali Taliban?" An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/3) says, "There's no appetite in the US for a large military intervention in Somalia, but that doesn't mean the new regime should think it is immune from outside attention. So here's a suggestion: Send an emissary to the new Islamist government and propose a deal: Hand over the 1998 embassy bombers, refuse safe harbor to al Qaeda operatives, do not invade Somaliland and Puntland. Agree to that, and we will be able to get along. Don't agree, and the US will do what it must to disrupt any terrorist camps or terrorist activity within its borders. … The Somali Islamists need to understand that if they attempt to turn their country into another refuge for terrorists, it will end as badly for them as it did for the Taliban."

Los Angeles Times: "House Of (Immigration) Blues." The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Last week saw the first narrowing of the chasm between the Senate's recent comprehensive immigration bill and the House of Representatives' punitive enforcement-only package from December. Trouble is, the overtures are all going in the House's direction. … Pro-reform senators are making two classic negotiating mistakes: confusing their opponents' line-in-the-sand intransigence with a negotiating ploy, and elevating the importance of making a deal above its actual content."

"United On Clean L.A. Ports."

"Taming The Tamil Tigers." The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Since April, Sri Lanka has experienced rising violence between the government and the Tamil Tigers rebel group, effectively gutting a 4-year-old cease-fire. But amid the carnage, leaders of both sides have been making unexpected conciliatory gestures, spurring hope that with the help of international monitors, full-scale war can be avoided. … A peaceful Sri Lanka is very much in India's interest; war could bring a stream of refugees and instability to India, particularly in the state of Tamil Nadu. India should start to take a more active role, while the EU must work for a return to the bargaining table. It isn't too late to head off a full-scale war."

Dear Mr. Gorsuch: Neil

Thank you for participating in the orientation program for the 2005-06 AAAS Science & Technology Policy Fellows. We appreciate you making time to lend your perspectives and expertise to the group. Your unique viewpoints contributed significantly to the content of the program.

The orientation plays a critical role in preparing the Fellows for their year of service in legislative and executive branch offices. The opportunity for dialog and exchange of ideas and resources is extremely valuable to build the Fellows' knowledge and capacity to interact successfully at the science-policy interface.

We are grateful for your input to support the AAAS Science & Technology Policy Fellowships.

Best regards,

Cynthia

Mr. Neil Gorsuch

Office of Associate Attorney General

Washington, DC 20530

Dear Mr. Gorsuch:

I am delighted to learn from JoAnn Bordeaux, that you have agreed to speak at the orientation for the 2005-06 class of AAAS Science & Technology Policy Fellows. Your session is scheduled for Wednesday, September 14, 2005, where you will be joined on the dais by the Honorable Susan Braden of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims. We are requesting that each of you give a 20-minute presentation that highlights the challenges faced by the legal system (in your case, from the perspective of the Justice Department) in dealing with cases that are marked by increasing technical complexity. This would then be followed by open discussion and questions from the audience. The entire session would run from 2:30-3:30 p.m. Enclosed is a preliminary agenda for the full orientation program. Additional information is available on our website, at www.fellowships.aaas.org.

The Fellowship Program was initiated in 1973, and since then more than 1,600 early to mid-career scientists and engineers have been competitively selected from across the United States to spend a year in Washington, D.C., working in Congress and federal agencies on issues relating to science, technology, and policy while learning about the federal policymaking process. The fellowship experience is a stepping stone to leadership positions, whether the Fellows remain in government, return to academia, or pursue careers in the non-profit or private sectors.

Although a highly sophisticated group, the new AAAS Fellows have varying degrees of familiarity with the policy process when they arrive in Washington. The orientation plays a critical role in their preparation for the fellowship year. Previous orientations have featured a wide range of speakers, including Members of Congress Sherwood Boehlert, Jeff Bingaman, Rush Holt, and John D. Rockefeller IV; journalists Cory Dean of The New York Times, Joe Palca of NPR, and Rick Weiss of The Washington Post; Nobel Peace Prize Laureate and former President of Costa Rica, Oscar Arias; Valdas Adamkus, President of Lithuania; the Ambassadors of Bulgaria, Switzerland and Sweden; and Bruce Alberts, immediate past President of the National Academy of Sciences.

We will be hosting a luncheon with Rep. Ros-Lehtinen just prior to your session, at the Columbus Club at Union Station. We plan to convene your session there as well. We would pleased, if your schedule permits, for you to join the Fellows and other guests at the luncheon. Please let me know if you are able to attend. For both the luncheon and sessions to follow, we expect the audience to number around 150 people, including new and former Fellows and AAAS staff.

We are honored to have you join us as a AAAS orientation speaker along with some of the other distinguished individuals we have invited to participate, including Secretary of State Condolezza Rice, Brazilian Ambassador to the U.S. Roberto Abdenur, and Scientific Advisor to President Bush, Dr. John Marburger.

In the weeks ahead, you will be contacted by Chris McPhaul, Associate Director of the Fellowship Program, to answer your questions and to provide the necessary logistical information associated with organizing the session. In the interim, should you have any questions, I can be reached by phone at 202.326.6793 and via email at mfrankel@aaas.org.

JUDGE SUSAN G. BRADEN
UNITED STATES COURT OF FEDERAL CLAIMS

Susan G. Braden

JUDGE

UNITED STATES COURT OF FEDERAL CLAIMS
717 MADISON PLACE, N.W.
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20005

Judge Braden was appointed to the bench of the United States Court of Federal Claims on July 14, 2003, by President George W. Bush, after being confirmed by unanimous consent of the United States Senate. She was sworn into office by Senator Jeff Sessions, Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight & the Courts. Her investiture was conducted on October 24, 2003 by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

On October 22, 2004, Judge Braden was inducted as a Senior Fellow of the ABA's Administrative Law and Regulatory Section by Justice O'Connor at a ceremony held at the Supreme Court. Judge Braden also was recently named to the Editorial Board of the American Intellectual Property Law Association.

Judge Braden received a B.A. degree (1970) and J.D. degree (1973) from Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland, Ohio. She also attended post graduate courses at the Harvard Law School in the summer of 1978.

Prior to joining the bench, Judge Braden litigated complex federal and administrative law cases in private practice in trial and appellate courts. In particular, her work in the intellectual property area received favorable notice in the Wall Street Journal, New York Times, National Law Journal, Journal of the American Bar Association, and Interfaces on Trial: Intellectual Property and Interoperability In

The Global Software Industry. In 1996, Judge Braden was honored by the Computer Law Association for winning multiple decisions in the Eastern District of New York, the Eastern District of Texas, the Second Circuit, and a certified question to the Supreme Court of Texas in Computer Assocs. Int'l, Inc. v. Altai, Inc., a landmark case that changed the application of copyright law to computer software. In 1998, she also won a companion case brought in France before the Cour de Appel de Paris.

In addition, Judge Braden has been lead counsel in a number of cutting edge cases. In 1995, she was lead counsel in a constitutional and state income tax case that challenged the industrial incentive law of the State of Alabama and received favorable mention in the Wall Street Journal, Business Week, and State Income Tax Alert, where it was described as "the case to watch." In 1991, she was lead counsel in a case noted in the Wall Street Journal where the federal district court awarded her client indemnification of environmental liabilities required to be assumed under an antitrust divestiture. In 1990, she was appointed by the Governor of the State of Alabama as a Special Assistant Attorney General to handle an antitrust divestiture required by the Federal Trade Commission.

In private practice, Judge Braden also represented a wide variety of client interests before almost every major department and federal agency, testified before the United States Congress on a variety of matters, and was a principal advocate of the Emergency Oil and Steel Loan Guarantee Act of 1999, which established a $1 billion federal loan guarantee program to assist bankrupt and troubled steel mills and small oil companies.

Prior to entering private practice, Judge Braden served as Senior Counsel to the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission and his predecessor, who was Acting Chairman and a Commissioner (1980-1985). In both positions she was responsible for advising on antitrust and consumer enforcement actions and handling congressional relations. From 1973-1980, Judge Braden was a Senior Trial Attorney in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice. She joined the Department under its Honor Law Program and initially was assigned to the Cleveland Regional Office, where she assisted in the trial of the first antitrust felony case and served as lead counsel in numerous criminal bid rigging cases and major merger investigations. In 1978, she was assigned to the newly formed Energy Section as lead counsel in a proceeding that conditioned the nuclear licenses of several electric utilities, bringing Texas into the national power grid. From 1978–1980, Judge Braden also represented the Department of Justice at OECD meetings in Paris, London, and Dusseldorf. During her tenure in government, Judge Braden received numerous Superior and Outstanding Performance Merit awards and in 1984, she received the Federal Bar Association's Distinguished Service Award.

Judge Braden is admitted to the Bars of the United States Supreme Court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, the District of Columbia, and the Supreme Court of Ohio.

Judge Braden is married to Thomas M. Susman, a partner in the law firm of Ropes and Gray. Their daughter is a graduate of Yale University. Judge Braden is an avid gardener and passionate supporter of the Washington Opera and Shakespeare Theatre.

Westlaw.

Margaret ALTHEN, Petitioner,
v.
SECRETARY OF THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES, Respondent.
No. 00-170V.

Sept. 30, 2003.

Claimant filed suit under National Childhood Vaccine Act alleging that she suffered optic neuritis and acute-disseminated encephalomyelitis (ADEM) as direct result of tetanus toxoid (TT) vaccination. The Court of Federal Claims, Golkiewicz, Chief Special Master, 2003 WL 21439669, denied claim, and claimant appealed. The Court of Federal Claims, Braden, J., held that claimant established entitlement to relief under Vaccine Act.

Reversed and vacated.

MEMORANDUM OPINION

BRADEN, Judge.

On June 3, 2003, the Chief Special Master of the Office of Special Masters of the United States Court of Federal Claims ("Chief Special Master") issued an Entitlement Decision in this case, which he described as raising "difficult and involved medical and causation issues" under the National Childhood Vaccine Act of 1986, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-1 to -34 (2000) ("Vaccine Act"). See Althen v. Sec'y Dep't of Health and Human Servs., 2003 WL 21439669, at *9 (Fed.Cl. Spec. Mstr. June 3, 2003) ("Althen"). The Chief Special Master denied petitioner's claim for compensation and other relief. The court has issued this opinion on an expedited basis to facilitate any appellate review the respondent ("government") may wish to pursue, since the court has determined that the petitioner met the statutory burden to establish causation in fact by a preponderance of the evidence and therefore, as a matter of law, is entitled under the Vaccine Act to compensation, reasonable attorneys fees, and other costs.

RELEVANT FACTS AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND [FN1]

FN1. The relevant facts recited herein are summarized from detailed factual findings found in Althen, at *1-*4. Citations to record evidence are noted within parentheses. (TR) refers to the transcript of a June 14, 2002 hearing of the parties' experts. (P.Ex.) refers to petitioner's exhibits. (D.Ex.) refers to government's exhibits.

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

Petitioner is a college graduate and was a Public Health Administrator for the City of Hartford. (P.Ex.18 at 146). She is married; her daughter is now 22 years old. (P.Ex. at 147). On March 28, 1997, a tetanus toxoid' [FN2] vaccination and a hepatitis A vaccination were administered to petitioner. See Althen, at *1 (P.Ex. 1 at 1). Prior to that time, petitioner enjoyed good health, although she had Duane's syndrome, [FN3] which affected her ability to look to her left without experiencing double vision. (P.Ex. 8 at 1). In addition, petitioner "had a history of hypothyroidism [FN4] probably on an autoimmune basis," [FN5] for which she takes a prescription synthetic thyroid drug. (P.Ex. 21 at 1).

FN2. Tetanus toxoid vaccine is a modified toxin of the bacteria Clostridium tetani and does not have viral components. See ADVERSE EVENTS ASSOCIATED WITH CHILDHOOD VACCINES: EVIDENCE BEARING ON CAUSALITY, Institute of Medicine 67-68 (1994) ("1994 IOM REPORT").

FN3. Duane's syndrome "is a hereditary congenital syndrome in which the affected eye shows limitation or absence of abduction, restriction of abduction ... narrowing the palebral fissure on adduction and widening on adduction, and deficient convergence. It is transmitted as an autosomal dominant trait. Called also retraction syndrome[.]" DORLAND'S MEDICAL DICTIONARY 1754 (29th Edition 2000) ("DORLAND'S").

FN4. Hypothyroidism is the "[d]iminished production of thyroid hormone, leading to clinical manifestations of thyroid insufficiency, including low metabolic rate, tendency to weight gain, somnolence and sometimes myxedema [accumulation of excess watery fluid under the skin]." STEDMAN'S MEDICAL DICTIONARY 866 (27th Edition 2000) ("STEDMAN'S").

FN5. An autoimmune disease is "any disorder in which loss of function or destruction of normal tissue arises from humoral or cellular immune responses to the body's own tissue constituents[.]" STEDMAN'S at 510.

On April 15, 1997, petitioner sought medical treatment for blurred vision, which progressed in four days to a complete loss of sight in her right eye. Id. (P.Ex. 2 at 3; P.Ex. 20 at 23; P.Ex. 21 at 1). Petitioner also complained of a "steady" "posterior headache," "discomfort along the right side of her nose," "pain with eye movements," "sharp discomfort along her right temple" 273 when bending over, and "queasiness." Id. (P.Ex. 1 at 107). Initially, petitioner was diagnosed by Dr. Lesser, an ophthalmologist, as having "probable right optic neuritis." [FN6] Id. (P.Ex. 3 at 88; P.Ex. 4 at 122; TR. 13).

FN6. Optic neuritis is an "inflammation of the optic nerve, ... classified either as intravascular, affecting the part of the nerve within the eyeball ... or retrobulbar, affecting the portion behind the eyeball." DORLAND'S at 1207; see also 1994 IOM REPORT at 83 ("Optic neuritis ... [is a] focal demyelinating lesion [ ] that can occur in isolation or as components of diffuse demyelinating diseases such as ADEM and multiple sclerosis.").

An April 21, 1997 brain MRI confirmed optic neuritis in petitioner's right eye, but revealed no "evidence of multiple sclerosis [FN7] or demyelinating disease." [FN8] Id. (P.Ex. 1 at 111). Nevertheless, Dr. Lesser advised petitioner that she had a 2 to 5 percent risk of developing MS within five years. (P.Ex. 3 at 88). On April 27, 1997, petitioner experienced "sudden loss of vision" over a two day period. Id. (P.Ex. 3 at 38). A few weeks later, petitioner complained of sight loss in her right eye, accompanied by "tingling along the ulnar side right hand" and numbness in that hand. Id. at *2. (P.Ex. 1 at 107). On May 23, 1997, petitioner was examined by Dr. Silvers, a neurologist, who reported "significant right optic neuritis." (P.Ex. 1 at 106). Dr. Silvers advised petitioner that in light of the most recent MRI, her risk of developing MS was "low ... however, this risk is still real." (P.Ex. 1 at 106).

> FN7. Multiple sclerosis is "a disease in which there are foci of demyelination of various sizes throughout the white matter of the central nervous system ('CNS'), sometimes extending into the gray matter. Typically, the symptoms of lesions of the white matter are weakness, incoordination, paresthesia, speech disturbances, and visual complaints. The course of the disease is usually prolonged, so that the term multiple also refers to remissions and relapses that occur over a period of many years. The etiology [cause or origin] is unknown." DORLAND'S at 1611.
> FN8. Demyelinating disease is an "extensive idiopathic [of a cause unknown] loss of myelin sheaths [protein sheaths that cover nerve fibers] in the brain." STEDMAN'S at 588. Demyelinating disease "has long been known to follow viral and some bacterial infections and the administration of live attenuated and inactivated antiviral vaccines." 1994 IOM REPORT at 83.

On June 4, 1997, petitioner was admitted to Hartford Hospital with fever, confusion, and neck stiffness. TR. 14 (P.Ex. 1 at 98; P.Ex. 21 at 1); see also Althen, at *2. On June 6, 1997, petitioner received an EEG that revealed a "focal component in the patient's right temporal region raising the possibility of an infectious process or inflammatory process at that site." Id. (P.Ex. 1 at 100). Petitioner's MRI also indicated "a subtle area of increased signal in the right parietal region, possibly reflecting underlying encephalitis." Althen, at *2 (TR 58-62). After an exhaustive battery of tests, petitioner was discharged to the hospital's acute rehabilitation unit on June 16, 1997, with a primary diagnosis of: "Encephalitis [FN9] of unknown type." Id. (P.Ex. 1 at 87, 99). MRI brain scans taken on June 5, 1997 and June 6, 1997 showed "A vague suggestion of some enlargement of the anterior temporal region on the left, and minimal loss of white matter/gray matter differentiation. However, this is not definitive and one cannot clearly evaluate the possibility of edema." (P.Ex. 18 at 109). On June 21, 1997, petitioner again was discharged, this time with a diagnosis of "questionable acute disseminated encephalomyelitis, right optic neuritis, congenital Duane's syndrome, [and] urinary tract infection." Id. (P.Ex. 1 at 87).

> FN9. Encephalopathy is defined in the Vaccine Act "Qualifications and aids to interpretation" as "any significant acquired abnormality of, or injury to, or impairment of function of the brain. Among the frequent manifestations of encephalopathy are focal and diffuse neurological signs, increased intracranial pressure or changes lasting at least six hours in level of consciousness, with or without convulsions. The neurological signs and symptoms of encephalopathy may be temporary with complete recovery, or may result in various degrees of permanent impairment." 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-14(b)(3)(A). Encephalitis refers to an "encephalopathy caused by an inflammatory response in the brain. This is usually manifested with systemic constitutional symptoms, particularly fever and pleocytosis of the cerebrospinal fluid. However, the terms encephalopathy and encephalitis have been used imprecisely and even interchangeably in the literature." 1994 IOM REPORT at 337.

On July 2, 1997, petitioner once again was admitted to Hartford Hospital, this time because of "increasing dizziness" and "gait instability." Id. (P.Ex. 1 at 90-91; P.Ex. 4 at *274 72; P.Ex. 21 at 1). In addition, an examination revealed petitioner was almost completely blind in her right eye. (P.Ex. 27 at 59). On this occasion, a MRI brain scan showed "multiple areas of white matter abnormality," noting the possibility of "encephalitis or ADEM [FN10] or even an acute demyelinating process." Id. (P.Ex. 4 at 24; P.Ex. 21 at 1). Based on petitioner's symptoms a month earlier, the resident physician concluded that: "The possibilities of encephalitis or ADEM or even an acute demyelinating process are in consideration." (P.Ex.27 at 35). Another of petitioner's hospital physicians concurred that her "presentation was not felt to be typical for multiple sclerosis [but he was concerned about] another autoimmune demyelinating diastasis." Id. (P.Ex. 1 at 91). He also was uncertain whether petitioner's condition was "due to acute disseminated encephalomyelitis or a form fruste of Behcet's disease." [FN11] Id. (P.Ex. 1 at 90-91). Another Hartford Hospital doctor reported a differential diagnoses [FN12] of ADEM, multiple sclerosis, or vasculitis. [FN13] Id. (P.Ex. 18 at 322). On July 8, 1997, petitioner again was discharged. Id. (P.Ex. 1 at 90-91).

FN10. ADEM is an abbreviation for "acute disseminated encephalomyelitis," which like multiple sclerosis is a demyelinating disease affecting the nerve fibers in the nervous system, which is "characterized by perivascular lymphocyte and mononuclear clear cell infiltration and demyelination ... It is believed to be a manifestation of an autoimmune attack on the myelin of the central nervous system. Clinical manifestations include fever, headache, vomiting, and drowsiness progressing to lethargy and coma; tremor, seizures, and paralysis may also occur." DORLAND'S at 589. ADEM also is "characterized by acute depression of consciousness and multifocal neurologic findings occurring within days to weeks (5 days to 6 weeks) following an inciting event. It is characterized pathologically by diffuse foci of perivenular inflammation and demyelination most prominent in the white matter of the brain and spinal cord." 1994 IOM REPORT at 83 (citation omitted).

FN11. Behcet's disease is "characterized by simultaneously or successively occurring recurrent attacks of genital and oral ulcerations ... often with arthritis; a phase of generalized disorder, occurring more in men than women, with variable manifestations, including dermatitis, erythema nodosum, thrombophlebitis, and cerebral involvement." STEDMAN'S at 1748.

FN12. A differential diagnosis is "the determination of which of two or more diseases with similar symptoms is the one from which the patient is suffering, by a systematic comparison and contrasting of the clinical findings." STEDMAN'S at 492.

FN13. Vasculitis is an "inflammation of the blood or lymph vessels of the central nervous system." DORLAND'S at 1934.

From April 1997 to May 1998, petitioner had a total of seven MRI brain scans. (P.Ex. 4 at 72). "[B]y 7/97 [punctate lesions] had blossomed into a right temporal parietal lesion followed thereafter by development of lesions disseminated through the central nervous system[.]" (P.Ex. 4 at 72). On May 28, 1998, a lab test indicated that petitioner's myelin basic protein levels were "indicative of an acute demylinating episode, such as occurs with multiple sclerosis." (P.Ex. 18 at 560). By June 4, 1998, petitioner's attending physician concluded that she had developed ADEM, although "the findings are unusual and atypical." (P.Ex. 3 at 78). On July 27, 1998 and again on January 7, 1999, petitioner experienced optic neuritis in her left eye. Id. at *3 (P.Ex. 4 at 72; P.Ex. 21 at 2).

At the request of Dr. Lesser and Dr. Silvers, Dr. Vollmer, Director of the Neuroimmunology Program at Yale University, examined petitioner on April 27, 1999. He concluded that neurosarcoid or isolated angiitis [FN14] was " the most likely diagnosis," although multiple sclerosis "remains in the differential diagnosis." Id. (P.Ex. 8 at 4). On May 15, 1999, another MRI brain scan "reveal[ed] some small abnormalities scattered throughout the white matter, suggestive of vasculitis or sarcoid or parainfectious disease." Id. (P.Ex. 4 at 23). Dr. Vollmer observed this "pattern [was] not typical of multiple sclerosis," but concluded that "[g]iven the lack of confirmatory evidence for multiple sclerosis, and the lack of evidence of recent progression, I am unable to make a definitive diagnosis at this time. Nevertheless I do not see evidence of multiple sclerosis, but remain concerned that there may be some other inflammatory disease." Id. (P.Ex. 4 at 23; P.Ex. 8 at 6).

> FN14. Angiitis is "isolated vasculitis [inflammation of the blood or lymph vessels] of the central nervous system." DORLAND'S at 81.

*275 On June 10, 1999, Dr. Silvers noted in petitioner's medical record that, "[W]hile primary CNS vasculitis is a thought, I would think that the absence of a significant headache, the initial episode of a febrile encephalomyelitis and the MRI's [sic] would support a demyelinating illness." Id. (P.Ex. 1 at 37-38); see also P.Ex. 1 at 21 (Vaccine Adverse Event Reporting System, dated December 22, 1999, stating petitioner's reaction to the March 28, 1997 tetanus toxoid vaccine was adverse and that she was diagnosed as having "Acute Disseminated Encephalomyelitis").

On March 31, 2000, petitioner filed the information required to initiate an action under the Vaccine Act.

Following a May 4, 2000 examination, Dr. Silvers concluded that petitioner had a primary diagnosis of "Probable multiphasic ADEM." (P.Ex. 1 at 11). On August 6, 2000, petitioner experienced a brain seizure and again was admitted to Hartford Hospital. Id. at *4 (P.Ex. 18 at 93). A brain biopsy was performed that "showed clear evidence of inflammation in the central nervous system." TR. 14. (emphasis added). Petitioner was diagnosed with "vasculitis with secondary tissue destruction and demyelination consistent with primary angiitis." Id. (P.Ex. 25 at 46). On August 17, 2000, a Hartford Hospital Department of Radiology Report noted that petitioner's symptoms were "consistent with an acute demylinating process which includes MS or a previously suspected diagnosis of encephalitis." (P. Ex 25 at 133).

And, a Radiology Report, dated December 2, 2000, reported "[C]linical Indication: Multiple Sclerosis," but also noted "very minimal progression of Multiple Sclerosis changes in the left parietal lobe." Id. (P.Ex. 26 at 137). On December 11, 2000, Dr. Vollmer summarized petitioner's condition as a:

> relapsing neurologic syndrome that began with an acute illness in 1997, associated with fever and altered mental status. However, she has continued to have relapses since that time with loss of vision which comes on very quickly and also a left hemiparesis that evolved over a matter of a few days. This was associated with a seizure like episode. A biopsy suggested CNS vasculitis, but also show some demyelination and macrophasias, suggesting possibly an acute demyelinating lesion. Unfortunately, the patient's history and MRI is not specific and does not eliminate the possibility that she has CNS vasculitis despite this.

EXPERT PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE CHIEF SPECIAL MASTER

On June 14, 2002, the Chief Special Master presided over a hearing of the parties' experts.

F. Petitioner's Expert-Dr. Derek R. Smith, M.D.

The Chief Special Master found that petitioner's expert, Dr. Derek R. Smith, M.D., was "knowledgeable about his area of expertise and the facts of this case; he testified cogently and credibly." Althen, at *4 n. 6.

Dr. Smith is a board-certified neurologist, with a sub-speciality in multiple sclerosis and neuroimmunology. Id. He is currently a Clinical Instructor at the Harvard Medical School and also an Associate Professor of Neurology at Brigham Women's Hospital in Boston. Id. Dr. Smith has published writings regarding multiple sclerosis and neurologic injuries. Id. Dr. Smith exclusively treats patients with multiple sclerosis (approximately 100-150 persons per month), providing first and second opinions and long-term treatment. Id. (TR 4-6). In addition, Dr. Smith is engaged in conducting clinical trials for future treatment of multiple sclerosis and has an interest in immune mechanisms in multiple sclerosis, clinical trials in multiple sclerosis, and immune deviation concerning therapeutic modalities. Id. He also has been engaged in research "looking at T cell [FN15] function in patients with MS and trying 276 to identify differences as compared to normal controls in terms of the way that ... T cells are ... either functioning or interacting with the rest of the immune system." Id. (TR 7).

> FN15. A "T cell" is one that "initiates immune responses against specific agents ... The function of T cells ... is to start both unspecific immune responses, activate cells that are not specific, but would provide an inflammatory environment that is conductive of eliminating [a] foreign agent, and also, stimulate the activation, maturation of so-call D lymphocytes, which make antibodies." (TR 82).

Dr. Smith testified that he is "highly confident that, in the right individuals, a tetanus toxoid vaccination can cause central nervous system demyelination." Althen, at *4. (TR 35). Dr. Smith's July 10, 2001 written opinion noted that petitioner "had a history of hypothyroidism probably on an autoimmune basis." (P.Ex. 21 at 1). In addition, he testified that the tetanus toxoid vaccine administered to petitioner in March 1997 "probably" played a role in petitioner's illness. "There was no preceding viral infection. There was no other explanation for why she could have had a sudden onset of profound immune responses in the central nervous system." (TR 13, 37) (emphasis added). Dr. Smith also testified that the tetanus toxoid vaccine more probably than not substantially contributed to petitioner's optic neuritis and subsequent demyelinating disorder that progressed from March 28, 1997 to the present. (TR 12-14; P.Ex. 21 at 1-2).

The medical theory on which Dr. Smith based his expert opinion is known as the theory of "degeneracy," resulting from growing knowledge about "molecular mimicry." [FN16] Id. Dr. Smith explained to the Chief Special Master that "the reason one gives vaccinations is in order to create memory cells, T cells, B cells that will respond to the pathogen that is being vaccinated against in the future." Id. (TR. 11-13, 35, 39). The body's T cells, however, can "degenerate" and mistakenly respond to non-specific or non-native antigens, such as CNS myelin antigens, rather than the vaccine's antigen. Id. (TR 27-31). This mistake can then trigger an inflammatory response, which ultimately manifests itself as a demyelinating disease through "epitope spreading," [FN17] resulting in a chronic condition, such as that developed by petitioner. Id. at *5 (TR 33-34, 37). Dr. Smith reported that the degeneracy of T cells is "a widely recognized principle in medicine, accepted in the field of neuroimmunology and supported by the [medical] literature." Id. (TR 30, 32). Dr. Smith acknowledged, however, that the 1994 IOM REPORT concluded that there was insufficient evidence at that time to accept or reject a causal relationship between tetanus toxoid vaccine and demyelinating disease, but he believed that developments in laboratory and clinical work since 1994 may supplant the epidemiologic literature, on which the 1994 IOM REPORT's conclusions were based. (TR 44). [FN18]

> FN16. Molecular mimicry is a "phenomenon wherein, two separate peptides or proteins are not identical, but because of the structure or their component of amino acids, in terms of ... the way they may look to the immune system, they appear to be identical[.]" (TR 21).
> FN17. An "epitope" is the "simplest form of an antigenic determinant, on a complex antigenic molecule, which can combine with antibody or T cell receptor." STEDMAN'S at 610. "Epitope spreading" is a "process that was described in the experimental model for MS and has been repeated many times; whereby, an immune response that is initially very restricted to a few different types of T cells with a few different T cell receptors over time, because of continuing inflammation, can become more widespread and involve more different T cells, more different antigens." (TR 33).

FN18. See, e.g., S. Schwartz et al., "Acute disseminated encephalomyelitis; a follow-up study of 40 adult patients," Neurology, May 22, 2001, at 1 ("many patients initially diagnosed with ADEM develop clinically definite MS upon long-term follow up") (P.Ex. 40 at 1, 4); see also G. Schwartz et al., "Acute midbrain syndrome as an adverse reaction to tetanus immunization," 15 Intensive Care Medicine 53 (1988) ("The occurrence of nearly identical episodes was remarkable, as well as the relatively rapid return to normal consciousness and neurological status after deep coma."); G.K. Schlenska, "Unusual Neurological Complications Following Tetanus Toxoid Administration," 215 J. Neurology 299 (1977) ("Neurological complications [after tetanus shots] occurred extremely rarely ... it is less well known that tetanus toxoid may contain traces of antibody producing protein, which is responsible for these complications.").

Dr. Smith also testified that the onset of petitioner's initial inflammatory condition, optic neuritis, occurred within a medically accepted time period. Id. at *6 (TR 38). In addition, in his judgment, whether petitioners's condition is diagnosed as relapsing *277 ADEM, MS, or CNS vasculitis "is not a big issue" as "the underlying inflammatory process is undoubtedly the same in each instance." Id. (TR 15; P.Ex. 21 at 2). Finally, Dr. Smith testified that he could ascertain no alternative causes to the tetanus toxoid vaccine in petitioner's medical history that would explain the onset of her demyelinating illness or its chronic nature. Id. (TR 13-14, 38, 55-57, 62).

G. The Government's Experts

1. Dr. Arthur P. Safran, M.D.

The Chief Special Master found the testimony of one of the government's experts, Dr. Arthur P. Safran, M..D., "credible, [although] it did not add significantly to the resolution of the issues before the court." Althen, at *6 n. 12. Dr. Safran is board-certified in both internal medicine and neurology. Id. Currently, he serves as an Associate Clinical Professor at Boston University School of Medicine, an Instructor at Tufts University School of Medicine, and a Lecturer at Harvard Medical School. Id. The topic of his academic instruction is neurology. Id. Dr. Safran also serves as an Attending Neurologist and Associate Physician at various Boston hospitals. Id. Dr. Safran's clinical practice includes patients with various neurological disorders of the peripheral and CNS, primarily multiple sclerosis patients. Id. (TR 132). In addition, Dr. Safran has published journals and other reference materials on multiple sclerosis. Id.

Dr. Safran rejected a causal relationship between petitioner's tetanus toxoid vaccine and her subsequent illness, which he concluded is "an undiagnosed disease of the nervous system, with manifestations suggesting differential diagnosis lies between multiple sclerosis and vasculitis of the central nervous system, favoring the later." (R. Ex. A at 1; TR 134-35, 138-39, 145, 160- 63). Dr. Safran concluded that petitioner's illness was more likely "vasculitis or angiitis of the central nervous system," based on: an April 1997 onset of optic neuritis, which he characterized as a "vasculitis illness;" a 2000 brain biopsy indicating "some evidence of demyelination, as well as vasculitis;" petitioner's past physician treatment history; a family history of aneurysms, which are "associated with vasculitis;" and the fact that the onset of petitioner's illness fell within a medically acceptable time period for immune mediated illness. Id. at *6. (TR at 134-35, 157-59, 160-62). Dr. Safran admitted, however, that when he rendered his expert opinion on petitioner's diagnosis, he overlooked P.Ex. 35, indicating that petitioner's physician had prescribed AVONEXTM, a drug used to treat MS, in 2002. (TR 155).

He further testified that he was unaware of medical reports, medical literature, or epidemiology that linked tetanus toxoid either to CNS disorders or a neurological condition that manifested itself two weeks after vaccination as optic neuritis and then progressed into vasculitis or multiple sclerosis. Id. at *7 (R. Ex. A at 2; TR 137-38, 147, 151). Therefore, he concluded that a causal connection between petitioner receiving the tetanus toxoid vaccine and her illness was "remote." Id. (TR 159).

Dr. Safran also criticized Dr. Smith's reliance on the relationship between tetanus toxoid and Guillain-Barre Syndrome, [FN19] discussed in the 1994 IOM REPORT, to support a theory that a similar causal relationship could exist between the tetanus toxoid vaccine and CNS disorders. Id. (TR 136- 37; 156). Dr. Safran's reason for discounting this possibility was the "cells [involved in tetanus toxoid and CNS disorders] are different, and the epidemiology is not shown." Id.

> FN19. Guillian-Barre Syndrome ("GBS") is "an acute, immune-mediated disorder of peripheral nerves, spinal roots, and cranial nerves, commonly presenting as a rapidly progressing, areflexive, relatively symmetric ascending weakness of the limb, truncal, respiratory, pharyngeal, and facial musculature, with variable sensory and autonomic dysfunction; typically reaches its nadir in 2-3 weeks, followed initially by a plateau period of similar duration, and then subsequently by a gradual but complete recovery in the majority of cases." STEDMAN'S at 1755.

2. Dr. Roland M.G. Martin, M.D.

The Chief Special Master found the testimony of the government's second expert witness, Dr. Roland M.G. Martin, M.D., to be "cogent" and "credible" and that he demonstrated "significant knowledge about his 278 medical field and its application to the general causation issue in this case." Id. at *7 n. 15.

Dr. Martin is board-certified in neurology and electrophysiology and currently is the Acting Chief of the Cellular Immunology Section of the Neuroimmunology Branch at the Department of Health and Human Service's National Institute of Health ("NIH"), which is involved in "T cell immunology and its relation to neuro-immunological disorders[,] particularly MS." Id. (TR at 65-67). In addition, Dr. Martin is currently an Adjunct Professor of Neurology at the University of Maryland's Baltimore Medical School and an Adjunct Professor at Howard University in neurology, immunology, and genetics. Id. Dr. Martin also sees private patients with MS, ADEM, and vasculitis, has served on scientific advisory committees, and published and/or reviewed journal articles concerning multiple sclerosis and other neurological disorders. Id.

Dr. Martin testified that he is unaware of published data that suggests the tetanus toxoid vaccine can trigger CNS T cells or cause a demyelinating disease of the CNS. Id. at *7 (TR 69, 84-92, 126). "[Research] does not exclude the theoretical possibility [that tetanus toxoid can trigger CNS]. But it does not support [that possibility]." (TR 70). Dr. Martin was aware that the 1994 IOM REPORT acknowledged a link between tetanus toxoid and peripheral nervous system autoimmune disease, such as GBS, but he felt the level of occurrence was low. Id. at *8 (TR 78-81).

Dr. Martin, however, agreed with the theory of the evolution of molecular mimicry since it was now accepted that "T cells are able to recognize a wide variety of antigen." Id. at *7 (TR 71). Based on data from NIH and other laboratories, however, Dr. Martin believed that molecular mimicry "by itself is in all likelihood not sufficient to initiate an autoimmune disease. These may only occur in individuals with a particularly susceptible genetic background, and in addition strong unspecific factors that stimulate the immune system such as a viral infection." (D. Ex. C at 1-2). Dr. Martin, however, acknowledged that "The susceptibility for autoimmune disease is ... relatively high. For example, the major HLA [FN20] idea that is associated with MS is found in about 25 percent of the population. If you take MS patients, about 50 to 60 percent have this one HLA. So, many, many people have the genetic background, but only one in a thousand develops MS. [T]hings need to ...

happen to overrun what naturally protects from these diseases." (TR 114). Since Dr. Martin did not review petitioner's medical records, however, he was unaware of petitioner's history of hypothyroidism, which Dr. Smith concluded was "probably on an autoimmune basis." (P.Ex. 21 at 1). Dr. Martin also agreed with Dr. Smith that a chronic inflammatory disease could be caused and maintained by "epitope spreading." Id. at *8 (TR 107-108).

> FN20. HLA is an "Abbreviation for human leukocyte antigens[.]" S TEDMAN'S at 825.

Dr. Martin did not dispute that petitioner has a CNS disorder and that the optic neuritis occurred within a medically appropriate time for immune mediated responses. Id. at *7 n. 16. (TR 68, 69, 77, 119-20). Unlike Dr. Smith, however, he saw no link between petitioner's optic neuritis and her later symptoms. Id. Dr. Martin concluded that petitioner's symptoms were "not compatible with MS or a demyelinating disease," but with either a viral or bacterial meningitis. Id.

THE STEVENS "ANALYTICAL FRAMEWORK"

The Chief Special Master was the author of a 2001 decision, Stevens v. Sec'y Dep't of Health and Human Servs., 2001 WL 387418 (Fed.Cl.Spec.Mstr. Mar. 30, 2001) ("Stevens"), wherein he fashioned and applied what he characterized as "the appropriate analytical framework for evaluating off-Table, so called causation in fact claims." Stevens, at *6 (emphasis added). According to the Chief Special Master, this "framework" addresses the "difficulties special masters encounter when weighing evidence against the general principles of causation." Stevens, at *23.

The Stevens "analytical framework" has five elements:

*279 1) "Proof of medical plausibility," which is established by "proffering a theory of biologic mechanism by which a component of the vaccine can cause the type of injury suffered." Stevens, at *23 (emphasis added);

2) "Proof of conformation of medical plausibility from the medical community and literature." Id. at *23-24 (emphasis added);

3) "Proof of an injury recognized by the medical plausibility evidence and literature." Id. at *25. (emphasis added);

4) "Proof of a medically acceptable temporal relationship between the vaccination and the onset of the alleged injury." Id.; and

5) "Proof of the elimination of other causes." Id. at *26.

See also April 19, 2001 Chief Special Master Order (advising the other special masters that the Stevens analysis will be followed by the Chief Special Master in a number of "subsequent cases," including Althen).

THE CHIEF SPECIAL MASTER'S APPLICATION OF THE STEVENS "ANALYTICAL FRAMEWORK" IN THIS CASE

The Chief Special Master in this case found that the "proof of medical plausibility" element of the Stevens "analytical framework" was satisfied by petitioner's expert opinion that T cells that come into contact with the tetanus antigen or peptide can "mistakenly respond to a variety of non-specific or non-native antigens such as central nervous system self-antigens ... trigger [ing] CNS disorders[.]" Althen, at *9. (TR 28-31). The Chief Special Master also was persuaded that petitioner satisfied this element because the 1994 IOM REPORT stated that: ("[I]t is biologically plausible that ... sequence similarities of proteins in the vaccine to host proteins, such as those of myelin ... might evoke a response to a self-antigen, so-called molecular mimicry."). Althen, at *11 (quoting 1994 IOM REPORT at 48, 84) (emphasis added).

The Chief Special Master, however, found that petitioner did not satisfy Stevens' second element, medical plausibility evidence and literature, i.e., "confirmation from the relevant medical community that it is seeing, reporting (in peer-reviewed literature), and discussing a 'suspected or potential' association between the tetanus toxoid vaccine and [the alleged injuries.]" Althen, at *14. Without such "objective confirmation that the vaccine administered is potentially associated with the injury alleged, petitioner's causal claims are mere speculation and thus insufficient." Id. at *12.

On July 2, 2003, petitioner filed a timely motion for review of the Entitlement Decision. Petitioner seeks review on two bases. First, petitioner asserts that "the use of the Stevens' 'Prongs' is an abuse of discretion and not in accordance with the law." See Pet. Mem. In Support of Motion For Review at 10. Alternatively, assuming that the Stevens' "analytical framework" is lawful, petitioner argues that all five of the Stevens' "Prongs" were satisfied in fact. Therefore, petitioner argues that the decision of the Chief Special Master, holding only the first of the "Prongs" was satisfied, was arbitrary and capricious. Id. at 17-18.

On August 4, 2003, the government responded, agreeing with petitioner that the "Stevens standard" is contrary to law. See Response to Pet. Motion for Review at 8-11. Assuming arguendo that the " Stevens standard" is lawful, however, the government contended that petitioner's suggestion that a more relaxed causation standard should be applied has been "waived, has no merit, and is based on a non-precedential decision." Id. at *7-8. Instead, the government argues that the court should affirm the Chief Special Master's decision because the petitioner failed to demonstrate that the tetanus toxoid vaccination caused her injuries. Id. at *3-8.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Congress requires the judges of this court to analyze conclusions of law made by a special master under the Vaccine Act de novo, under a "not in accordance with law" standard. See 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-12(e)(2)(B). "The 'not in accordance with the law' aspect of the standard of review is ... involved ... [where there is] dispute over statutory construction 280 or other legal issues." Hines v. Sec'y Dep't of Health and Human Servs., 940 F.2d 1518, 1527 (Fed.Cir.1991); see also Saunders v. Sec'y Dep't of Health and Human Servs., 25 F.3d 1031, 1033 (Fed.Cir.1994) (quoting Munn v. Sec'y Dep't of Health and Human Servs., 970 F.2d 863, 870 n. 10 (Fed.Cir.1992)).

Factual findings of a special master, however, should not be set aside unless they are found to be "arbitrary and capricious" or a special master has abused his or her discretion in determining such findings. See 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-12(e)(2)(B). The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit ("Federal Circuit"), recognizing that "no uniform definition of this standard has emerged," has instructed the court that the decision of a special master may be found to be "arbitrary and capricious" only if he or she:

> relied on factors which Congress has not intended [the special masters] to consider, entirely failed to consider an important aspect of the problem, offered an explanation for its decision that runs counter to the evidence ... or is so implausible that it could not be ascribed to a difference in view or the product of agency expertise.

THE ELEMENTS AND BURDEN OF PROOF IN VACCINE ACT CASES

The Vaccine Act provides that a petitioner may qualify to receive compensation and other relief under the Vaccine Injury Compensation Program ("Program") if injury can be established either by causation in law or causation in fact. Causation in law is established if one of the vaccines, listed in the Vaccine Injury Table at 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-14(a) ("Table"), was administered to a petitioner and the "first symptom or manifestation of onset or of the significant aggravation of such injuries, disabilities, illnesses, conditions, and deaths" of specific adverse medical conditions associated with the use of each vaccine and listed in the Table occurred within a time period specified in the Table. See 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-14(a); 42 C.F.R. § 100.3(a). The Table is to be read and interpreted by reference to "Qualifications and aids to interpretation," that define the key terms used in the Table. See 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-14(b); 42 C.F.R. § 100.3(b).

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

[1] Congress also decided to afford a petitioner the opportunity to receive relief under the Program even if the time period for the first symptom or manifestation of a specified injury is not satisfied. See 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-11(c)(1)(C)(ii); § 300aa-13. Under these circumstances, however, a petitioner must establish causation in fact under a traditional tort analysis, i.e., first, by establishing a prima facie case offering evidence of sufficient facts to establish each element of the claim and then, by meeting a burden of proof as to each element of the claim under a "preponderance of the evidence" standard. Thus, a non-Table Vaccine Act petitioner must proffer at least some evidence as to each element of the claim, but also sufficient evidence to persuade the special master or court by a preponderance or "greater weight" of evidence that each fact asserted is more probable than not.

In interpreting the Vaccine Act, the Federal Circuit has explained that a petitioner must proffer evidence that meets a "preponderance of evidence" burden of proof in non-Table causation in fact cases: "a proximate temporal association alone does not suffice to show a causal link between the vaccination and the injury. To prove causation in fact, petitioners must proffer a medical theory that explains the causal connection between the vaccination and illness manifested. Causation in fact requires proof of a logical sequence of cause and effect showing that the vaccination was the reason for the injury. A reputable medical or scientific explanation must support this logical sequence of cause and effect." Grant v. Sec'y Dep't of Health & Human Servs., 956 F.2d 1144, 1148 (Fed.Cir.1992) (citation omitted); 281Bunting v. Sec'y Dep't of Health and Human Servs.,* 931 F.2d 867, 873 (Fed.Cir.1991) ("petitioner's burden is not to show a generalized 'cause and effect relationship' with listed illnesses, but only to show causation in the particular case[.] [Otherwise,] a different and greater burden [would be placed] on petitioners than was enacted by Congress."). Subsequently, the Federal Circuit has clarified that Grant requires satisfaction of two separate elements to make out a prima facie case in a non-Table case: petitioner must prove, "by a preponderance of the evidence, that the vaccine was not only a but-for cause of the injury but also a substantial factor in bringing about the injury." Shyface v. Sec'y Dep't of Health and Human Servs., 165 F.3d 1344, 1352 (Fed.Cir.1999) (adopting RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS 431 (1977) standard for determining the "legal cause" of the harm). Thus, evidence of a similarity to a Table injury, Table time periods, or the elimination of other potential causes of injury all have been held to be insufficient to establish causation in fact as a matter of law in non-Table cases. See Grant, 956 F.2d at 1148.

[2] If petitioner is able to establish legal causation or causation in fact, then the burden of proof shifts to the government under 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-13(a)(1)(B) to establish that a factor unrelated to the vaccine was the actual cause of the petitioner's illness or injury. See Jay v. Sec'y Dep't of Health and Human Servs., 998 F.2d 979, 984 (Fed.Cir.1993); see also Strother v. Sec'y Dep't of Health and Human Servs., 21 Cl.Ct. 365, 374 (1990) (Rader, J.).

DISCUSSION

Neither the United States Court of Federal Claims nor the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has had an occasion to review the Stevens decision. Nevertheless, the Chief Special Master advises that "The only issue the court must resolve [on review of the instant case] is whether petitioner satisfied the standard established in Stevens." Althen, at *9. The court disagrees. The Stevens' causation in fact "analytical framework" does not bind the court. The Chief Special Master's adoption and utilization of that "framework" in deciding the instant case, however, is ripe for the court's de novo review.

A. The Chief Special Master's Utilization of the Stevens "Analytical Framework" to Decide the Instant Case Was Contrary to Law.

The limited duties of a special master are defined in the Vaccine Act with clarity and specificity:

> (d) Special masters
> (2) The special masters shall recommend rules to the Claims Court...

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

> (3)(A) A special master to whom a petition has been assigned shall issue a decision ...[that] shall --
> (i) include findings of fact and conclusions of law, and > (ii) be issued as expeditiously as practicable....

42 U.S.C. § 300aa-12(d) (emphasis added).

In addition, the Act requires that special masters:

> shall consider, in addition to all other relevant medical and scientific evidence contained in the record-
> (A) any diagnosis, conclusion, medical judgment ... which is contained in the record regarding the nature, causation, and aggravation of the petitioner's illness, disability, injury, condition, or death, and
> (B) the results of any diagnostic or evaluative test which are contained in the record and the summaries and conclusions.

42 U.S.C. § 300aa-13(b)(1) (emphasis added); Rule 3(b), VACCINE RULES OF THE UNITED STATES COURT OF FEDERAL CLAIMS.

[3] The purview of the special masters, therefore, was limited by Congress to making case-by-case determinations based solely on evidence "contained in the record." 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-13(b)(1). In direct contravention of the language of the Vaccine Act, however, the Chief Special Master proclaims that the special masters now "must move beyond case-by-case decision-making toward instruction -what types of evidence are persuasive, how much evidence is necessary, what causal relationships are pure speculation, which relationships are proven to ensure 282 that similarly-situated petitioners are treated alike and thus fairly." Althen, at *16 (emphasis added). Not a word in the Vaccine Act, however, authorizes the Chief Special Master to impose any particular "analytical framework" in a causation in fact case; nor is the Chief Special Master charged with determining "the" framework. If a question of law arises regarding the interpretation or implementation of the Vaccine Act, that is a matter for the courts, not the special masters. See Knudsen v. Sec'y Dep't of Health and Human Servs., 35 F.3d 543, 549 (Fed.Cir.1994) ("The sole issues for the special master are, based on the record evidence as a whole and the totality of the case, whether it has been shown by a preponderance of the evidence that a vaccine caused the ... injury or that the ... injury is a table injury, and whether it has not been shown by a preponderance of the evidence that a factor unrelated to the vaccine caused the ... injury. See 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-13(a)(1), (b)(1).") (emphasis added); Hodges v. Sec'y Dept. of Health and Human Servs., 9 F.3d 958, 961 (Fed.Cir.1993) ("Congress assigned to a group of specialists, the Special Masters ... the unenviable job of sorting through these painful cases and, based upon their accumulated expertise in the field, judging the merits of the individual claims.") (emphasis added). That the parties in Stevens invited the Chief Special Master to opine on such a framework does not change this analysis.

[4] Of course, a special master properly may propose an "analytical framework" in dicta. See, e.g., Wagner v. Sec'y of Health and Human Servs., 1997 WL 617035, at *9 ("[M]y own thoughts on this legal issue constitute pure dicta, not essential to my task [.]") A special master's views also may be of general public interest and make a valuable contribution to the academic and scholarly commentary about the Vaccine Act and its administration. A special master, however, is an adjudicative fact finder charged with applying existing legal precedent to decide a particular case based on the record before him or her; a special master ultimately is not the maker nor the interpreter of the law. [FN21] See, e.g., La Buy v. Howes Leather Co., 352 U.S. 249, 256, 77 S.Ct. 309, 1 L.Ed.2d 290 (1957) ("The use of master is 'to aid judges in the performance of specific judicial duties'... and not to displace the court.") (citation omitted); In re Bituminous Coal Operators' Ass'n, Inc., 949 F.2d 1165, 1166 (D.C.Cir.1991) (Ginsburg, J.) (requiring a district judge "to reserve ... and not delegate to the special master, the core [judicial] function of making dispositive rulings, including ... conclusions of law on issues of liability.") (emphasis added). Although the constitutional issues implicit in La Buy and explicitly raised in Bituminous Coal Operators' are not at issue here because of the court's Article I status and the fact that petitioner voluntarily initiated proceedings under the Vaccine Act, the concern that special masters confine their role to one of assisting the court, rather than usurping its authority and proper role to determine dispositive issues of law, is no less relevant in this case.

> FN21. See, e.g., Brazil, Wayne D., Special Masters in Complex Cases: Extending the Judiciary or Reshaping Adjudication, 53 U. CHI. L. REV. 394, 396 (Spring 1986) (observing "even [special] masters with clearly limited mandates seem pressured or tempted to gravitate into larger spheres. With broader duties, masters might contribute more, but they also may invade the proper preserve of the judiciary[.]")

B. The Application of the Stevens "Analytical Framework" In This Case Contravenes the Vaccine Act and Supreme Court and Federal Circuit Precedent.

The court's analysis of the Stevens "analytical framework" begins with an examination of whether the language of the Vaccine Act is clear. If so, "that is the end of the matter." Chevron U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Res. Def. Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 842-43, 104 S.Ct. 2778, 81 L.Ed.2d 694 (1984). In determining the clarity of the statute, the court "relies on a commonsense consideration of the words[.]" See Shalala v. Whitecotton, 514 U.S. 268, 277, 115 S.Ct. 1477, 131 L.Ed.2d 374(1995) (O'Connor, J., concurring opinion). Only if the statute is "silent or ambiguous" is any further inquiry required. See Chevron, 467 U.S. at 843, 104 S.Ct. 2778. In Stevens, however, the Chief Special Master erroneously observed: "Unfortunately, Congress 283 imparted little guidance as to what proof would be necessary to show causation." Stevens, at *7. To the contrary, the language of 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-13(a)(1) could not be more clear: Congress specified that the petitioner must prove causation in fact by a "preponderance of the evidence" as to each factor set forth in 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-11(c)(1). In the instant case, the Chief Special Master, perhaps recognizing the flawed premise of Stevens, now has re-characterized it as a proposed "analytical framework" consisting of a "five-prong analysis as a means of meeting the preponderance of evidence standard[.]" Althen, at *12 n. 29 (emphasis added). The Stevens "analytical framework," however, is much more than a "means." Id. In fact and in operation, three of the five Stevens elements either significantly change the statutory burden of proof or directly contravene the language of the Vaccine Act and therefore are erroneous as a matter of law. See Althen, at *15 ("Stevens attempts to guide the experts by defining 'preponderance [.]' ") As discussed infra, the Supreme Court already has defined "preponderance," and the Federal Circuit has provided ample guidance as to how to weigh evidence in Vaccine Act cases.

1. The "Medical Plausibility" Element

The Supreme Court has defined a preponderance of the evidence to require "the trier of fact 'to believe that the existence of a fact is more probable than its nonexistence before [he or she] may find in favor of the party who has the burden to persuade the [judge] of the fact's existence.' " Concrete Pipe and Prod. of California, Inc. v. Constr. Laborers Pension Trust for Southern California, 508 U.S. 602, 622, 113 S.Ct. 2264, 124 L.Ed.2d 539 (1993) (quoting In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 371-372, 90 S.Ct. 1068, 25 L.Ed.2d 368 (1970) (Harlan, J., concurring)). "[J]udges often express [preponderance of evidence] mathematically by saying the plaintiff must establish the facts necessary to her [or his] case by a probability greater than 0.5 or greater than 50%. That is to say the facts claimed by the plaintiff must be more likely than not to exist." DOBBS, DAN B., THE LAW OF T ORTS 360 (2000) ("DOBBS").

In the context of Vaccine Act cases, the Federal Circuit has summarized this evidentiary burden as follows: "The claimant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the vaccine, and not some other agent, was the actual cause of the injury." Munn, 970 F.2d. at 865. A preponderance of evidence, however, does not require proof of scientific certainty. Bunting, 931 F.2d at 873 ("The standard of proof required by the Act is simple preponderance of evidence; not scientific certainty."). Steven's "medical plausibility" element, however, changes and lowers the petitioner's burden of proof from the preponderance of the evidence standard required by 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-11(c)(1). To be "plausible" a fact need only be "superficially fair, reasonable, or valuable." MERRIAM-WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY 890 (10th ed.2001) (emphasis added). Therefore, by definition, a medical "plausibility" does not achieve the level of reliability expected in a medical record or medical opinion. See 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-13(a)(1) (specifically prohibiting a special master or the court from making "a finding based on the claims of a petitioner alone, unsubstantiated by medical records or by medical opinion"); RULE 8(C), VACCINE RULES OF THE UNITED STATES COURT OF FEDERAL CLAIMS (Appendix J to the RCFC) ("The special master will consider all relevant, reliable evidence, governed by principles of fundamental fairness to both parties.") (emphasis added); Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc. 509 U.S. 579, 590, 113 S.Ct. 2786, 125 L.Ed.2d 469 (1993) ("[T]he requirement that an expert's testimony pertain to 'scientific knowledge' establishes a standard of evidentiary reliability.") Indeed, even the Chief Special Master acknowledged the inherent vagueness attendant to using a "plausibility" standard: "Plausibility is different things to different people. [The 1994 IOM REPORT had] to explain how they were using plausibility because they used it several different ways throughout the report. It's ... difficult to get a grasp on." (TR 142-43). And Dr. Martin, one of the government's experts, observed: "Plausible ... is a very vague term. It's a hypothetical possibility." (TR 111).

This is more than an exercise in semantics. The Vaccine Act, as most legislation, was the *284 product of considerable compromise. As part of that compromise, the vaccine manufacturers acceded to those interests that wanted to allow petitioners who did not have Table injuries the opportunity to receive compensation under the Vaccine Act. The quid pro quo was that the manufacturers wanted to be able to rely on the fact that a non-Table petition would be required to meet a traditional tort causation in fact standard, which was and is settled as a matter of law. See, e.g., DOBBS at 360 ("A lesser standard of persuasion than preponderance of evidence [in tort cases] is almost unheard of."). Stevens' "medical plausibility" element, however, unlawfully changes the standard of proof that Congress determined was appropriate and, therefore, disturbs settled expectations that reflect "not only the weight of the public and private interest affected, but also a societal judgment about how the risk of error should be distributed between the litigants." Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 754-55, 102 S.Ct. 1388, 71 L.Ed.2d 599 (1982) (quoting Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 491, 100 S.Ct. 1254, 63 L.Ed.2d 552 (1980)) (holding that the "minimum requirements [of procedural due process] being a matter of federal law... are not diminished by the fact that the State may have specified its own procedures[.]"). Therefore, the Chief Special Master's findings regarding "medical plausibility" are contrary to law and should be reversed and vacated.

2. The "Confirmation of Medical Plausibility From the Medical Community and Literature" Element

[5] Stevens' second element requires "confirmation of medical plausibility from the medical community and literature." Stevens, at *23 (emphasis added). The Chief Special Master explains that this "Prong" requires petitioner to "establish that peer-reviewed literature is reporting that the vaccine is related in some sense to the injury alleged." Stevens, at * 24 (emphasis in original deleted in part). As a threshold matter, the Vaccine Act does not preclude causation in fact from being established by a petitioner in the absence of peer reviewed literature. Accordingly, this element changes and increases a petitioner's burden of proof. Moreover, this "Prong" is not faithful to Daubert, which does not require that an expert's theory be supported by scientific literature; instead, scientific literature is only one of several factors to be considered by the court in determining the reliability of an expert's opinion. See Daubert, 509 U.S. at 594, 113 S.Ct. 2786 ("The fact of publication (or lack thereof) in a peer-reviewed journal thus will be relevant, though not dispositive, consideration in assessing the scientific validity of a particular technique or methodology on which an opinion is premised.") (emphasis added).

[6][7] Accordingly, the Federal Circuit in Vaccine Act cases requires evidence of a strong temporal relationship and either reliable medical opinion or scientific theory explaining a logical sequence of cause and effect to establish causation in fact. See Grant, 956 F.2d at 1148 ("Causation in fact requires proof of a logical sequence of cause and effect showing that the vaccination was the reason for the injury. A reputable medical or scientific explanation must support this logical sequence of cause and effect.") (emphasis added); H.R.Rep. No. 99-908, pt. 1, at 15 (1986) ("evidence in the form of scientific studies or expert medical testimony is necessary to demonstrate causation[.]") (emphasis added). In addition, the mere suggestion in peer-reviewed literature that a vaccine is only " related in some sense" to the injury falls far short of the reliability required by a "preponderance" standard in an individual case. See Stevens, at *24 (emphasis added). At the same time, the lack of such literature, as a matter of law, does not preclude a petitioner from meeting a preponderance standard, based on the totality of evidence in a particular case. Therefore, the Chief Special Master's findings regarding "Prong" two of the Stevens "analytical framework" are contrary to law and should be reversed and vacated.

The Chief Special Master found that petitioner in the instant case did not satisfy the burden of proof regarding the second Stevens "Prong" and ended his analysis without any discussion about the three additional 285 "Prongs" of the "framework." [FN22] Therefore, no further review is required here, other than to note that "Prong" three suffers from the same deficiencies as elements one and two of the "analytical framework," because it requires proof of an injury based on the plausibility standard set out in "Prongs" one and two.

> FN22. Although the Chief Special Master's Entitlement Decision states that petitioner was denied relief based on the "totality of the evidence," Althen, at *1, this representation is belied by the fact that the Chief Special Master's Entitlement Decision ended its analysis with petitioner's failure to satisfy "Prong Two." See Althen, at *14 ("[T]he court simply cannot make the unsubstantiated evidentiary leap, that according to the medical community or peer-reviewed literature, there is a suspected or potential association between the tetanus toxoid vaccine and [the alleged injuries].").

C. The Petitioner Carried the Statutory Burden of Proving Causation in Fact.

The Federal Circuit held in Jay that petitioner was entitled to "judgment as a matter of law" if the petitioner carried its statutory burden of proving causation under 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-11(c)(1)(C)(ii) and 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-13(a)(1)(A). See Jay, 998 F.2d at 984. The undisputed facts in Jay on which the Federal Circuit relied in reversing the decision of the United States Court of Federal Claims and awarding petitioner relief in that case include that: "an otherwise healthy child received a DPT shot; the DPT shot caused fever, directly or indirectly limpness, and intermittent inconsolable extended screaming; the child missed his normal nightly feeding; the child died within 18 hours of the shot; the autopsy was inconclusive; and a medical expert testified, uncontradicted, that the DPT shot caused the death, the medical theory being that an encephalopathy occurred." Jay, 998 F.2d at 983. The record in this case shares many similarities.

In the instant case, petitioner's medical records evidence that she was generally in good health before she received a tetanus toxoid vaccine on March 28, 1997. (P.Ex. 20 at 1). Both of the government's experts agreed that the initial symptom of petitioner's illness, i.e., optic neuritis, occurred within a medically appropriate time period. [FN23] Optic neuritis is widely recognized as a symptom of "diffuse demyelinating diseases such as ADEM and multiple sclerosis." 1994 IOM REPORT at 83; see also id. Glossary Exhibit C at 340 ("Optic Neuritis represents a central demyelinating disease of the optic nerve anterior to the optic chiasm. It can occur as a solitary unexplained monophasic disease or it may be an early sign of multiple sclerosis."). [FN24] In addition, the petitioner established a logical sequence of cause and effect, in that within 18 days after receiving a tetanus toxoid vaccine and until the trial, petitioner evidenced some form of continuing and worsening demyelinating disease, which is "characterized pathologically by diffuse foci of perivenular inflammation[.]" 1994 IOM REPORT at 83. This record is replete with incident after incident of worsening inflammatory disease during this period. See infra at 3-6.

FN23. Dr. Martin testified: "Something in the range between seven (days) and four weeks would be an appropriate temporal relationship for an autoimmune response." (TR 119). Dr. Safran concurred that the temporal relationship here is appropriate. (TR 159).

FN24. Optic neuritis is not a "vasculitis" illness, as Dr. Safran, one the government's experts testified. See Althen, at *6.

[8] The law in the Federal Circuit is well established that once a petitioner establishes a strong temporal relationship between receiving the vaccine and first symptoms of illness, a logical sequence of cause and effect, supported by a reliable medical opinion or scientific theory, also must be proffered to explain the causal link. See Grant, 956 F.2d at 1148. Petitioner's expert presented a reliable medical opinion linking petitioner's medical records and progressing illness to the established medical theory of "degeneracy" and "epitope spreading" to establish causation. Both "degeneracy" and "epitope spreading" were known to and not disputed by Dr. Martin, one of the government's expert witnesses. [FN25] Moreover, Dr. Martin's 286 theory of "degeneracy" and "epitope spreading" appears to be supported by a pathology report, dated September 1, 2000, indicating that:

FN25. Dr. Martin testified, "I do not agree with the conclusions [of Dr. Smith that it is likely or probable that tetanus toxoid triggered petitioner's disability], but it is correct that degeneracy ... moves T lymphocytes ... [which] can respond to one antigen ... and are able to recognize large numbers, probably in the range of 10 to the six[th] of one million different antigens by one T cell receptor. Among these many antigens that stem from, a pattern as this cannot be excluded as a theoretically possibility ...." (TR 83) "I agree with the theoretical possibility [that tetanus toxoid caused petitioner's demeylinating illness], but I ... currently do not have the evidence supporting it.". (TR 122) (emphasis added).

> The deep cortex shows increasing abnormalities in relation to marked tissue destruction with secondary demyelination .... The tissue destruction appears to be due to inflammation involving the small and medium size blood vessels, many of which are surrounded and infiltrated by lympho-plasmaytic infiltrates extending into the adjacent tissue.... IP studies, however, show a marked predominance of T cells and insufficient atypia of B cells to sustain a diagnosis of lymphoma.... Absent any demonstrable cause of the vascular inflammation and absent systemic vasculitis, this case falls into the category of primary angiitis of the central nervous system.... Clinically and pathologically, this is an unusual presentation and evolution of cerebral vasculitis, and no agreement was reached on the nature of the disease [but] [m]orphologically, the features are those of a primary vasculitis of the brain.

[9] Finally there is no evidence in this record that petitioner's injuries were caused by some factor other than the tetanus toxoid vaccine. There is also no evidence of a virus or other explanation for petitioner's onset and deteriorating condition other than the tetanus toxoid vaccine, which is made from a bacterial agent. (TR 57). Notably, Dr. Vollmer early on identified an infection as a potential cause of petitioner's illness. (P.Ex. 4 at 23) ("small abnormalities scattered throughout the white matter, suggestive of vasculitis or sarcoid or parainfectious disease"). Neither Dr. Vollmer nor the government's experts, knew or seemed to appreciate that petitioner's hypothyroid condition likely was autoimmune disorder that would have made her T cells more sensitive to the effects of the vaccine and the potential for both degeneracy and epitode spreading. Nor did the Chief Special Master. As the Federal Circuit observed in Jay, "The special master losing sight of the forest for the trees, ignored entirely the fact of [a child's] death. [Petitioner's expert physician] did not assume that an encephalopathy occurred. Rather, he testified that an encephalopathy occurred based on [the child's] entire history[.]" Jay, 998 F.2d at 983 (emphasis added). Based on petitioner's entire medical history and the record in this case, the court believes that the petitioner satisfied the statutory requirements for recovery.

Petitioner proffered reliable medical records, a reputable medical opinion, a logical sequence of cause and effect, and a medical theory causally connecting the vaccination to the onset and development of her demyelinating illness. In other words, petitioner established that but for the vaccine, it is more likely than not (greater than 50%) that she would not have incurred optic neuritis and subsequent symptoms of demyelinating illness. Moreover, petitioner has established that it is more likely than not (greater than 50%) that the vaccine was a substantial factor in causing her demyelinating illness. Therefore, the Chief Special Master erred as a matter of law because the petitioner met the statutory burden to establish causation in fact under 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-11(c)(1)(C)(ii) and 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-13(a)(1)(A), albeit that causation was not established to a medical certainty. See Knudsen, 35 F.3d at 548-49 ("The determination of causation in fact under the Vaccine Act involves ascertaining whether a sequence of cause and effect is 'logical' and legally probable, not medically or scientifically certain."); Bunting, 931 F.2d at 873 ("The standard of proof required by the Act is simple preponderance of the evidence, not scientific certainty.") (emphasis added). Petitioner, therefore, is entitled to relief under the Vaccine Act.

287 CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, Petitioner's Motion for Review is GRANTED, the June 3, 2003 Entitlement Decision of the Chief Special Master is hereby REVERSED and VACATED, and the case is remanded to the Chief Special Master for an award of compensation to the petitioner, reasonable attorneys fees, and other costs. The Clerk of the Court shall enter judgment accordingly.

ORDER REGARDING POST-OPINION BRIEFS AND SETTING PRE-TRIAL STATUS CONFERENCE

A. Effect Of May 11, 1996 Federal Energy Regulating Commission Order On Jurisdiction

The court's November 26, 2003 Memorandum Opinion recognized that Federal Energy Regulatory Commission ("FERC") Order No. 888 required the "functional unbundling" of wholesale generation, transmission, and ancillary services, including regulating service. See 61 Fed. Reg. 21540 (May 10, 1996). On May 11, 1999, FERC approved, in final, the Western Area Power Administration's ("WAPA") unbundled rate for regulating service. The court has examined this filing and is of the opinion that the service offered would not have met North Star's technical requirements and, for this reason, that action by FERC did not affect the court's jurisdiction with respect to the dispute in this case. Nevertheless, the court would like the parties specifically to address this and the following issues in post-opinion briefs not to exceed 20 pages, which should be filed simultaneously on February 17, 2004.

B. Court Appointed Expert

Assuming the court continues to be satisfied as to its jurisdiction, the court has given some thought to how this case should proceed. The court's November 26, 2003 Memorandum Opinion held that the Consolidated Contract was sufficiently definite to meet the requirements of the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit with respect to contract formation. The court, however, did not determine whether or when that contract may have been breached. In order to make that determination, the court would need to know whether and when either party ended good faith negotiations regarding an "appropriate cost-based methodology" for the "In-Kind Energy" payment to be utilized as of July 1, 1998, i.e., one year after the Kingman, Arizona mill became operational. In order to make that determination, however, the court would need to know what "appropriate cost-based methodology" or "methodologies" would be "reasonable" under the circumstances. In that regard, the opinion of independent industry experts proffered by the parties, pursuant to Fed. R. Ev. 702, would appear to be the most efficient way of adducing such evidence.

In light of the highly technical nature of such evidence, however, the court is of the opinion that the interest of justice would be well served by the appointment of a technical expert for the court, pursuant to Fed. R. Ev. 706. See, e.g., Computer Assocs. v. Altai, Inc., 982 F.2d 693, 712-14 (2nd Cir. 1992) (J. Walker, Chief Judge) (affirming use of court expert appointed pursuant to Fed. R. Ev. 706 who "submitted a comprehensive written report that analyzed various aspects of the computer programs at issue and evaluated the parties' expert evidence . . . [because that] opinion was instrumental in dismantling the intricacies of computer science so that the court could formulate and apply an appropriate rule of law. While [that] report and testimony undoubtedly shed valuable light on the subject matter of the litigation, [the trial judge] remained, in the final analysis, the trier of fact."); see also Techsearch, L.L.C. v. Intel Corp., 286 F.3d 1360, 1378-81 (Fed. Cir. 2002) (affirming district court's appointment of technical advisor not subject to the requirements of Fed. R. Ev. 706, but suggesting appropriate guidelines for safeguarding the judicial process from undue influence and to ensure that the advisor's duties were clearly defined and limited); Associate Justice Stephen Breyer, "Economic Reasoning & Judicial Review," The American Enterprise Institute (Dec. 5, 2003) http://www.c-span.org/ Video Archives.

Therefore, the parties each should submit the names of three suggested court experts in their post-opinion briefs, together with an appendix providing the curriculum vitae of such proposed experts. The parties may provide a proposed court expert with a copy of Fed. R. Ev. 706, the court's November 26, 2003 Memorandum Opinion, and this Order, but should not engage in any substantive discussion about the case or issues.

C. New Issue Regarding Plaintiff's Standing

On December 9, 2003, the court was advised that plaintiff no longer owns the Kingman, Arizona mill. Therefore, plaintiff should address whether it continues to have standing to pursue this action and seek monetary relief in this court. In addition, on or before February 17, 2004 plaintiff should proffer the asset and purchase agreement regarding the sale of the Kingman, Arizona mill or other appropriate documentation evidencing that the breach of contract claim at issue in this case has been specifically reserved by plaintiff.

D. Amicus Of The Federal Trade Commission

WAPA has monopoly power over its transmission lines and therefore must conduct its business-related activities in a manner that does not impose excessive rents on customers. As a matter of law, the "reasonableness" of an "appropriate cost-based methodology" or "methodologies" for "In-Kind Energy" payment necessarily entails that such a methodology complies with antitrust laws. This court does not have jurisdiction to ascertain whether an antitrust violation may have occurred or to provide a remedy for any such a violation, nevertheless, it would ill serve the parties and the public interest if the court were to ascertain there was a breach of the Consolidated Contract and make a determination as to the "reasonableness" of an "appropriate cost-based methodology" or "methodologies" that offended antitrust principles. Therefore, the court would like the views of the parties as to the court's potential interest in inviting the Federal Trade Commission to review the parties' final expert reports and the final report of the court's expert and provide an amicus.

E. Pre-Trial Status Conference

The court also hereby sets a telephone pre-trial status and scheduling conference for Friday, February 19, 2004 at 10:30 a.m., EST, to discuss: setting a date for the parties' final expert reports; defining the scope of the court's expert's duties and establishing procedures suggested in Techsearch; other pre-trial matters; and to set a date for trial.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

RE: North Star Steel Company v. United States, Case No. 00-238

Gentlemen:

On December 10, 2003, the court issued an order indicating that because of the sui generis nature of what is a reasonable "appropriate cost-based methodology" or "methodologies," the advice of a technical expert in utility rate-making would advance an appropriate resolution in this case.

Thereafter the court and counsel for parties worked together to define the scope of the court-appointed expert's assignment, i.e., to provide the court and parties with a written report that:

1. Identifies all of the cost-based elements that the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission would allow in calculating WAPA's revenue requirement for the regulation service for which North Star was assessed the "In-Kind Energy Payment."

2. Provides a statement and references to support why each of the cost-based elements listed in response to Item 1 is reasonable.

3. Calculates, using practices employed by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, within a zone of reasonableness, for each of the following periods, the amount that North Star should have been assessed for the regulation service for which North Star was assessed the "In-Kind Energy Payment."

    a. July 1, 1998 through July 31, 1999;
    b. August 1, 1999 through September 30, 2000; and
    c. October 1, 2000 through March 17, 2003 (or the last date services were provided).

4. Calculates, for each period identified in Item 3, the difference between the amount(s) that North Star should have paid and the amount North Star did pay for regulation services.

Next, the court contacted the American Association for the Advancement of Science's Directorate for Science and Policy Programs–Court Appointed Scientific Expert ("CASE") to identify an appropriate panel of experts from which the court and parties could select an expert. CASE recommended three potential experts with appropriate credentials. Of the three, plaintiff's counsel objected to two of the proposed experts. The Government had no objections to any of the candidates.

Since Dr. Barkovich was acceptable to both parties, the court would like to proceed with her retention. The court anticipates that Dr. Barkovich's report would be provided only to counsel for the parties by October 18, 2004 and that she will be available for deposition(s) during the period October 18–November 4, 2004. Following deposition(s), she will be permitted to amend and/or supplement her report, which will be filed as direct testimony with the court and counsel for the parties on November 8, 2004. The court anticipates that Dr. Barkovich would be available for cross-examination at a date to be determined at trial during the week of November 15-19, 2004.

Pursuant to Fed. R. Evid. 706(b), "the compensation [of a court-appointed expert] shall be paid by the parties in such proportion and at such time as the court directs, and charged in like manner as other costs." See generally Joe S. Cecil and Thomas E. Willging, "Court-Appointed Experts," Reference Manual on Scientific Evidence, 558-60 (1st ed. 1994); see also id at 559 ("The court may allocate the fees among the parties as it finds appropriate both as an interim measure and in the final award."). The court has been advised by CASE that Dr. Barkovich's rate is $300 per hour and that she has estimated that the preparation of her initial report will entail approximately 100 hours. In addition, the court anticipates deposition preparation and time in deposition would be approximately 25 hours and preparation and time at the trial to be an additional 25 hours, excluding travel time. Therefore, the court estimates Dr. Barkovich's expert fees should approximate $45,000 plus reasonable travel, copying, telephone, and related expenses.

Since the parties' expert reports have been completed, the court would like formally to retain Dr. Barkovich's services on or before September 13, 2004 by the issuance of an order. At that time, the parties would be expected each to forward Dr. Barkovich a $10,000 retainer check. Dr. Barkovich will be required to maintain a detailed time log and expense record to be provided to the court and counsel for the parties for review on or before December 1, 2004, after which time the court will issue a second order regarding payment of the balance due.

Therefore, on or before September 13, 2004, the court would appreciate formal notice of your agreement to share equally Dr. Barkovich's fees and expenses.

If you require any additional information, please feel free to contact Ms. Elizabeth Clements who will be the new law clerk assigned to this case as of September 7, 2004.

Sincerely yours,

Susan G. Braden

ORDER

On December 10, 2003, the court issued an order indicating that the advice of a technical expert in utility rate-making would advance an appropriate resolution in this case. Thereafter, the American Association for the Advancement of Science's Directorate for Science and Policy Programs–Court Appointed Scientific Experts ("CASE") was contacted by the court and later provided the court with a list of three suggested experts. Of the three experts, Dr. Barbara Barkovich was acceptable to both parties.

With the attached consent of the parties, the court hereby orders the parties' retention of Dr. Barbara Barkovich for the limited purpose of serving as a factual and technical expert to the court, pursuant to Fed. R. Evid. 706. Dr. Barkovich will prepare a written report that:

1. Identifies all of the cost-based elements that the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission would allow in calculating WAPA's revenue requirement for the regulation service for which North Star was assessed the "In-Kind Energy Payment."

2. Provides a statement and references to support why each of the cost-based elements listed in response to Item 1 is reasonable.

3. Calculates, using practices employed by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, within a zone of reasonableness, for each of the following periods, the amount that North Star should have been assessed for the regulation service for which

North Star was assessed the "In-Kind Energy Payment."

a. July 1, 1998 through July 31, 1999;
b. August 1, 1999 through September 30, 2000; and
c. October 1, 2000 through March 17, 2003 (or the last date services were provided).

4. Calculates, for each period identified in Item 3, the difference between the amount(s) that North Star should have paid and the amount North Star did pay for regulation services.

In connection with this assignment, counsel for plaintiff promptly will provide Dr. Barkovich with a copy of the Second Amended Complaint; Answer to Second Amended Complaint; the Court's November 26, 2003 decision; a copy of its expert report, together with a list of other suggested discovery (documents and deposition testimony) that Dr. Barkovich may elect to review. Simultaneously, counsel for the Government will provide Dr. Barkovich with a copy of its expert report, together with a list of suggested discovery (documents and deposition testimony) that Dr. Barkovich may elect to review. Any correspondence to Dr. Barkovich by counsel for the parties will be copied to all parties and the court. Likewise, any correspondence from Dr. Barkovich to counsel for the parties will be copied to all parties and the court. All such communications should be in writing.

Dr. Barkovich's report will be provided to the parties by October 18, 2004. Dr. Barkovich will be available for deposition during the period October 18, 2004 through November 4, 2004. Following deposition(s), Dr. Barkovich will be permitted to amend and/or supplement her report, which will be filed as direct testimony with the court and counsel for the parties on November 8, 2004. The court anticipates that Dr. Barkovich would be available for cross-examination at a date to be determined at trial during the week of November 15-19, 2004.

Both parties have agreed to share equally in Dr. Barkovich's fees and expenses. The parties are ordered to immediately issue a retainer check in the amount of $10,000 to Dr. Barkovich. Dr. Barkovich will be required to maintain a detailed time log and expense record to be provided to the court and counsel for the parties for review on or before December 1, 2004. The court will issue a second order regarding payment of the balance due after receipt of Dr. Barkovich's time log and expense record.

Economic Reasoning and Judicial Review

Stephen Breyer

Thank you for the AEI-Brookings Award and the invitation to give this lecture. I am proud to receive the award for personal, as well as professional, reasons. AEI and Brookings first gave this award to Fred Kahn, my intellectual/regulatory hero, and last year to my judicial colleague, Richard Posner. Brookings launched my scholarly career by publishing my first book, Energy Regulation by the Federal Power Commission, written in 1972 with Paul MacAvoy—not a best seller. (It did recommend rationalizing the nation's electricity transmission grid!) And I learned the nuts and bolts of regulation in part by attending AEI meetings and Brookings seminars in the 1970s.

There I heard economists frequently complain that classic transport regulation meant not low prices but high prices, not consumer benefit but consumer harm. And I saw those economists—Alfred Kahn, Jim Miller, George Eads, Richard Caves, William Capron, Charles Schultz, Michael Levine, and others—begin the process of regulatory reform. They provided the intellectual support necessary to bring about airline and trucking deregulation. They helped to free the policy debate from ideological assumptions that favored widespread use of "command and control" regulatory systems, focusing that debate instead upon questions of where, whether, and how regulation might best serve the public. Their work, grounded in economics and oriented toward practical policy improvement, led to change for the better. In part because Brookings and AEI have consistently encouraged work of this sort over the years, to speak of public policy informed by economics is now commonplace.

My lecture this evening will focus upon law and economics. Such questions may not stir the soul. Edmund Burke long ago pointed out that "the age of chivalry is dead; that of sophists and calculators" (perhaps he meant lawyers ~~and economists~~ + experts) "is upon us; and the glory of Europe is extinguished forever." But in this less glorious age, it is nonetheless important to the welfare of the public that law reflect a proper blend of economic and administrative considerations.

I shall not discuss the now-fashionable, highly theoretical study of whether or how economics has had virtually global influence upon the law. Rather, I shall consider the older, unfashionable practical problem of bringing economic reasoning to bear in legal fields that undoubtedly call for it, for example, antitrust law, intellectual property law, and economic regulation. In these areas of law, I side with those who favor greater judicial use of economic reasoning. Economics will not necessarily determine the outcome of such cases, but if courts and agencies get the economics right, at the least they may more intelligently consider the role of non-economic ingredients of sound public policy.

I recognize that I have not always been successful in persuading my judicial colleagues to this point of view. And that sad circumstance brings me to the question I shall address: Are there general reasons, related to law and to legal institutions, that have tended to inhibit the use of economics as an influence upon the law—at least in the Supreme Court? I think there are, and I shall discuss cases that illustrate some of them—not in order to vindicate my own point of view in those cases, but because a discussion of those individual instances may help us better understand the role of economic reasoning in shaping the law. I shall first list the relevant factors, and I shall then discuss particular cases that illustrate three of them.

I

There are seven general reasons why it may be difficult to persuade other Justices in economically oriented cases. Four have to do with the unique mechanics of the Supreme Court—the way in which we carry out our work. Because they only tangentially concern economic reasoning, my discussion of these four reasons will be brief. They create an institutional backdrop against which I shall consider three other more policy-oriented, less idiosyncratic factors.

First, unlike many European high courts, we do not divide decision-making authority among ourselves. We do not ask one Justice to specialize in respect to a particular case or to prepare a report on a case for use by the others. We do not try to develop different areas of expertise over time. We are generalists. We recognize that some of our members may have developed greater knowledge of a particular field, but we also recognize that such knowledge can bring with it a perspective that, as generalists, we might find skewed. Thus, any deference we may show to our other colleagues' expert knowledge is limited. We each participate fully in each judicial decision. We believe we are appointed to exercise our own judgment. And each of us takes full responsibility for his or her decision in each case. All this means that one Justice's expertise in a particular field, while not totally irrelevant, will rarely prove determinative.

Second, time is limited. At the Supreme Court, we consider about 7,500 petitions for review each year. We grant about eighty, each of which raises a legal question that different lower courts have answered differently. The difficulty of the case, the size of the petition docket, and the need to decide create pressure to move on. And that pressure militates against Justices, once having reached a decision, changing their minds. We are not obstinate, but we recognize that, were we to change our minds too often, the work of the Supreme Court would not get done.

Until a dissenting view in a highly technical case—involving, say, complex economic analysis—is reduced to a draft in writing, however, its persuasive power may be limited. It takes time to produce that writing. By the time the dissent circulates, a majority may have reached a contrary conclusion. And, because of the time pressures I mentioned, that consensus can prove resistant to change.

Third, we try to limit our separate writings—dissents or concurrences—to matters we consider important in principle. We know that a single opinion provides clearer instruction to bench and bar and, normally, helps avoid confusing the law. We know that no opinion is perfect and that we must search for agreement, even where we do not fully agree. Consequently, we may join an opinion containing secondary statements with which we do not fully agree. But just when is a matter important enough to provoke written disagreement? I suspect that a Justice who is expert in a technical area is more likely than a non-expert to find a secondary statement important enough to provoke a written disagreement. And that fact may account for some of my written disagreement in technical, economically-oriented cases.

Fourth, cases in which law involves economics are often ones in which the law instructs courts to defer to other governmental decision-makers. They may, for example, arise where agencies have created economically-based public policy. And courts must decide not whether that policy is wise, but whether it is so wrong as to be "arbitrary," "capricious," or an "abuse of discretion." It is particularly difficult to show that an agency decision, or a congressional decision, is that wrong. And courts are consequently tempted not to engage in economic reasoning themselves or examine the agency's economic reasoning that closely, but simply to approve an agency's efforts to take account of economics as reasonable ones.

These reasons, as I said, create an institutional backdrop for three others that I wish to discuss in greater detail. These three are speculative, but they help explain more directly why economic reasoning has not played a greater role in the Court's decision-making. The first has to do with the law's need for administrable rules and for related certainty. The second concerns the use of experts in appellate courts. The third involves the law's distrust of novelty—a fact that often requires new approaches slowly to win acceptance in other institutions before a court will introduce them into the law. Three cases, in which I filed separate opinions, will help explain why I find, and why I believe you may find, these last-mentioned reasons worth thinking about.

II

The first case, Whitman v. American Trucking Associations,[1] involved the Clean Air Act. The relevant statutory language instructed the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to set ambient air standards "the attainment and maintenance of which . . . are requisite to protect the public health" with "an adequate margin of safety."[2] The Court held that this language does not permit the EPA to consider economic costs. First, the language says nothing about costs. Second, in other, similar parts of the statute the language does mention economic costs. Third, absence of the language here, along with its presence there, means that here Congress intended to leave economic costs out. Fourth, the Court reached a similar conclusion in other similar cases, where it said that Congress did not want the EPA to consider economic costs unless there is a "clear . . . textual commitment" to such consideration. Fifth, there is no such "clear commitment" here.

I wrote separately to set forth different reasons for reaching a similar conclusion.[3] From a purely linguistic perspective, I thought the EPA might find that a standard that imposes huge costs but secures little, if any, added safety is not a standard that is "requisite to the public health" with "an adequate margin of safety." But I nonetheless thought that the statute's legislative history made clear that Congress intended to force industry to create new, cheaper, more effective pollution control technologies. Congress also thought that any agency effort to weigh costs along with benefits would ordinarily prove too time-consuming. Thus, I agreed with the majority that the statute ordinarily forbids taking account of economic costs. Nothing in this particular case justified departing from that presumption.

The point of my writing, however, was to say that the statute did not necessarily forbid all consideration of costs in less usual cases. Its language, read in light of the history, is sufficiently flexible to permit the EPA to take account of costs, for example, where necessary to avoid counterproductive results. A world filled with standards "requisite to the public health" is not a world without risk. The safest possible football pads and helmets do not prevent every injury; and a degree of risk that seems unreasonably dangerous in the context of safe drinking water may nonetheless fall well within any football-injury "margin of safety." Hence, the EPA must have authority to decide, within limits, what counts as "adequately safe," or what counts as "requisite to the public health." It must have authority to decide related matters, such as whether an antipollution standard poses greater health risks than it eliminates: For example, in setting ozone standards, the EPA can account for countervailing health benefits such as a reduction in the number of skin cancers. And, if so, the EPA must have similar authority to determine whether, because of unusually high costs and unusually small benefits, a proposed standard will prove counterproductive—at least in unusual cases. I thought that, in respect to consideration of costs, the statute does not mean "never." And probably because of my earlier work in the field of regulation, I thought it important to say so.

Now you can see the real difference of opinion in this case. If the majority means "never," its interpretation risks counterproductive results—results that Congress could not have intended. But my own view, "sometimes," immediately invites the question, "Well, just when?" The argument has less to do with the value of considering economic costs in pollution cases than it has to do with the value of bright-line rules in the law.

Economic reasoning is often difficult to reconcile with bright-line rules. Economics often concerns gradations, with consequences that flow from a little more or a little less. But the law, at least in a final appeals court, often seeks to create clear distinctions of kind. Antitrust law reveals this kind of tension. A per se rule against price-fixing, for example, does not embody a judgment that price-fixing could never prove economically justified. Rather, the rule reflects a judgment that economic justifications for price-fixing are so few, arise so infrequently, and are so difficult to prove, while the enforcement advantages of a clear rule are so great, that a more complex, more economically sophisticated, legal rule is not worth the effort. Indeed, the difficulty the courts may have in applying a more sophisticated rule may create mistakes that outweigh the benefits of that rule.

Could a per se Clean Air Act rule against consideration of costs prove similarly justified? I thought not. Such a rule would sometimes bring about seriously counterproductive results. I believe that the statute's language and purposes permit a more open-ended interpretation. In these circumstances, the use of such words as "ordinarily" and "unusual" would have to provide sufficient administrative guidance.

I am less interested in the merits of the particular conclusion, however, than I am in pointing out how the difference between my view and that of the majority in this case raises larger legal issues: How often is a bright line justified? When will more open, less definite interpretations of statute prove workable? To what extent will a statute's language, including its statutory context, provide a definitive answer to a difficult interpretive question? These are the questions that judges must answer in a case like this one.

In trying to answer them, I try to assess what a reasonable legislator would want in light of the statute's basic purposes. The degree of "brightness," "absoluteness," or scope of a legal rule set forth in an opinion should itself reflect a judicial weighing of relevant considerations—of legal costs and benefits, if you like. And Congress, I believe, would rarely intend a bright-line legal interpretation that would bring about seriously counterproductive results.

Making such judgments is easier said than done. In general, I tend to disfavor absolute legal lines. Life is normally too complex for absolute rules. Moreover, a more open, less definite approach to interpretation is likely to prove more compatible with the law's incorporation of knowledge drawn from other disciplines, particularly disciplines that themselves reason by way of "a little more, a little less," such as economics.

III

The second case, Verizon Communications v. FCC,[4] involved rate-setting. The Telecommunications Act of 1996, seeking to bring about competition in local telephone service, requires incumbent local firms (typically regulated monopolies) to make "elements" of their local systems available on request to new entrants at "rates . . . based on . . . cost."[5] The act gives the Federal Communications Commission the power to make rules governing those rates. And the FCC has written rules that require especially low rates—rates that approximate what it would cost a hypothetical, perfectly efficient firm to supply that element in the future, assuming that the hypothetical firm were to build a new, perfectly efficient communications network from scratch. (Fred Kahn refers to this set of rules as "Total Element Long-Run Incremental Cost—Blank Slate," or "TELRIC-BS," for short.) If, for example, a local telephone monopolist owns twisted copper wires running from a switching center into each home, and if those wires cost, say, $3 million per year to keep up, a new entrant can share that element, i.e., the wires, by paying prices that reflect not the $3 million needed to keep up the wires, but, rather, the costs of current best-technology methods of accessing the home, say, wireless costs of just thirty cents.

The legal question before our Court was whether the FCC's system was rationally related to the statute's purpose, namely encouraging new competition. By a vote of seven to one, the Court concluded that the system was rational, hence lawful. I confess that I was the one. I dissented because I believe that the pricing rules conflict with the statute's pro-competitive objective.

The firms that challenged the FCC's systems argued approximately as follows: First, the act's specific objective is to substitute competition for regulation in local telephone markets where that transformation is economically feasible.

Second, to help achieve this objective, the act allows new entrants access to certain elements of the incumbent's system—in particular those elements that would be too expensive, and wastefully inefficient, for the new entrant to duplicate. Just as access to a railroad bridge across a river could spare a new railroad the need wastefully to duplicate the bridge, so access to a pair of twisted copper wires running from street to home could spare a new firm the need wastefully to duplicate those wires. The important point is that the sharing of facilities by two or more firms is not itself competition; but sometimes sharing of bottleneck facilities will help bring about competition in the unshared, remaining parts of the service. It is this latter form of competition that the act seeks to promote.

Third, pricing rules consequently must seek to encourage the sharing of facilities when sharing will open a bottleneck, but not otherwise. That is, sharing should only be encouraged when it is far less expensive, economically speaking, to share than it is to build new, duplicative facilities elsewhere. Otherwise, efficient investment and innovation would be deterred.

Fourth, pricing rules such as the FCC's that are based upon hypothetical, most-efficient-firm costs, rather than rules that are based upon costs an incumbent firm will actually incur, will not encourage the right kind of sharing nor bring about the right kind of competition. Under the FCC rules actual costs will not affect prices. Hence, the rules would encourage new firms to lease the incumbent's old, less efficient facilities rather than themselves build new, more efficient facilities, even if new investment is economically far more efficient.

In my example, the copper wires should not be shared because it is far more efficient to build new, thirty-cent wireless connections than to pay the $3 million needed to keep up the existing copper wires. Yet the FCC rules would lead new firms to lease the existing wires, not build new wireless systems, for they would pay no more for the old leases than for the new construction. Indeed, the FCC rules would encourage new firms to lease an incumbent's entire system, producing universal sharing instead of universal competition. By insisting that a new entrant receive the immediate advantage of an incumbent's cost-saving innovations, they would discourage innovation and investment. And for reasons I will not go into here, I believe I can show that—if the numbers are more realistic—an incumbent would lack the economic incentives necessary to encourage its investment in innovation in the first place. In essence, by creating a "sharing" price for each element in an existing system that equals or is lower than the price associated with the creation of any new independent facility, the rules tend toward a system in which regulatory price setting would supplant, not promote, competition.

In my own view, these arguments are basically correct.[6] The statute, I believe, foresees a regulatory approach something like that used in Europe. A regulator, seeking competition in voice, data, text, picture, entertainment, or other new communications service, has authority to insist that an incumbent make available to a new entrant access to existing bottleneck facilities, say the house-to-switching-center copper wires owned by the incumbent. The regulator will encourage negotiation among the parties, with an eye toward speedy resolution of any related pricing dispute. But, if necessary, the regulator will itself set prices low enough to prevent the incumbent from blocking entry, but high enough to encourage the new firm to consider other entry methods where feasible—prices the regulator might determine through "yardstick" comparisons with other systems. I concluded that the FCC rules lack a rational connection with the statute's pro-competitive purposes.

Now let me return to my basic question. What is it about the law that makes this position so difficult to accept? The last few minutes may make the answer to this question obvious. The subject matter is just too technical, requiring too much expertise for lay judges to feel confident in overturning the contrary decision reached by an expert administrative body.

Remember that the legal standard governing the case delegates considerable decision-making authority to the FCC, the agency whose rules are under review. Those challenging the rules must show not that they are unwise, but that they are close to irrational. Remember, too, that in our Court, the difficult, complex, technical subject matter means that oral discussion of the subject will prove difficult; a dissent will take considerable time to write; and, by the time it is written, changing minds may prove particularly difficult. Now ask yourself how you could expect anyone who has not, through chance, had considerable experience with communications regulation (or related forms of economic regulation) to understand what I have been talking about these last few minutes? How could anyone expect a non-technical panel of judges to do anything but accept the agency's decision as rational where the subject matter is so complex? How could a judge lacking a technical background (even if filled with doubt) do anything but hesitate to affix the label "irrational" and overturn an expert agency's judgment in such a case—particularly when the question is so close that a judge with that experience must also hesitate to do so?

Now you see the problem. Judges have long recognized the difficulty of reviewing the substance of highly technical agency decision-making. Verizon, in my view, illustrates the difficulty of maintaining some form of judicial review in highly technical subject matter areas—such as telecommunications and information technology—that implicate sophisticated economic reasoning.

Should we then abandon judicial review in highly technical cases or apply it in a perfunctory matter? I do not think so. The law rightly forbids agencies, in the name of technical expertise, to wrest themselves free of control by others; our own legal traditions obligate judges to see that agency decisions fall within the bounds of reason; and agency decisions in highly technical areas are important, and of ever-increasing importance, as technology becomes an ever-more important part of the life of the average citizen.

Nor do I believe we can solve the problem by turning to judges who are specialists. Review by generalist judges brings a certain lay common sense to technical decisions and a necessary degree of coherence to the law.

So, what can be done? Perhaps courts could make better use of experts in such cases. Our Court received expert views in Verizon primarily in the form of arguments contained in legal briefs written by the parties' lawyers. Those briefs were well-written, beautifully translating technical matters into language that judges can understand. Yet judges know that the authors of those briefs are interested individuals actively seeking to persuade them. They were not written by disinterested experts seeking first and foremost to enlighten the Court.

Suppose it were easier for courts to retain their own experts in such matters, perhaps experts suggested by the parties, who would retain the right to supplement the views of any such experts with expert views of their own. Might such a system increase the courts' ability to determine, for example, the outer bounds of what is reasonable in technical subject matter areas? I do not say that the Supreme Court should retain its own experts, even in highly complex technical cases. But the lower courts, not just trial courts but also appellate courts, might do so on occasion in a range of cases involving scientific and other technical subject matter.

Britain has recently begun to move in this direction, at least in respect to trials.[7] Under the revised British Civil Procedure Rules, a trial court can appoint a single expert when parties wish to submit expert evidence on the same issue.[8] Evaluative reports from the Lord Chancellor's Department have praised the increased use of single joint experts as creating a less adversarial culture and reducing both time and cost.[9] Britain based its experiments on practices that are fairly common in civil-law countries, where a judge will select an expert from lists provided by scientific or technical institutions or maintained by the courts themselves. In France, for example, the courts maintain a "regional" and a "national" list of experts who meet certain criteria. The court appoints the expert (often, though not exclusively, from these lists) and sets the issues to be investigated. Upon completion of the assignment, the expert is required to file a written report with the court.[10]

I read with interest a recent French case, La Ligue Contre Le Racisme Et L'Antisemitisme v. Yahoo!, Inc.,[11] in which a French court prohibited Yahoo.com from providing French internet users access to a service selling Nazi memorabilia, as well as to other pro-Nazi websites. A key question concerned the practical ability of Yahoo to segregate search requests from users in France from those in other countries. In response, the judge commissioned a report from a panel of experts, while permitting Yahoo to criticize or object to portions of that report. The result was speed and agreement—not about the result, but about many of the technical facts that underlay it.

I cannot say whether the French system, the British system, or some other system, used at the trial court level or adapted for use at the appellate court level, would solve our American problems. But Verizon may offer an example of such a problem—a problem of providing courts with a better understanding of technical matters. Since I believe that technical subject matters—biology, communications, computers—will become ever more relevant to the law, I think this kind of problem is of growing importance. And foreign experience suggests that better judicial use of technical expertise may prove possible. My lonely position in Verizon may stand for this kind of need.

IV

The third case, Eldred v. Ashcroft, concerns a statute that extends the copyright term by twenty years for both future and existing copyrights.[12] For some works it extends the term from fifty years to seventy years after the author's death; for others, from seventy-five years to ninety-five years. The question was whether the Constitution's copyright clause granted Congress the power to enact this extension. That clause says that Congress shall have the power to "promote the progress of science," i.e., learning and knowledge, "by securing for limited times to authors . . . the exclusive right to their respective writings."[13] The Court held that this language covers the extension.

I dissented because I thought that the statute extending the term for twenty years fell outside the scope of the clause.[14] It seemed to me that the extension amounted to an unjustified effort to create not a limited, but a virtually perpetual, copyright term. As I understand the clause, it requires copyright statutes to serve certain public, not private, ends, namely to "promote the progress" of knowledge and learning by providing incentives for authors to create works and by removing the related restrictions on a work's dissemination after a "limited" time.

It is easy to see how the twenty-year extension would serve private ends. It would transfer billions of dollars of income from consumers of existing works, e.g., readers or moviegoers, to the heirs of the long-dead producers of those works (or connected corporations). But from the public's standpoint, it would bring about considerable harm: it would unnecessarily block dissemination of works that, with a shorter term, would sooner fall into the public domain. The extension would, for example, require those who wish to use century-old, often commercially valueless, works to find, and to obtain permission from, difficult-to-locate current holders of those copyrights.

Consider the teachers who wish their students to see albums of Depression-era photographs, to read the recorded words of those who actually lived under slavery, or to contrast, say, Gary Cooper's heroic portrayal of Sergeant York with filmed reality from the battlefield of Verdun. Consider the historian, writer, artist, database operator, film preservationist, researchers of all kinds, who wish to make the past accessible for their own use or for that of others. Requiring them to obtain a copyright holder's permission for an additional twenty years—starting seventy-five years after the work was created—would often fatally impede their efforts.

I could find no justification for the extension that might offset this harm. No one could reasonably conclude that copyright's traditional justification—providing an incentive to create—could apply to this extension. Past works, say, Mickey Mouse films, by definition need no incentive, for they already exist. And any added incentive to create works in the future is insignificant.

To understand why that is so requires reference to undisputed data that interested groups submitted to the Court; and it requires reference to the economic analysis that other groups provided (including Nobel Prize–winning economists). They made clear that no potential author could reasonably believe he or she has more than a tiny chance of writing a classic that will survive long enough for a copyright extension (of twenty years, beginning seventy-five years in the future) to matter. Indeed, fewer than 2 percent of all copyrighted works retain any commercial value after seventy-five years. And any remaining monetary incentive is diminished radically by the fact that the relevant royalties will not arrive until seventy-five years or more into the future, when not the author, but distant heirs or shareholders in a successor corporation, will receive them. A 1 percent likelihood of earning $100 annually for twenty years, starting seventy-five years into the future, is worth less than seven cents today. What potential Shakespeare, Wharton, or Hemingway would be moved by such a sum? Regardless, that added present value does not significantly differ from the present value added by a perpetual copyright. Indeed, the twenty-year extension results in a copyright term that produces more than 98 percent of the value of perpetual protection.

Neither could I find other copyright-related justifications for the extension. It did not produce significant international uniformity. It had no other significant copyright-related international commercial effect. It did benefit several publishers, shareholders, and various entertainment companies, including Walt Disney and AOL Time Warner (the current holder of the copyright on the "Happy Birthday to You" melody, first published in 1893 and copyrighted after litigation in 1935). But this kind of private commercial benefit, in my view, falls outside the copyright clause. My conclusion was that the copyright extension was unconstitutional.

For present purposes, I want to focus, not upon the substance of my copyright conclusion, but upon the fact that seven of my colleagues disagreed with it and with the empirical and logical arguments that supported it. Why were my arguments so unconvincing?

Of course the subject matter was technical, specialized, and complex, it took time to write the dissent, and the law obliges the courts to defer heavily to the judgment of Congress in this area. But I believe that a different factor is also at work, and that factor is more interesting. It consists of the novelty of the approach I accepted, an approach that depends heavily upon an economic-type weighing of costs and benefits. The approach is not completely novel. It finds support in the literature and in prior case law. But, in its heavy reliance upon economic and commercial factors, it departs in form, if not in substance, from most previous copyright opinions.

The law is a conservative institution. Courts must protect those who have relied upon prior law and prior approaches. Thus, courts ordinarily will rightly hesitate to adopt a new approach to an important body of law—at least until the relevant publics, acting through other institutions, themselves seem to have found the new approach acceptable. Here those publics and other institutions include Congress, the copyright bar, publishers, authors, schools, libraries, research institutions, and many others beside. A critical mass within those publics has not embraced the approach that my dissenting opinion reflects—at least not yet.

I do not mean to say that courts, in applying or developing copyright law or any other branch of law, directly follow public opinion. But I do mean to point out that the shaping of law in America is a highly democratic process. New law is less often decreed from on-high by a court or a legislature than it "bubbles up" from below. Often the lawmaking process resembles a kind of conversation among many interested groups, including experts, specialists, commercial enterprises, labor unions, various interest groups, and ordinary citizens. That conversation takes place in journals, at seminars, in newspapers, at hearings, and in court proceedings. The decision of one institution is taken as a datum by another. It may be embodied in administrative rules, statutes, even constitutional interpretations, but none of these is permanent; all are subject to change or gradual evolution.

Michael Oakeshott, in describing liberal education, better explained what I have in mind. "The pursuit of learning," he said, > is not a race in which the competitors jockey for the best place, it is not even an argument or a symposium; it is a conversation. . . . [E]ach study appear[s] as a voice whose tone is neither tyrannous nor plangent, but humble and conversable. . . . Its integration is not superimposed but springs from the quality of the voices which speak, and its value lies in the relics it leaves behind in the mind of those who participate.[15]

Similarly, the development of legal methods and analysis is a collaborative, evolving process. The law is continuously renewed. To steal a philosophical boating metaphor, we renew it plank by plank while it floats upon the sea.

So viewed, a dissent continues to play a role in an ongoing policy debate. Even though it is not the law, others may find its arguments or approaches persuasive; they may adapt or adopt them for use in different forums; and if there is sufficiently widespread acceptance, even judicial approaches may change. So seen, a dissent will be judged in terms of its persuasive force, which, despite the majority to the contrary, is not irretrievably lost. With this larger process in mind, I can hope that my lonely dissents invoking economic reasoning will not be so lonely in the future.

I have used three dissenting opinions to illustrate three features of the law, features relevant to its use of economic policy. The first concerns the law's need to interpret statutes with what I might call an open-textured approach—an approach that finds greater value in the consideration of underlying human purposes than in the proliferation of strict legal categories. Bright-line rules, while sometimes useful, are not always a preferred alternative, particularly when such a rule brings with it results that, in terms of a statute's basic purpose, prove counterproductive.

The second concerns the need to introduce economic reasoning in technical areas into the courts through the use of experts, rather than by sending judges to economic seminars, along with the need for those experts to understand the role that administrative considerations, such as the need for rules, play in the law.

The third concerns the need, given the law's reluctance to rely upon novel approaches, for institutions outside the judiciary to debate and to adopt economic methods for the courts to model.

These considerations suggest that those interested in helping the law to reflect sound economic policy must understand the need for legal decisions and legal rules that are administrable. But they cannot take administrability itself as if it were an immutable factor automatically explaining whatever decision a court makes. The shape of a legal rule, the extent to which it ought to be "bright-line," is itself open to thought and analysis. And those who are intellectually comfortable with concepts of equilibrium, who see virtues in considering a little more, a little less, might well have something to contribute to that debate. Brookings/AEI will, I hope, remain involved in legal decision-making and will not take legal decisions as a given, immune from analysis.

My point is that participation in the judicial process by those with basic economic or regulatory policymaking expertise can help. The more aware you are and the more you are willing to undertake informed criticism of judicial decision-making, the better. Whether serving as experts in individual cases, or more generally as informed court-watchers and critics, you have the ability to help encourage and make more accessible to lawyers and judges the tools of analysis.

That kind of participation is consistent with my own view of the legal process—that it is too important to be left simply to the legal specialists, to the lawyers, or even to the judges.

United States Court of Federal Claims.
HONEYWELL INTERNATIONAL, INC., and Honeywell Intellectual Properties, Inc., Plaintiffs,
v.
The UNITED STATES, Defendant,
andLockheed Martin Corp., Defendant-Intervenor.
No. 02-1909C.

June 14, 2005.

Background: Holder of patent on display system for night vision goggles and exclusive licensee of the patent brought suit against the United States, alleging violation of the Invention Secrecy Act, a taking of the patent and related patent application in violation of the Fifth Amendment, and unlicensed use of the patent by the government in violation of statute. Contractor which manufactured military aircraft which allegedly infringed patent intervened.

Holdings: The Court of Federal Claims , Braden, J., held that:

(1) preamble language in claims would be construed to mean a system comprised of optical filters that can be used in combination with an aid, with light amplifying, passive, and night vision qualities, and a display of colors that includes a source of light perceptible by the night vision aid;

(2) term "local color display" would be construed to mean a device that may be used together or in combination with optical filters and shows or exhibits at least one color perceptible to an observer or observers utilizing a night vision aid; and

(3) term "notch filter" would be construed to mean an optical filter that has the capacity both to pass and substantially block light and may be a single-notch filter or a multi-notch filter.

So ordered.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER CONSTRUING CERTAIN CLAIMS OF UNITED STATES PATENT NO. 6,467,914

BRADEN, Judge.
In the decade following the United States Supreme Court's unanimous affirmance of the landmark en banc decision in Markman v. Westview Instruments, Inc., 52 F.3d 967, 978-79 (Fed.Cir.1995) ("Markman I"), aff'd, 517 U.S. 370, 116 S.Ct. 1384, 134 L.Ed.2d 577 (1996) ("Markman II "), the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has devoted a great deal of effort to provide federal trial courts with a workable analytical framework to construe the meaning of a patent's claims that is faithful to 35 U.S.C. § 112 and affords the court an opportunity to consider relevant, but reliable, evidence, in a wide range of diverse and increasingly complex applications of mechanical, electrical, chemical, computer, pharmaceutical, bio, and nano technology.

From the court's reading of controlling appellate precedent, intrinsic evidence has been endorsed as most relevant and reliable to establish the metes and bounds of the property right conveyed by the privilege of the patent grant. Extrinsic evidence has been determined to be useful to identify the 403 academic and industry credentials of "one skilled in the art," akin to the "reasonable man" in the tradition of tort law. If the court must resort to extrinsic evidence to avoid determining that a claim is indefinite, only the most probative and reliable of such evidence should be considered-and, with caution.

In this case, the court determined that it was unnecessary to consider extrinsic evidence to construe the language of the patent claims at issue, in most instances. See Renishaw PLC v. Marposs Societa' per Azioni, 158 F.3d 1243, 1250 (Fed.Cir.1998) (internal citations omitted) ("The construction that stays true to the claim language and most naturally aligns with the patent's description of the invention will be, in the end, the correct construction."). In only one claim, where extrinsic evidence was considered, the court was able to construe the disputed term by referring to prior art and was not dependent on technical treatises, technical dictionaries, nor the parties' experts.

I. THE RELEVANT TECHNOLOGY.

In 1973, a second-generation of Night Vision Goggles ("NVG") was developed by the United States Army to provide helicopter pilots with a brighter view at night of underlying terrain to allow them to fly at low levels. See January 24, 2005 Technology/Industry Primer ("Jt.Primer") at 3; FN1 see also November 22, 2004 Direct Testimony and Expert Report of Dr. Harry Lee Task ("PMX35") ¶ 8 at 4. NVGs, however, were very sensitive to cockpit lighting, warning lights, displays, and particularly to light of longer wavelengths in the visible spectrum and infrared radiation. See Jt. Primer at 6-8; see also PMX 35 ¶ 9 at 4. In particular, 407 NVGs' sensitivity to red light created numerous problems that were known prior to the October 10, 1985 filing of the patent at issue in this case, including the fact that nearby light sources in a cockpit could overwhelm the sensor elements and interrupt NVG functioning or amplify reflections from the cockpit lights, causing the pilot to see confusing images. Id.

FN1. Although counsel for all parties collaborated in preparing the January 24, 2005 Technology/Industry Primer, the parties agree that it is not evidence nor a stipulation as to fact or law. See Jt. Primer at 2. The court has obtained permission to reproduce the graphics that are copyrighted by HowStuffWorks.com.

Many techniques were developed by the military and private companies to try to solve the incompatibility between the NVG and aircraft lighting and cockpit displays. See PMX 35 ¶¶ 8-12 at 4-6. In the 1980's, the United States Army began to utilize an Aviation Night Vision Imaging System ("ANVIS") goggles with a third-generation image intensifying tube that was much more sensitive to light, i.e., ranging from approximately 450 nanometers ("nm") to 930 nm, instead of 400 nm to 700 nm. See Jt. Primer at 3; see also PMX 35 ¶¶ 9-13 at 4-7. As a result, the visible range below 580 nm could be used for cockpit lighting and display since light in that range, in large part, was invisible to NVGs and allowed the pilot to see outside the aircraft. See PMX 35 ¶ 13 at 6-7.

A. Night Vision Aids.

1. The Electromagnetic Spectrum.

The electromagnetic spectrum ("spectrum")

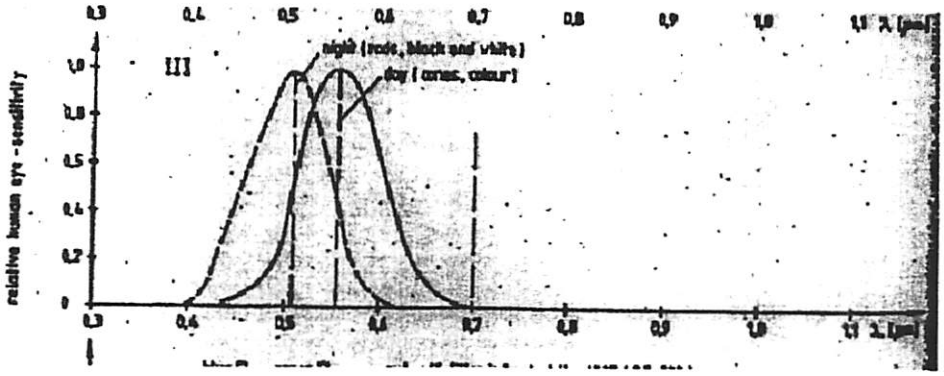
describes the range of electromagnetic waves that transports energy, both in electric and magnetic fields. See Jt. Primer at 3. Energy from cosmic rays have the shortest wavelengths; electrical oscillations have the longest wavelengths. Id. " Visible spectrum" or light is the portion of the spectrum located between the ultraviolet light region and the infrared region, as depicted below:

Id. at 4.



Light is characterized by wavelength and frequency. Id. Wavelength, referred to by the symbol lambda, , is the distance between successive peaks of an electromagnetic wave. Id. Frequency referred to by the symbol nu, , is the number of complete cycles of electromagnetic radiation completed each second. Id. Wavelength and frequency are inversely related, i.e., light with a higher frequency has a shorter wavelength; light with a shorter frequency has a longer wavelength. Id. at 4-5. Wavelength times frequency equals the speed of light. Id. at 5. Light and infrared radiation customarily are described in terms of wavelength. Id.

408 2. Night Vision Goggles.

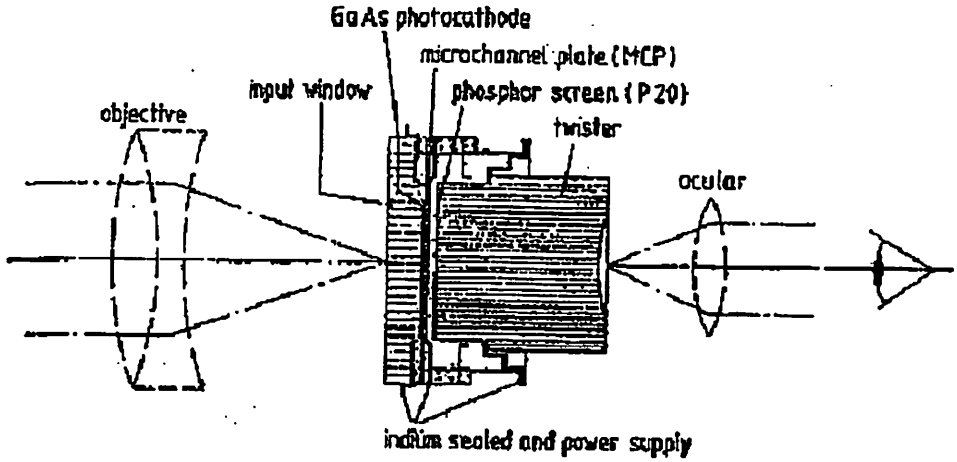
NVGs are sensitive to visible light and infrared radiation regions of the electromagnetic spectrum. Id. at 5. An unaided human eye only can see light within the visible region of the electromagnetic spectrum, which has a narrow range, as shown above. Id. The human eye adapts to different lighting environments and has two distinct sensitivity curves, as illustrated below:

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

DAY AND NIGHT SENSITIVITY OF THE HUMAN EYE



Id. at 6.

The peak sensitivity of the human eye drifts toward shorter wavelengths of light in extreme darkness, known as scotopic vision, which is rarely used in human activities. Id. at 6. Colors are seen by day vision, known as photopic vision. Id. Radiant energy, originating from the sun during the day and the stars or moon at night, is the electromagnetic energy that the human eye detects. Id. At night, there is less visible light present than during the day, so the human eye has extreme difficulty detecting the radiant energy that remains. Id.

Night vision aids enable the user, generally a pilot, to see objects at night by amplifying the very low levels of radiant energy from the visible and infrared spectrum. Id. Some night vision aids are capable of amplifying the radiant energy reflected from an object at night in overcast conditions. Id.

NVGs utilize a "two-step energy conversion process " to enable the user to observe very low levels of light and infrared radiation and convert the latter into visible light: first, by converting photons into electrons and amplifying the electrons; and second, by converting the amplified electrons back into photons, in visible light for the user. Id. at 7-8. A schematic of a typical night vision aid is reproduced below:

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

*409 Id. at 7.

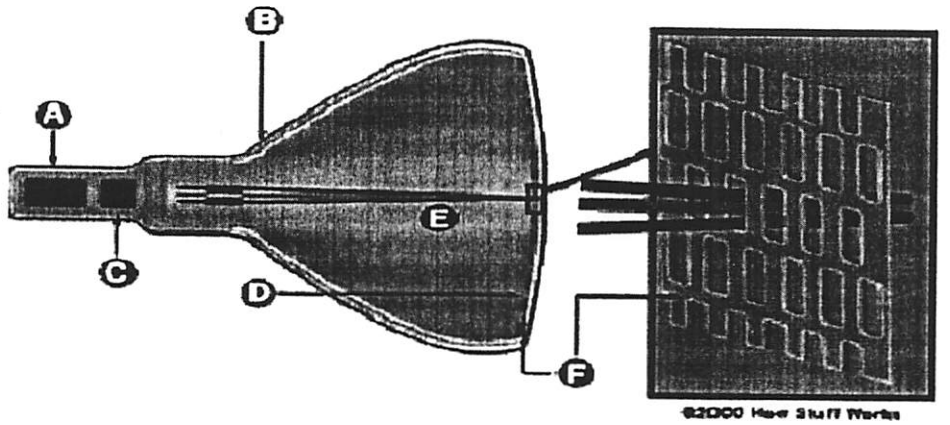
Low-level radiation first enters the NVG at an objective lens that focuses low levels of light and infrared radiation onto an input window of an intensifier tube. Id. The intensifier tube consists of a photocathode and a microchannel plate ("MCP") that amplifies light and infrared radiation. Id. The photocathode converts photons into electrons. Id. Electrons are then emitted from the cathode and received at the input surface of the MCP, generally constructed of a honeycomb-like plate of many hollow tubes fused together. Id. Each electron passing through the tube frees other electrons, creating tens of thousands of electrons that exit the tube for each one that entered the tube. See Jt. Primer at 7-8.

Exiting electrons strike a phosphor screen that acts as the reverse of the photocathode and converts the electrons back into photons of visible light at a higher intensity than the input photons. Id. at 8. If an observer uses an ocular lens, the light emitted appears as a green image. Id. This energy is increased by a factor of 10,000 to 20,000 at maximum sensitivity and is known as "gain" or " image intensification" of the NVGs. Id. Although NVGs amplify low level light and infrared radiation by a factor of 10,000 to 20,000, they also amplify normal level and bright lights, such as streetlights or cockpit lights, by the same factor, which can damage the NVGs. Id. To prevent this problem, ANVIS goggles were developed that have a feature known as "automatic gain control" to govern image intensification within the MCP. Id. This reduction of intensification, however, affects the ANVIS goggles' entire field, thereby preventing the user from seeing dimly illuminated objects when normal level and bright lights are introduced. ANVIS goggles also are sensitive to light from about 540 nm to 910 nm. See Jt. Primer at 8. To address this issue, ANVIS goggles utilize a "minus blue" filter that reduces the sensitivity of the goggles to the longer wavelengths. Id.

B. Cockpit Displays.

Aircraft use a variety of displays in the cockpit, such as cathode ray tubes ("CRTs") and liquid crystal displays ("LCDs"). Id. at 9. Both, however, can generate or reflect light that interferes with the operation of the NVG. Id. at 9-11.

1. Cathode Ray Tubes.



CRTs are "picture tube for television" technology used in a broad range of commercial and military applications, including aircraft displays. Id. at 9.

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

66 Fed.Cl. 400

CRTs operate by receiving an input that is processed by generating electron beams that strike a screen coated with one or more layers of phosphor, wherein each layer can generate one or more colors in a color display. Id. When an electron beam strikes a particular phosphor, a phosphor dot on the screen is excited to emit light of a certain color. Id. at 10. Full color CRTs typically have three phosphors that correspond to the three most common primary colors of the display: red, green and blue. Id. There are different sets of primary colors, each of which can produce many more colors in the visible spectrum. Id. Prior to the advent of flat screen technologies, every computer monitor and television used a CRT, similar to that shown below:

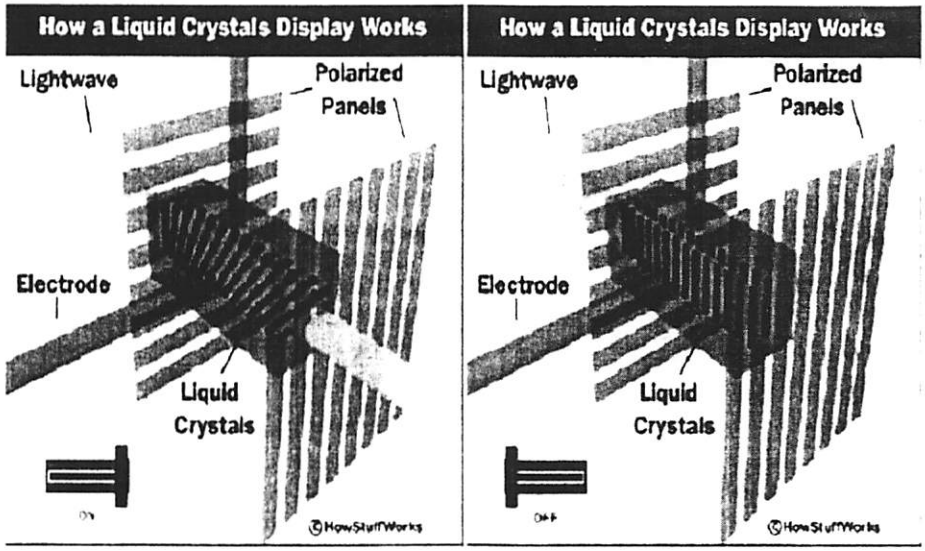
2. Liquid Crystal Displays.



LCDs are used in many commercial applications, including aircraft cockpit displays. Id. In transmissive LCDs, light is generated at the back of the display using a fluorescent tube, known as an LCD backlight. Id. This tube has a phosphor coating on the inside that emits light when excited by mercury vapor, which produces color, as determined by the chemical characteristics of the phosphors. Id. Color is then passed through an array of liquid crystal picture elements or pixels. Id. Each liquid crystal pixel also acts as a "shutter" that either passes or blocks the light to varying degrees. Id. at 10-11. A LCD is comprised of two polarizing filters and a cavity containing a liquid crystal compound. Id. at 10. When electricity is not applied to a pixel, the backlight is polarized by the first polarizer and is placed to permit light to pass through the second polarizer. Id. In a color LCD, each pixel has three subpixels that correspond to the three primary colors of the display. Id. at 11. When electricity is applied, the two polarizers act together to block the backlight, as shown below:

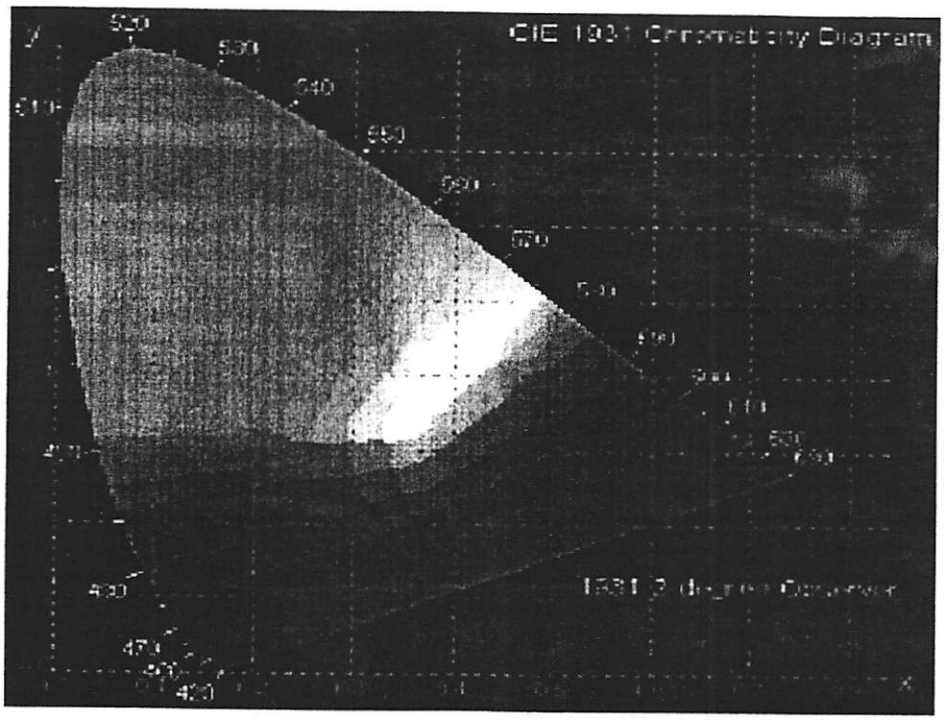
3. Color.



Color is a psychological response to different wavelengths of light based on the human perception. Id. at 12. How color is perceived depends upon the amount of energy light has at each wavelength. Id. Spectral energy distribution (" SED") shows the relative intensity of light at each wavelength. Id. The SED, however, is not useful for identifying specific colors. Id. In 1931, the Commission International l'Eclairage or International Commission on Illumination ("CIE") developed a system for identifying specific colors by measuring the chromaticity of light. The CIE system, which uses the diagram reproduced below, is well known and widely accepted. Id.

412

1931 C.I.E. CHROMATICITY DIAGRAM

Id. at 13.

All existing colors can be represented by a single point on the CIE Diagram, as plotted on chromaticity coordinates (x,y). Id. The upside down u-shaped perimeter of the diagram represents the 100% saturated, or pure spectral colors. Id. Colors, however, desaturate or become more and more pastel toward the center, until they are white. Id. Every color can be correlated to a dominant wavelength or complimentary dominant wavelength. Id.

C. Characteristics And Types Of Optical Filters.

Optical filters are devices that selectively pass or block electromagnetic radiation. Id. at 14. Whether radiation is passed or blocked is based upon a transmissive spectrum that shows wavelengths that have high transmittance (passing) and low transmittance (blocking). Id. Typically, filters derive their names by the way the transmittance graph looks. Id. For example, filters that pass shorter wavelengths and block longer wavelengths are called "low pass filters." Id. Filters that pass longer wavelengths and block shorter wavelengths are "high pass filters." Id.

A combination of optical filters will create a filter with properties that are cumulative, i.e., the combination of a "highpass filter" that passes light above 500 nm and a "lowpass filter" that passes light below 600 nm will result in light being emitted in the 500-600 nm range. Id. The transmittance values of filters are multiplied, wavelength by wavelength, to calculate the cumulative effect. Id.

D. The '914 Patent.

The '914 patent FN2 describes the technical problem in 1985 of having "a night vision aid, such as ANVIS goggles, be operable in a cockpit or similar environment in which a full color display is illuminated." '914 patent, col. 2, ll. 2-5.

> FN2. The '914 patent appears in the record as PMX 1 or DMX 1.

The '914 patent consists of three claims. Claims 1 and 2 are independent claims and 413 Claim 3 is dependent upon Claim 2. See '914 patent, col. 5, l. 30-col. 6, l. 31.

Honeywell Intellectual Properties, Inc. is the owner of the '269 patent application and '914 patent and Honeywell International, Inc. (hereinafter collectively, "Honeywell") is the exclusive licensee of the '269 patent application and '914 patent. The issuance of the patent, however, was withheld because of a Secrecy Order, issued on April 2, 1986.

On December 18, 2002, Honeywell filed a Complaint in the United States Court of Federal Claims asserting essentially three claims against the Government allegedly for violating: (1) the Invention Secrecy Act of 1951, 35 U.S.C. §§ 181 -88, as a result of the Government's issuance of an April 2, 1986 Secrecy Order concerning Honeywell's '914 414 patent and related '269 application; FN4 (2) the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution, as a result of the Government's taking of Honeywell's '914 patent and related '269 application; and (3) 28 U.S.C. § 1498(a) , as a result of the unlicensed, or otherwise unlawful, use of the '914 patent by or on behalf of the Government. See Compl. at ¶¶ 53-75. The case was assigned to the Honorable Emily C. Hewitt.

FN4. Initially, Honeywell asserted that the Government infringed U.S. Patent Application Serial No. 06/786,268 (" '268 application") and U.S. Patent No. 6,142,637 (" '637 patent"). Honeywell, however, relinquished claims in the '268 application and '637 patent. See 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 1, n.1; see also 5/13/05 Honeywell Motion.

On May 23, 2003, the Government filed a Motion to Issue a Notice to Third Party Lockheed Martin, pursuant to 41 U.S.C. § 114(b) and RCFC 14(b). On June 5, 2003, the court granted the Government's Motion. On June 16, 2003, the Government filed a First Answer.

* * * * * *

On August 15, 2003, this case was assigned to the undersigned judge. On September 3, 2003, Lockheed Martin filed an Unopposed Motion to Intervene, insofar as Honeywell alleged that the C-130J Hercules aircraft, which is manufactured by Lockheed Martin, incorporated technology claimed in the '914 patent. See Int. Motion at 1. On September 9, 2003, Honeywell filed a Response to Lockheed Martin's Motion to Intervene. On September 12, 2003, both Lockheed Martin and the Government filed a Reply to Honeywell's Response. On September 17, 2003, the court issued a revised Order granting Lockheed Martin's Motion to Intervene with respect to only Counts III and IV of the Complaint. On September 17, 2003, the court entered an Order setting discovery and pretrial deadlines agreed to by the parties. On that date, Lockheed Martin also filed an Answer in response to the December 18, 2002 Complaint.

On February 10, 2004, the Government filed an Unopposed Motion for Entry of a Stipulated Protective Order. On February 20, 2004, the court granted the Unopposed Motion and entered a Stipulated Protective Order. On April 30, 2004, the court entered an Order setting the date of a claim construction hearing for December 6-10, 2004, which subsequently was rescheduled to November 29, 2004-December 3, 2004 by a May 14, 2004 Order. On July 9, 2004, the court also issued an Order granting Honeywell's Unopposed Motion for Extension of Time of Certain Discovery Deadlines. On July 16, 2004, the court convened a telephone status conference to discuss discovery matters and questions concerning the claim construction hearing. At the invitation of the court, on July 23, 2004 and July 29, 2004, Lockheed Martin and Honeywell forwarded the court letters expressing suggestions about that hearing. On July 23 and 30, 2004, and August 5 and 17, 2004, the court convened additional telephone status conferences to discuss pending discovery matters. On August 25, 2004, the court vacated the September 17, 2003 and May 14, 2004 Orders and established a revised Scheduling Order setting a new date for the claim construction hearing for January 27, 2005, later re-set for January 31, 2005. In addition, on August 25, 2004, the court issued a Claim Construction Procedures Order proposed by the parties. On August 26, 2004, the court convened another telephone status conference to discuss discovery matters. On August 27, 2004, Lockheed Martin filed a Motion to Compel Honeywell's responses to Interrogatories 3 and 4. On August 30, 2004, Lockheed Martin filed a Motion to Compel Honeywell's response to Interrogatory 17.

On September 13 and 23, 2004, the court convened additional telephone status conferences to discuss discovery matters. On October 4, 2004, Lockheed Martin filed a Motion to Compel Honeywell to respond to requests for admission. On October 5, 2004, the court convened a telephone status conference with the parties. On October 6, 2004, the court issued an Amended Claim Construction Procedures Order and an Amended Scheduling Order setting another telephone status conference with the parties for October 12, 2004.

On October 15, 2004, Honeywell filed an Infringement Claim Chart. On October 18, 2004, Honeywell requested entry of a First 415 Amended Protective Order and opposed Lockheed Martin's requests for admission. On October 27, 2004, Lockheed Martin filed a Reply. At the November 1, 2004 telephone status conference, the court was advised that the dispute regarding requests for admission had been resolved to the satisfaction of the parties. Accordingly, on November 2, 2004, the court entered an Order to that effect.

On November 10, 2004, defendants filed a Joint Response Chart that asserted Claims 1, 2, and 3 of the '914 patent were invalid, due to:

> (1) the existence of documentary and nondocumentary evidence that rendered Honeywell's claims obvious; (2) the insufficiency of the description of the invention to show Honeywell's possession of it; (3) a failure by Honeywell to disclose the best mode for practicing the claimed invention; (4) Honeywell's derivation of the invention from others; (5) the introduction of impermissible new matter to the '914 patent in Honeywell's June 24, 2002 amendment; (6) the misjoinder of inventorship, which led to the granting of the '914 patent (the Government did not join in this defense); (7) the violation of Honeywell's duty to disclose to the second patent examiner the existence of prior art that was material to the PTO granting the '914 patent (the Government did not join in this defense).

On November 15, 2004, Honeywell submitted a Proposed Claim Construction Statement that set forth: (1) Honeywell's proposed claim constructions, including any special or uncommon meanings of words or phrases used in the '914 patent ; (2) references from the specification that support, describe, or explain each of the claim elements and/or Honeywell's proposed construction; (3) material in the prosecution history that describes or explains each of the elements of the claim; and (4) extrinsic evidence, where necessary.

On November 16, 2004, the court entered a First Amended Protective Order reflecting the changes negotiated by the parties. On November 16, 2004, defendants filed a Motion to Amend the Defendants' Joint Response Chart. On November 22, 2004, defendants filed a Joint Proposed Claim Construction Statement, together with a November 22, 2004 Expert Report of Dr. Harry Lee Task.

On December 3, 2004, the court entered an Order setting a status conference on December 17, 2004 and amending the due date for the Joint Claim Construction Statement to December 14, 2004. On December 16, 2004, the court entered an Order granting Lockheed Martin's Motion to Amend Defendants' November 8, 2004 Joint Response Chart. Following the December 17, 2004 status conference, the court entered a Second Amended Protective Order. On December 21, 2004, the parties filed a Joint Claim Construction Statement.

On December 23, 2004, Honeywell filed an Opening Claim Construction Brief seeking the court's construction of certain claims in the '914 patent, together with a four volume appendix-Exhibits 1-39 (PA1-PA514). On January 14, 2005, the Government and Lockheed Martin filed Defendants' Claim Construction Brief, together with five volumes of Exhibits 1-35 (DE1-DE1036). FN5 On January 416 21, 2005, Honeywell filed a Reply Claim Construction Brief, together with a Supplemental Appendix Ex. 40-49 (PA515-558). On January 27, 2005, the parties filed a Supplement to the Joint Claim Construction agreeing to the construction of the following terms: "optical filter" and "filter," when used as nouns; "filter" and " filtering," when used as verbs; and "passes," when used as a verb.

> FN5. On January 12, 2005, without requesting leave, the Government and Lockheed Martin filed a joint brief prior to the claim construction hearing that clearly was produced and authored in large part by Lockheed Martin's counsel. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief; see also TR at 10-16. On January 26, 2005, the court issued a Memorandum Opinion and Order addressing jurisdictional and procedural issues raised by this unilateral action:
> The public interest in having transparent judicial proceedings is particularly ill-served where a private party is in fact conducting and funding the Government's defense of a patent infringement case without the Government's public recognition and specific authorization of such. Therefore, if the Government, in fact, has decided to allow Lockheed Martin to "assume and undertake the conduct and control" of this case, [pursuant to Contract No. F33657-00-C0018 page one and an unidentified one page attachment, see May 23, 2003 Motion for Notice to Third-Party, pursuant to RCFC(b) (Exhibit 2 at 2(i)(3))], then the Government should advise the court and parties .... On the other hand, if the Government, in fact, intends to continue to defend this case, the court expects each party to proceed independently, representing the best interests of each party's respective clients.

> Thereafter, the Government reaffirmed that it would conduct a separate defense, particularly since "Lockheed's interest in the infringement issue are not co-extensive [with the Government]." TR at 5.

The court held a claim construction hearing from January 31, 2005-February 3, 2005 ("TR 1-1138"). FN6 In addition to argument of the parties, the court considered the reports of the parties' experts as direct testimony and heard cross examination and re-direct.

> FN6. The following Honeywell exhibits were admitted into evidence: PMX 1-57, 100-105, 110-112. The following Government and Lockheed Martin exhibits were admitted into evidence: DMX 1-38, DX 50-56.

The court has determined that Honeywell's expert, Lawrence E. Tannas, Jr., and his testimony, met the qualifications of Fed.R.Evid. 702 -03. See PMX 34 (Nov. 15, 2004 Initial Expert Report of Lawrence E. Tannas, Jr.); PMX 36 (Dec. 1, 2004 Rebuttal Expert Report); PMX 37 (Dec. 7, 2004 Supplement to Expert Reports); see also TR at 772-958; 1128-1135. Mr. Tannas has a B.S. and M.S. degree in Engineering from the University of California. See PMX 37 at Ex. 1. Mr. Tannas has had more than 25 years of "hands-on" experience with avionic cockpit displays, including research and development, manufacturing, testing, and human factor analysis. See PMX 34¶ 1 at 2. In addition, Mr. Tannas worked for Honeywell in the early 1960's during which time he invented the backup reentry guidance display for the Apollo Reentry Vehicle, which was used in the Apollo 13 mission. Id. ¶ 3 at 2. Subsequently, Mr. Tannas was employed at Martin Marietta Corp. where he developed a cockpit for the SV5 Manned Space Vehicle. Id. Prior to starting his own firm in 1999, Mr. Tannas also was employed by Rockwell International where he developed the engineering prototype of a liquid crystal display for the world's first full-scale LCD production. Id. Mr. Tannas currently is President of Tannas Electronics, an entity involved in consulting, lecturing, and research. Id. ¶ 5 at 3. In addition, he is President of Tannas Electronic Displays, Inc., which is involved in research, development, and licensing of intellectual property for preparing LCDs for avionics. Id.

Mr. Tannas has served as a consultant or lecturer for Fortune 500 companies, several universities, and federal agencies, including the Federal Aviation Administration, National Aeronautics and Space Administration, United States Air Force, United States Navy, National Science Foundation, Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, and the Central Intelligence Agency. Id. ¶ 2 at 2. Mr. Tannas also is an inventor or co-inventor of eight patents issued by the USPTO. Id. ¶ 3. He has authored or co-authored numerous publications, including serving as author/editor of Flat-Panel Displays and CRTs (Van Nostrand Reinhold Co., 1985) and Flat-Panel Display Technologies, Japan, Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus (Noyes Publications, 1995). Id. ¶ 4. In addition, Mr. Tannas has been a coordinator and lecturer on flat-panel displays, human factor analysis, and advance cockpit displays at University of California at Los Angeles and other universities. Id. ¶ 4 at 2-3.

Mr. Tannas was retained by Honeywell to provide an opinion as to the meaning of the following words or phrases in the '914 patent : "color display," id. ¶ 12 at 5; "source of light," id. ¶ 13; "local" with "color display," id. ¶ 14; "local" with "source of light," id. ¶ 14 at 5-6; "optical filter," id. ¶ 15 at 6; "notch filter," id. ¶ 16; "color band," id. ¶ 17 at 6-7; "predetermined color band," id. ¶ 18 at 7; "substantially blocks," id. ¶ 19; "filter," id. ¶ 20; "narrow band of the red color band," id. ¶ 21 at 7-8.

In addition to testifying about proposed construction of the above-referenced terms, Mr. Tannas advised the court that he intended to testify about the "background of the patented ['914] invention, including providing 417 relevant information concerning the technologies and industry to which the ['914] patent relates, the prior art, and the problems solved by the invention." Id. ¶ 22 at 8.

The court also has determined that the Government's expert, Dr. Harry Lee Task met the qualifications of Fed.R.Evid. 702 -03. See PMX 35 (Nov. 22, 2004 Expert Report of Harry Lee Task, Ph.D.); see also TR at 968-1127. Dr. Task has had more than 27 years of "hands-on" experience with research and development in helmet mounted displays, display image quality, vision assessment in space, night vision goggles, night vision goggle compatible lighting, and vision through aircraft transparencies. See PMX 35 ¶ 3 at 2. Dr. Task has a B.S. degree in Physics from Ohio University, a M.S. in Physics from Purdue University, a M.S. and Ph.D. in Optical Sciences from the University of Arizona Optical Sciences Center, and a M.S. in Management of Technology from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology Sloan School of Management. Id. ¶ 2 at 1-2.

In 1971, Dr. Task was hired by the United States Air Force Aerospace Medical Research Laboratory ("AMRL") as an optical physicist to work on helmet mounted displays and display image quality. Id. ¶ 3 at 2. In 1989, Dr. Task became the Chief Scientist for AMRL and served in that capacity until 1991. Id. In 1997, Dr. Task became the Senior Scientist for Human Systems Interface for the United States Air Force Research Laboratory, a position equivalent to a one-star General. Id. In June 2001, Dr. Task retired from the United States Air Force, but has continued technical work as a consultant. Since his retirement in June 2001, Dr. Task has been an independent consultant and President and Treasurer for Opto-Metrix, Inc., a Subchapter "S" corporation that makes and sells optical protractors. Id. ¶ 1 at 1.

Dr. Task also is the inventor or co-inventor of approximately 45 patents issued by the USPTO, author or co-author of over 100 technical-research publications, a member of relevant professional associations, including the Society for Information Display, and a Fellow of the American Society for Testing and Materials. See PMX 35 ¶ 4 at 2-3. He has been retained as an expert in vision and visibility in approximately a dozen cases involving vehicle accidents at night or dusk, however, none concerned NVGs or NVG compatible lighting. Id. ¶ 5 at 3.

Dr. Task was retained to provide an opinion as to the meaning of the following words or phrases in the '914 patent : "display system," id. ¶ 15 at 8; " local" with respect only to "passive night vision aid, " id. at ¶¶ 17-18 at 8; "display," id. ¶¶ 19-20 at 4-5; "color display," id. ¶ 21 at 9; "local source of light," id. ¶¶ 22-23 at 9; "notch filter," id. ¶¶ 24-25 at 9; "narrowband," id. ¶ 26 at 10; "color band," id. ¶¶ 27-29 at 10-11; "red color band," id. ¶¶ 30-31 at 11-12; "predetermined red color band," id. ¶¶ 32-34 at 12; "blue color band," id. ¶ 35 at 13; "green color band," id. ¶ 36 at 13; and "substantially blocks," id. ¶¶ 37-42 at 13-15.

In addition, Dr. Task testified about the background associated with the technical areas of the '914 patent , including the United States Army's 1973 adoption of a second-generation NVG and designation of the AN/PVS-5A as an "interim" pilot's aid for helicopter flying at night. See PMX 35 ¶ 8 at 4. Dr. Task admitted that NVGs were limited because of their incompatibility with aircraft lighting and displays. Id. Dr. Task explained that the problem was too much light in the cockpit, to which the NVGs were "sensitive." Id. ¶ 9 at 4. In addition, pilots trying to look outside the helicopter would see only reflections of the inside of the cockpit, as opposed to the view outside the helicopter. Id. On a more technical basis, the wavelengths that the NVGs were sensitive to (and amplified) included the entire visible spectrum (i.e., 400-700 nm) and a small portion of the near infrared wavelengths, i.e., 700-900 nm. Id. ¶ 9 at 4.

Dr. Task advised the court that most cockpit lighting and displays utilize incandescent light bulbs that emit a considerable amount of infrared energy compared to energy to which the human eye is sensitive. Id. ¶ 10 at 5. This created an issue since most incandescent lights in the cockpit emitted far more "bad" light than "good" light, to which the eye is sensitive. Id. Even when the NVGs were sensitive, "the filters typically did their 418 job with respect to producing the desired color, but they also passed the invisible-to-the-eye infrared light that was incompatible with the NVG operation." Id. Therefore, in order to create a display with phosphors compatible with NVGs, longer wavelength side bands needed to be blocked by a filter. Id. ¶ 11 at 5-6. To accomplish making a display with a phosphor compatible with NVGs several techniques were developed, including: placing filters over displays to block objectionable infrared and red wavelengths, but pass blue and green wavelengths; incandescent lights in the cockpit were turned off and the instrument panel utilized sources of light that did not emit objectionable light; and a filter passing only shorter wavelengths were put over white phosphor displays to block those wavelengths. Id. ¶ 12 at 6. The United States Army also developed an Aviation Night Vision Imaging System ("ANVIS") night vision goggles in the early 1980s that used an image intensified tube that was sensitive in the 450-930 nm range, rather than a full visible spectrum. Id. ¶ 13 at 6. When a "long pass" filter was used on the lens in front of the NVG to reduce the sensitivity of the ANVIS to shorter visible wavelengths, the NVG became sensitive to wavelengths of 580-930 nm. Id. ¶ 13 at 7. As a result, the visible range of below approximately 530 nm was used for cockpit lighting and display since light in this range was invisible to the NVGs allowing visibility outside the cockpit. Id. ¶ 14 at 7. Figure 1, the preferred embodiment of the '914 patent, teaches a significant overlap between the wavelengths (including yellow, orange, and red wavelength bands) sensitive to the human eye and the ANVIS, i.e., approximately 580-700 nm. Id. This was the state of the NVG technology in 1985, at the time the '914 patent was filed. Id. ¶ 15 at 7 (quoting '914 patent specification describing the problem in 1985 that the '914 patent addressed) ("It is ... desired that a night vision aid such as ANVIS goggles be operable while a full color display is illuminated. It is therefore desired to prevent light which originates at the full color display from overwhelming the night vision aid.").

Following the claim construction hearing, on February 28, 2005 and March 3, 2005, the court convened telephone status conferences, pursuant to which the court issued a March 11, 2005 Scheduling Order regarding post-hearing briefs and discovery deadlines regarding the August 1-12, 2005 trial.

On March 30, 2005, Lockheed Martin filed a Motion to Supplement the Record with three contracts between Lockheed Martin and the Government to support Lockheed Martin's intervention as a matter of right.

On April 1, 2005, Honeywell filed an Opening Post-Hearing Brief Regarding Claim Construction; the Government filed a Post-Hearing Claim Construction Brief; and Lockheed Martin filed a Post-Markman Hearing Brief. On April 7, 2005, the court granted Lockheed Martin's March 30, 2005 Motion to Supplement the Record.

On April 15, 2005, Honeywell filed a Post-Hearing Reply Brief Regarding Claim Construction; the Government filed a Post-Hearing Claim Construction Reply Brief; and Lockheed Martin filed a Reply to Honeywell's Opening Post-Hearing Brief Regarding Claim Construction. In addition, on April 15, 2005, the parties filed a Stipulation agreeing to the meaning of six of the contested claims, which are set forth herein.

On April 20, 2005, Honeywell filed a Motion for Leave to Supplement the Record Regarding Claim Construction of the term "red color band" ("4/20/05 Honeywell Brief"), together with an April 18, 2004 Declaration of Mark Koehn, Esquire and April 19, 2004 Declaration of Lawrence E. Tannas, Jr. and Exhibits 1-13 (PE1-155). FN7 Honeywell's Motion requested that the record include the Draft Standard for Color Active Matrix Liquid Crystal Displays in U.S. Military Aircraft, WL-TR-93-1177, Darrel Hopper June 419 1994 (Koehn Ex. 1) and Dr. Hopper's deposition testimony related thereto. On May 4, 2005, the Government filed a Brief in Response to Honeywell's Motion to Supplement, together with three volumes of supporting Exhibits ("Gov't Supp. Resp."). The Government did not object to Honeywell's request to supplement the record, but requested counter-designations.

> FN7. On February 25, 2005, Honeywell filed a Motion to file a corrected version of the December 23, 2004 Opening Claim Construction Brief. On March 14, 2005, Defendants opposed Honeywell's request to file a corrected brief. On March 17, 2005, Honeywell filed a reply together with Exhibits A-G. On March 24, 2005, the court entered an Order denying Honeywell's February 25, 2005 Motion, but granted Honeywell leave to discuss any corrections in the post-hearing brief to be filed on April 1, 2005.

On May 4, 2005, Honeywell also filed a letter to bring the recent decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit in Gillette Co. v. Energizer Holdings, Inc., 405 F.3d 1367 (Fed.Cir.2005) to the attention of the court. On May 5, 2005, Honeywell filed a Supplement to the October 15, 2004 Claim Chart ("5/5/05 Honeywell Supp. to Claim Chart") to amend: Section II of the Claim Chart to clarify that "Honeywell no longer asserts that LED displays are a type of display that infringes the '914 patent when used by the Government" (5/5/05 Honeywell Supp. to Claim Chart at 1, ¶ 2.); Section II of the Claim Chart to clarify that "Honeywell no longer asserts that the Cockpit Engineer Display (CED) made by Smiths Industries for B-52H, the Warning Annunciator Panel (WAP) made by Litton Systems/Northrop Grumman for the C-17A, or the Engine/Caution Panel made by Litton Systems for the C-17A are covered by the '914 patent when used by the Government in connection with NVIS" (Id. at 2, ¶ 3.); and Section III of the Claim Chart to remove " the statement at page 9 referencing 'Attachment B: claim chart showing how, on information and belief, '914 claim 1 reads on full color, NVIS compatible, Light-Emitting Diode (LED) displays, when used with NVIS" ' (Id. at ¶ 4.). Honeywell appears to have withdrawn Attachment B to the Claim Chart. Id. On May 6, 2005, the Government filed a Motion for Leave to File the Declaration of Dr. Darrel G. Hopper ("5/5/05 Hooper Decl.").

On May 6, 2005, Honeywell filed a Reply in support of the April 20, 2005 Unopposed Motion to Supplement the Record Regarding Claim Construction. On May 9, 2005, the court granted the Government's May 6, 2005 Unopposed Motion to File an Original Declaration of Dr. Darrel Hopper.

On May 13, 2005, the court granted Honeywell's May 13, 2005 Unopposed Amended Complaint dismissing Counts I, II, III, and IV as they relate to U.S. Patent No. 6,142,637.

On May 13, 2005, Honeywell filed a Motion to Preclude the Government "from making offensive use of certain documents belatedly produced in violation of the Court's [First Amended Protective Order and Second Amended Protective Order]," together with the May 11, 2005 Affidavit of Mark Koehn and Exhibits 1-19 (PE1-PE159). On May 25, 2005, the Government filed a Brief in Opposition. On May 26, 2005, the court denied Honeywell's May 13, 2005 Motion to Preclude. On May 31, 2005, Honeywell filed a Motion for Reconsideration.

On May 31, 2005, both the Government and Lockheed Martin filed an Answer to Honeywell's Amended Complaint.

III. DISCUSSION.

A. Jurisdiction.

The United States Court of Federal Claims has jurisdiction to adjudicate claims that allege "an invention described in and covered by a patent of the United States is used or manufactured by or for the United States without license of the owner thereof or lawful right to use or manufacture the same ... [seeking] recovery of ... reasonable and entire compensation for such use and manufacture." 28 U.S.C. § 1498(a).

The United States Court of Federal Claims also has jurisdiction to adjudicate claims under the Invention Secrecy Act. See 35 U.S.C. § 181. FN8

> FN8. The Invention Secrecy Act provides that "[w]henever publication or disclosure by the publication of an application or by the grant of a patent on an invention in which the Government has a property interest might, in the opinion of the head of the interested Government agency, be detrimental to the national security, the Commissioner of Patents upon being so notified shall order that the invention be kept secret and shall withhold the publication of the application or the grant of a patent therefor under the conditions set forth hereinafter. Whenever the publication or disclosure of an invention by the publication of an application or by the granting of a patent, in which the Government does not have a property interest, might, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Patents, be detrimental to the national security, he shall make the application for patent in which such > invention is disclosed available for inspection to ... the Secretary of Defense, and the chief officer of any other department or agency of the Government designated by the President as a defense agency of the United States.... If, in the opinion of ... the Secretary of a Defense Department, or the chief officer of another department or agency so designated, the publication or disclosure of the invention by the publication of an application or by the granting of a patent therefor would be detrimental to the national security, ... the Secretary of a Defense Department, or such other chief officer shall notify the Commissioner of Patents and the Commissioner of Patents shall order that the invention be kept secret and shall withhold the publication of the application or the grant of a patent for such period as the national interest requires, and notify the applicant thereof." 35 U.S.C. § 181.

> An applicant may seek damages caused by the issuance of a Secrecy Order. See 35 U.S.C. § 183 ("An applicant ... whose patent is withheld as herein provided, shall have the right ... to apply to the head of any department or agency who caused the order to be issued for compensation for the damage caused by the order of secrecy and/or for the use of the invention by the Government, resulting from his disclosure."). If full settlement of the matter is not achieved "the head of the department or agency may award and pay to such applicant ... a sum not exceeding 75 per centum of the sum which the head of the department or agency considers just compensation for the damage and/or use." Id.

420 The Complaint and Amended Complaint in this action properly invoke the court's jurisdiction under both of these federal statutes that authorize the award of monetary damages.

B. Standing.

1. Plaintiff.

Lower federal courts have been advised to "decide standing questions at the outset of a case. That order of decision (first jurisdiction then the merits) helps better to restrict the use of the federal courts to those adversarial disputes that Article III defines as the federal judiciary's business." Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 111, 118 S.Ct. 1003, 140 L.Ed.2d 210 (1998) (Breyer, J. concurring). The party invoking federal jurisdiction, has the burden of proof and persuasion to satisfy the constitutional requirements of Article III standing. See FW/PBS, Inc. v. Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 231, 110 S.Ct. 596, 107 L.Ed.2d 603 (1990) (holding that the burden is on the party seeking to exercise jurisdiction by clearly alleging facts sufficient to establish jurisdiction).

Section 281 of Title 35 of the United States Code provides that "[a] patentee shall have remedy by civil action for infringement of his patent." 35 U.S.C. § 281; see also 35 U.S.C. § 100(d) ("The word 'patentee' includes not only the patentee to whom the patent was issued but also the successors in title to the patentee."); Prima Tek II, L.L.C. v. A-Roo Co., 222 F.3d 1372, 1376-77 (Fed.Cir.2000) ("Standing to sue for patent infringement derives from the Patent Act, ... 35 U.S.C. § 281."); Paradise Creations, Inc. v. UV Sales, Inc., 315 F.3d 1304, 1308 (Fed.Cir.2003) (emphasis in original) (" This court has determined that in order to assert standing for patent infringement, the plaintiff must demonstrate that it held enforceable title to the patent at the inception of the lawsuit."). The standard set forth by the United States Supreme Court over a century ago fully retains its vitality. See Waterman v. Mackenzie, 138 U.S. 252, 260, 11 S.Ct. 334, 34 L.Ed. 923 (1891) (citations omitted) (" There can be no doubt that he is 'the party interested, either as patentee, assignee, or grantee,' and as such entitled to maintain an action at law to recover damages for an infringement; and it cannot have been the intention of congress that a suit in equity against an infringer to obtain an injunction and an account of profits, in which the court is authorized to award damages, when necessary to fully compensate the plaintiff, and has the same power to treble the damages as in an action at law, should not be brought by the same person.").

Plaintiffs properly have alleged that, at the inception of the lawsuit and at the filing of the Amended Complaint on May 31, 2005, Honeywell Intellectual Properties Inc. was the owner of the '269 patent application and '914 patent and Honeywell International Inc. was an exclusive licensee of the '269 patent application and '914 patent.

421 2. Intervenor.

The United States Court of Federal Claims "may summon any and all persons with legal capacity to be sued to appear as a party ... in any suit ... of any nature whatsoever pending in said court to assert and defend their interests [.]" 41 U.S.C. § 114(b); see also RCFC 14(b) ("The court, ... may notify any person with legal capacity to sue and be sued and who is alleged to have an interest in the subject matter of any pending action."); see also RCFC 24(a) ("Upon timely application anyone shall be permitted to intervene in an action ... (2) when the applicant claims an interest relating to the property or transaction which is the subject of the action and the applicant is so situated that the disposition of the action may as a practical matter impair or impede the applicant's ability to protect that interest, unless the applicant's interest is adequately represented by existing parties."); RCFC 24(b) (" Upon timely application anyone may be permitted to intervene in an action: ... (2) when an applicant's claim or defense and the main action have a question of law or fact in common. In exercising its discretion the court shall consider whether the intervention will unduly delay or prejudice the adjudication of the rights of the original parties.").

The Complaint alleged that aircraft manufactured by Lockheed Martin for the Government incorporate technology disclosed and claimed in the '269 patent application and '914 patent. See Compl. ¶¶ 53-60, Ex. B; see also Am. Compl. ¶ ¶ 24-28, Ex. B. Lockheed Martin initially filed a Motion to Intervene and the court subsequently granted Lockheed Martin's Motion. Following the court's January 26, 2005 Memorandum Opinion and Order, Lockheed Martin supplemented the record with three contracts that Lockheed Martin entered into with the Government, "all contain[ing] warranties that each aircraft provided by Lockheed Martin under the contracts 'shall be free of rightful claim of infringement of any United States Patent.' " See 3/30/05 Lockheed Martin Motion to Supplement the Record at 2 (citing Ex. 1 (Contract No. F33657-95-C-2055) at 14 (C-130J System Commercial Warranty), Part A(e), p. 42 of 165; Ex. 2 (Contract No. F33657-00-C-0018), Attachment 1 at 14 (C-130J System Commercial Warranty), Part A, e., p. 50 of 65; Ex. 3 (Contract No. 33657-03-C-2014), Attachment 1 at 13 (C-130J System Commercial Warranty), b(5), p. 34 of 48). The remedy for a breach of these warranties by Lockheed Martin would be " 'reimbursement of the Government by [Lockheed Martin] of the amount of the Government's loss, cost or damage ... arising out of such patent infringement.' " See 3/30/05 Lockheed Martin Motion to Supplement the Record at 3 and n.2. These contracts evidence that the disposition of this action may impair Lockheed Martin's interests, unless it enjoys all the rights of a party, including the right to appeal. Therefore, the court has determined that Lockheed Martin has standing to intervene in this case pursuant to RCFC 24(a).

C. Controlling Appellate Precedent Concerning Construction Of Patent Claims.

The United States Supreme Court's unanimous affirmance of the en banc decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit in Markman v. Westview Instruments, Inc., 52 F.3d 967, 978 (Fed.Cir.1995) ("Markman I"), aff'd 517 U.S. 370, 116 S.Ct. 1384, 134 L.Ed.2d 577 (1996) ("Markman II"), settled that the meaning and scope of a patent's claims are issues of law to be determined by a federal trial judge. Id. A strong undercurrent, if not undertow, concerned the competence of a jury to understand, must less construe, technical terms of art and functional elements of a patent's claims. See Markman II, 517 U.S. at 384, 116 S.Ct. 1384 ("We ... consider both the relative interpretive skills of judges and juries and the statutory policies that ought to be furthered by the allocation."); see also id. at 388-89, 116 S.Ct. 1384 (quoting Parker v. Hulme, 18 F. Cas. 1138, 1140 (E.D.Pa.1849) ("The judge, from ... training and discipline, is more likely to give a proper interpretation to such instruments than a jury; and ... is, therefore, more likely to be right, in performing such a duty, than a jury can be expected to be.")).

422 In Markman I, the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit specified three sources relevant to construe a patent's claim: claim language; the specification; and prosecution history. See Markman I, 52 F.3d at 979 (quoting Unique Concepts, Inc. v. Brown, 939 F.2d 1558, 1561 (Fed.Cir.1991)) (" 'To ascertain the meaning of claims, we consider three sources: The claims, the specification, and the prosecution history.' "). It is important to recognize, however, that in Markman II the United States Supreme Court did not constrain a federal trial court from adjudicating the terms of a claim by excluding any relevant and reliable evidence, including that of experts. See Markman II, 517 U.S. at 390, 116 S.Ct. 1384 ("The decisionmaker vested with the task of construing the patent is in the better position to ascertain whether an expert's proposed definition fully comports with the specification and claims and so will preserve the patent's internal coherence."). Instead, that decision was entrusted to the considered judgment of the federal trial judge to determine, but following the precedent of the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit that was established to bring uniformity and doctrinal stability to the decisions of the federal judiciary on all matters concerning patent law. Id. ("It was just for the sake of such desirable uniformity that Congress created the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit as an exclusive appellate court for patent cases, H.R.Rep. No. 97-312, pp. 20-23 (1981), observing that increased uniformity would 'strengthen the United States patent system in such a way as to foster technological growth and industrial innovation.' Id. at 20.").

1. A Federal Trial Judge Must First Attempt To Construe Ambiguous Claim Terms Utilizing Intrinsic Evidence.

a. Claim Language.

[1] [2] A federal trial judge examines claim terms and phrases "through the viewing glass of a person skilled in the art." See Brookhill-Wilk 1, LLC v. Intuitive Surgical, Inc., 334 F.3d 1294, 1298 (Fed.Cir.2003); see also Hockerson-Halberstadt, Inc. v. Avia Group Int'l, Inc., 222 F.3d 951, 955 (Fed.Cir.2000) ("Claim language must be given ordinary and accustomed meaning, as understood by one of ordinary skill in the art," at the time of the patent application.). In doing so, a federal trial judge in a patent infringement case must determine, as a threshold matter, whether there is ambiguity in any claim term requiring construction and, if so, to consider intrinsic evidence. See Vitronics Corp. v. Conceptronic, Inc., 90 F.3d 1576, 1582 (Fed.Cir.1996). First, a federal trial judge must " look to the words of the claims themselves, both asserted and nonasserted, to define the scope of the patented invention." Id. Second, "it is always necessary to review the specification to determine whether the inventor has used any terms in a manner inconsistent with their ordinary meaning. The specification acts as a dictionary when it expressly defines terms ... or by implication." Id. Third, a federal trial judge may "consider the prosecution history of the patent, if in evidence." Id. The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has decided that intrinsic evidence is the " most significant source of the legally operative meaning of disputed claim language." Id.; see also Phonometrics, Inc. v. Northern Telecom Inc., 133 F.3d 1459, 1464 (Fed.Cir.1998) ("Proper construction requires an examination of claim language, the written description, and, if introduced, the prosecution history.").

b. Specification Explanation And Definition.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit recently reaffirmed that the specification is often the best tool to ascertain the "technological and temporal context" of claims. See Nazomi Communications, Inc. v. Arm Holdings, PLC, 403

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

F.3d 1364, 1368 (Fed.Cir.2005) (citing Metabolite Labs., Inc. v. Lab. Corp. of Am. Holdings, 370 F.3d 1354, 1360 (Fed.Cir.2004)) ("In most cases, the best source for discerning ... [usage in context as understood by one skilled in the art at the time of the invention] is the patent specification wherein the patent applicant describes the invention.").

[3] If a patent's claim language is ambiguous, the specification "including the inventors'423 statutorily-required written description of the invention is the primary source for determining claim meaning." Astrazeneca AB v. Mutual Pharm. Co., Inc., 384 F.3d 1333, 1336 (Fed.Cir.2004); see also id. at 1337 (quoting Autogiro Co. of Am. v. United States, 181 Ct.Cl. 55, 384 F.2d 391, 397-98 (1967)) (" 'Most courts have simply stated that the specification is to be used to explain the claims'; ... the patent is an integrated document, with the claims 'pointing out and distinctly claiming,' 35 U.S.C. § 112, the invention described in the rest of the specification and the goal of claim construction is to determine what an ordinary artisan would deem the invention claimed by the patent, taking the claims together with the rest of the specification."). Of course, the utility of the specification depends on whether the "written description of the invention [is] ... clear and complete enough to enable those of ordinary skill in the art to make and use it." Vitronics, 90 F.3d at 1582.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has held many times that " 'a patentee can act as his own lexicographer to specifically define terms of a claim contrary to their ordinary meaning[;]' the written description in such a case must clearly redefine a claim term 'so as to put a reasonable competitor or one reasonably skilled in the art on notice that the patentee intended to so redefine that claim term.' " Elekta Instrument S.A. v. O.U.R. Scientific Int'l, Inc., 214 F.3d 1302, 1307 (Fed.Cir.2000) (quoting Process Control Corp. v. HydReclaim Corp., 190 F.3d 1350, 1357 (Fed.Cir.1999)); see also Georgia-Pacific Corp. v. United States Gypsum Co., 195 F.3d 1322, 1332 (Fed.Cir.1999) (citations omitted) (advising that the "specification of the patent in suit is the best guide to the meaning of a disputed term ... [and if] intrinsic evidence is unambiguous, it is improper for the court to rely on extrinsic evidence to contradict the meaning of the claims."); ATD Corp. v. Lydall, Inc., 159 F.3d 534, 540 (Fed.Cir.1998) (citation omitted) ("When 'the specification explains and defines a term used in the claims, without ambiguity or incompleteness, there is no need to search further for the meaning of the term' ... [unless] such definition is challenged [then] it is often appropriate ... to receive evidence of the meaning and usage of terms of art from persons experienced in the field of the invention."); Vitronics, 90 F.3d at 1582 (holding that, in ascertaining the scope of the patent, deference should be afforded claims, as defined by their "customary meaning," with the caveat that the law affords patentees the right to serve as a "lexicographer," if a special or unique definition is clearly stated in the specifications or prosecution history.). Federal trial judges also have been well advised not to construe a claim to exclude the preferred and only embodiment disclosed in a specification: "such an interpretation is rarely, if ever, correct[.]" Vitronics, 90 F.3d at 1583.

In Chemcast Corp. v. Arco Industries Corp., 913 F.2d 923, 926-27 (Fed.Cir.1990), the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit also discussed the distinction between "enablement" and "best mode" requirements. FN9 The specification discloses an invention "in such a manner as will enable one skilled in the art to make and utilize it." Id. at 926. The purpose of the "best mode," however, is to restrain inventors from applying for patents and concealing from the public preferred embodiments of their inventions. Id. at 927.

> FN9. The governing statute provides that the specification "shall set forth the best mode contemplated by the inventor of carrying out his invention." 35 U.S.C. § 112. Section 112 also requires disclosure of specific instrumentalities or techniques that are the best way of carrying out the invention. Id.

c. Prosecution History.

Federal trial judges also have been instructed that prosecution history is relevant to claim construction "because it may contain contemporaneous exchanges between the patent applicant and the [USPTO] about what the claim means." Vitronics, 90 F.3d at 1584. Prosecution history, however, can trump the importance of the specification in certain circumstances. For example, in Graham v. John Deere Co. of Kansas City, 383 U.S. 1, 86 S.Ct. 684, 15 L.Ed.2d 545 (1966), the United States Supreme Court held that if claims were narrowed to obtain issuance over 424 prior art during prosecution, they may not later be interpreted by the specifications to cover what was disclaimed before the U.S. Patent Office. Id. at 33, 86 S.Ct. 684; see also Schriber-Schroth Co. v. Cleveland Trust Co., 311 U.S. 211, 220-21, 61 S.Ct. 235, 85 L.Ed. 132 (1940) ("When ... the patentee originally claimed the subject matter alleged to infringe but then narrowed the claim in response to a rejection, he may not argue that the surrendered territory compromised unforeseen subject matter that should be deemed equivalent to the literal claims of the issued patent."). In sum, prosecution history may preclude "a patentee from regaining through litigation, coverage of subject matter relinquished during prosecution of the application of the patent." Wang Labs. v. Mitsubishi Electronics America, Inc., 103 F.3d 1571, 1577-78 (Fed.Cir.1997), cert denied, 522 U.S. 818, 118 S.Ct. 69, 139 L.Ed.2d 30 (1997).

2. Only In Limited Circumstances May A Federal Trial Judge Construe Claim Terms Utilizing Extrinsic Evidence.

[4] If analysis of intrinsic evidence resolves ambiguity about the meaning of the patent claim, as a matter of law, it is improper for a federal trial judge to cite to extrinsic evidence, i.e., evidence outside of the patent record, including expert and inventor testimony, dictionaries, learned treatises, and articles. See Vitronics, 90 F.3d at 1584 (allowing extrinsic evidence "to help the court come to the proper understanding of the claims [,]" but not to contradict intrinsic evidence or vary the scope of the claims). That instruction was clarified in Key Pharm. v. Hercon Lab. Corp., 161 F.3d 709 (Fed.Cir.1998):

> This court has made strong cautionary statements on the proper use of extrinsic evidence, which might be misread by some members of the bar as restricting a trial court's ability to hear such evidence. We intend no such thing. To the contrary, trial courts generally can hear expert testimony for background and education on the technology implicated by the presented claim construction issues, and trial courts have broad discretion in this regard.
> Furthermore, a trial court is quite correct in hearing and relying on expert testimony on an ultimate claim construction question in cases in which the intrinsic evidence (i.e., the patent and its file history-the "patent record") does not answer the question.
> What is disapproved of is an attempt to use extrinsic evidence to arrive at a claim construction that is clearly at odds with the claim construction mandated by the claims themselves, the written description, and the prosecution history, in other words, with the written record of the patent.

Id. at 716 (citations omitted); see also Elekta Instrument, 214 F.3d at 1307 (quoting Gentry Gallery, Inc. v. Berkline Corp., 134 F.3d 1473, 1476 (Fed.Cir.1998)) ("[A] court should rely upon ' the claim language, the written description portion of the specification, the prosecution history, and if necessary to aid the court's understanding of the patent, extrinsic evidence.' "); Zodiac Pool Care, Inc. v. Hoffinger Indus., Inc., 206 F.3d 1408, 1414 (Fed.Cir.2000) (affirming a federal trial court's claim construction and cautioning that "both intrinsic and extrinsic evidence [may be considered, however, a federal trial court should] turn[ ] to extrinsic evidence only when the intrinsic evidence is insufficient to establish the clear meaning of the asserted claim."); Trilogy Communications, Inc. v. Times Fiber Communications, Inc., 109 F.3d 739, 744 (Fed.Cir.1997) ("When, as here, the district court has concluded that the patent specification and the prosecution history adequately elucidate the proper meaning of the claims, expert testimony is not necessary and certainly not crucial.").

[5] Extrinsic evidence, however, may be particularly useful to determine how one of ordinary skill in the relevant art would interpret the claim language. See Brookhill-Wilk 1, LLC, 334 F.3d at 1298. For example, a federal trial judge should be able to consider extrinsic evidence to learn whether a common term has a special meaning in the relevant field. See Microsoft Corp. v. Multi-Tech Sys., Inc., 357 F.3d 1340, 1347 (Fed.Cir.2004) (en banc) (quoting 425Invitrogen Corp. v. Biocrest Mfg., L.P.,* 327 F.3d 1364, 1367 (Fed.Cir.2003)) (" Claim language generally carries the ordinary meaning of the words in their normal usage in the field of invention.").

a. Prior Art.

[6] Depending on the clarity of a patent claim and specification, prior issued patents may provide a source of relevant evidence to determine how a term or phrase has been used or understood by one skilled in the art. That is true whether or not the prior art was referenced in the specification or the prosecution history. See Arthur A. Collins, Inc. v. Northern Telecom, Ltd., 216 F.3d 1042, 1044-45 (Fed.Cir.2000) ("When prior art that sheds light on the meaning of a term is cited by the patentee, it can have particular value as a guide to the proper construction of the term, because it may indicate not only the meaning of the term to persons skilled in the art, but also that the patentee intended to adopt that meaning."); see also Vitronics, 90 F.3d at 1583. Within the hierarchy of extrinsic evidence, prior art is a more reliable source of evidence as to the meaning of words or phrases in a patent claim than expert testimony. Id.

b. Technical Treatises And Technical Articles.

[7] As with prior art, treatises and technical articles, particularly those of note, wide circulation, or likely to be utilized as standard desk reference material by an ordinary person skilled in the art at the time of the patent's issuance may be consulted in the discretion of the court. See Dow Chemical Co. v. Sumitomo Chem. Co., 257 F.3d 1364, 1372 (Fed.Cir.2001) ("[Technical treatises, which are extrinsic evidence, hold a 'special place' and may sometimes be considered along with the intrinsic evidence when determining the ordinary meaning of claim terms."); see also Vitronics, 90 F.3d at 1584 n. 6 ("Although technical treatises and dictionaries fall within the category of extrinsic evidence, as they do not form a part of an integrated patent document, they are worthy of special note. Judges are free to consult such resources at any time in order to better understand the underlying technology and may also rely on dictionary definitions when construing claim terms, so long as the dictionary definition does not contradict any definition found in or ascertained by a reading of the patent documents.").

c. Expert Testimony.

[8] The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has instructed federal trial judges that expert testimony may be helpful in aiding an understanding of the patent, but not for the purpose of varying or contradicting the claims. See Markman I, 52 F.3d at 981. The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, however, has cautioned that expert testimony may be considered, but only insofar as it aids the trial court to understand the claim language, the specification, or the prosecution history. See Vitronics, 90 F.3d at 1584 ("Indeed, where the patent documents are unambiguous, expert testimony regarding the meaning of a claim is entitled to no weight."); see also CAE Screenplates Inc. v. Heinrich Fiedler GmbH & Co. KG, 224 F.3d 1308, 1318 (Fed.Cir.2000) (holding that when "the intrinsic evidence is unambiguous, it is improper for a [federal trial] court to rely on extrinsic evidence such as expert testimony when construing disputed claim limitations."); but see Pitney Bowes, Inc. v. Hewlett-Packard Co., 182 F.3d 1298, 1308 (Fed.Cir.1999) ("Vitronics does not prohibit courts from examining extrinsic evidence, even when the patent document is itself clear."); see also id. (emphasizing that Vitronics "does not set forth any rules regarding the admissibility of expert testimony into evidence.... [and] there are no prohibitions ... on courts hearing evidence from experts. Rather, Vitronics merely warned courts not to rely on extrinsic evidence in claim construction to contradict the meaning of claims discernible from thoughtful examination of the claims, the written description, and the prosecution history-the intrinsic evidence."); Key Pharm., 161 F.3d at 716 ("[T]rial courts generally can hear expert testimony for background and education on the technology implicated by the presented claim construction issues, and trial courts have broad discretion in this regard.").

426 Federal trial courts also have been advised that "it is entirely appropriate, perhaps even preferable, for a court to consult trustworthy extrinsic evidence to ensure that the claim construction it is tending to from the patent file is not inconsistent with clearly expressed, plainly apposite, and widely held understandings in the pertinent technical field." Pitney Bowes, 182 F.3d at 1309. In that case, Circuit Judge Rader wrote " Additional Views," joined by Circuit Judge Plager, to emphasize that Vitronics provides "good counsel when it urges trial judges to focus on the patent document-notably the claims themselves-to ascertain the scope of patent coverage." Id. at 1314.

Federal trial judges, however, may turn to expert testimony to: "(1) supply a proper technological context to understand the claims (words often have meaning only in context), (2) explain the meaning of claim terms as understood by one of skill in the art (the ultimate standard for claim meaning), and (3) help the trial court understand the patent process itself (complex prosecution histories-not to mention specifications-are not familiar to most trial courts."). Id. (citations omitted); see also Elkay Mfg. Co. v. Ebco Mfg. Co., 192 F.3d 973, 976-77 (Fed.Cir.1999) cert. denied, 529 U.S. 1066 (2000) (reversing a federal trial court and stating that a court "may receive extrinsic evidence to educate itself about the invention and the relevant technology, but the court may not use extrinsic evidence to arrive at a claim construction that is clearly at odds with the construction mandated by the intrinsic evidence.").

d. Scientific Or Industry Specific Dictionaries.

Although many post-Markman II decisions have attempted to clarify the permissible use of dictionaries to define words in a claim, the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit's initial guidance in Markman I remains sound: "The district court's claim construction, enlightened by such extrinsic evidence as may be helpful, is still based upon the patent and prosecution history." Markman I, 52 F.3d at 981; see also Toro Co. v. White Consol. Indus., Inc., 199 F.3d 1295, 1299 (Fed.Cir.1999) ("[The trial court should] not rely solely on a dictionary of general linguistic usage, but would understand the claims in light of the specification and the prior art, guided by the prosecution history and experience in the technologic field.").

e. Inventor Testimony.

[9] The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit appropriately has viewed post-issuance testimony by a patent's inventor as subjective opinion about the meaning of claim terms that is entitled to little or no weight. See, e.g., Bell & Howell Document Mgmt. Prods. Co. v. Altek Sys., 132 F.3d 701, 706 (Fed.Cir.1997) ("The testimony of an inventor often is a self-serving, after-the-fact attempt to state what should have been part of his or her patent application."); Engel Indus., Inc. v. Lockformer Co., 96 F.3d 1398, 1405 (Fed.Cir.1996) ("[The inventor's] subjective intent is of little or no probative weight in determining the scope of the claims, except as documented in the prosecution history.").

3. A Federal Trial Court Should Construe Claims To Preserve A Patent's Validity Only Where All Other Tools Of Claim Construction Are Exhausted.

[10] Where ambiguity remains after reviewing intrinsic evidence in construing patent claims, two doctrines have been employed to preserve the patent's validity. The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has advised federal trial judges that claims should be construed to preserve a patent's validity, however, this presumption is applicable only "where the proposed claim construction is 'practicable,' ... based on sound claim construction principles, and does not revise or ignore the explicit language of the claims."

Generation II Orthotics Inc. v. Med. Tech. Inc., 263 F.3d 1356, 1365 (Fed.Cir.2001); see also Liebel-Flarsheim Co. v. Medrad, Inc., 358 F.3d 898, 914 (Fed.Cir.2004) (holding that "unless the court concludes, after applying all the available tools of claim construction that the claim is still ambiguous, the axiom regarding the construction to preserve the validity of the claim does not apply"). Likewise, the United 427 States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has emphasized that the doctrine of claim differentiation is to be reserved only for those cases where neither intrinsic nor extrinsic evidence leads to a definite definition. See Hormone Research Foundation, Inc. v. Genentech, Inc., 904 F.2d 1558, 1567 n. 15 (Fed.Cir.1990) ("[The doctrine of claim differentiation] although well established in our cases cannot overshadow the express and contrary intentions of the patent draftsman.").

4. The Import Of Phillips v. AWH Corp., 376 F.3d 1382 (Fed.Cir.2004).

To the displeasure of the court, none of the parties initially recognized, much less discussed, the pending en banc consideration of Phillips v. AWH Corp., 363 F.3d 1207, reh'g en banc granted, j. vacated, 376 F.3d 1382 (Fed.Cir.2004) ("Phillips") in their pre-claim construction briefs. See Honeywell Int'l, Inc. v. United States, 65 Fed.Cl. 809, 810-11, 2005 WL 1415441 (Jan. 26, 2005, amended and reissued June 14, 2005) (Memorandum Opinion and Order); see also TR at 8-13. In Phillips, the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, sitting en banc, requested briefing and argument concerning seven core claim construction issues:

1. Is the public notice function of patent claims better served by referencing primarily to technical and general purpose dictionaries and similar sources to interpret a claim term or by looking primarily to the patentee's use of the term in the specification? If both sources are to be consulted, in what order?
2. If dictionaries should serve as the primary source for claim interpretation, should the specification limit the full scope of claim language (as defined by the dictionaries) only when the patentee has acted as his own lexicographer or when the specification reflects a clear disclaimer of claim scope? If so, what language in the specification will satisfy those conditions? What use should be made of general as opposed to technical dictionaries? How does the concept of ordinary meaning apply if there are multiple dictionary definitions of the same term? If the dictionary provides multiple potentially applicable definitions for a term, is it appropriate to look to the specification to determine what definition or definitions should apply?
3. If the primary source for claim construction should be the specification, what use should made of dictionaries? Should the range of the ordinary meaning of claim language be limited to the scope of the invention disclosed in the specification, for example, when only a single embodiment is disclosed and no other indications of breadth are disclosed?
4. Instead of viewing the claim construction methodologies in the majority and dissent of the now-vacated panel decision as alternative, conflicting approaches, should the two approaches be treated as complementary methodologies such that there is a dual restriction on claim scope, and a patentee must satisfy both limiting methodologies in order to establish the claim coverage it seeks?
5. When, if ever, should claim language be narrowly construed for the sole purpose of avoiding invalidity under, e.g., 35 U.S.C. §§ 102 , 103 , and 112?
6. What role should prosecution history and expert testimony by one of ordinary skill in the art play in determining the meaning of the disputed claim terms?
7. Consistent with the Supreme Court's decision in Markman v. Westview Instruments, Inc., 517 U.S. 370, 116 S.Ct. 1384, 134 L.Ed.2d 577 (1996), and our en banc decision in Cybor Corp. v. FAS Technologies, Inc., 138 F.3d 1448 (Fed.Cir.1998), is it appropriate for this court to accord any deference to any aspect of trial court claim construction rulings? If so, on what aspects, in what circumstances, and to what extent?

Phillips, 376 F.3d at 1383.

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

In post-claim construction hearing briefs, however, the parties rationalized their oversight by advising the court that the resolution of Phillips would not affect the claim construction in this case because the '914 claims are not dependent upon dictionary definition, but rather can be resolved by the claim language or description of the '914 428 invention, as set forth in the specification and embodiments therein. See 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 9-10; see also 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 12.

The Government's proposed construction of the term "red color band" in this case primarily relied on a dictionary definition. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 30-33; 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 37; 4/15 Gov't Brief at 21. In Phillips, however, the Government wherein argued that "[p]rimary reliance on dictionaries that are not part of the patent's public record subordinates the patentee's own explanation of his invention in favor of a dictionary definition never at issue during the patent prosecution before the USPTO." 9/20/04 Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae at 9, Phillips v. AWH Corp. The Government explained to the court that its proposed construction of the "red color band" was misstated and taken out of context by the court in light of the Government's adherence to an "approach approved by the [United States Court of Appeals for the] Federal Circuit in cases such as Key Pharmaceuticals v. Hercon Laboratories Corp., 161 F.3d 709 (Fed.Cir.1998)." See 4/15/05 Gov't Brief at 3. The Government also was quick to point out that Honeywell equally was culpable of relying on extrinsic evidence in its proposed construction of the terms: "display system," see 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 9-11 (citing e.g., Webster's; Ieee Dictionary; Dr. Task, TR at 31-32, 35; Mr. Tannas, TR at 34, 129); "optical filter," see also id. at 15-19 (citing, e.g., APPLIED OPTICS; Mcgraw Hill; Mr. Tannas Initial Report (PMX 34 at ¶ 15); Mr. Tannas, TR at 168-71, 279-80, 351-52; Dr. Task, TR at 19, 31-32, 244-45, 247, 249-56); and " color band," see also id. at 24-26 (citing e.g., Webster's; Mcgraw Hill; Mr. Tannas Initial Report (PMX 34 at ¶ 17); Mr. Tannas, TR at 183; Dr. Task's Initial Report (PMX 35 ¶ ¶ 27-28); Dr. Task, TR at 58, 63-65, 70-71, 127-29).

Since the infringement and potential damage claims in this case are scheduled for trial on August 1, 2005, the court has decided to issue this claim construction Memorandum Opinion, reserving the right to amend these constructions prior to the issuance of a Final Judgment, in light of any subsequent appellate precedent, including Phillips, and any further evidence that may be adduced at trial.

D. Construction Of Certain Claims Of United States Patent No. 6,467,914.

At a January 31, 2005-February 4, 2005 claim construction hearing, initially the parties requested that seventeen claims of the '914 patent be construed by the court. On April 14, 2005, the parties filed a Joint Stipulation to evidence their agreement of the meaning of six claims. Therefore, the court now is required only to construe the eleven claims that remain in dispute.

For each claim term or phrase at issue, the court has set forth the parties' arguments before, during, and after the claim construction hearing to highlight those occasions where there was a shift, which sometimes was subtle and at other times stark. The court also has made liberal use of the transcript of the claim construction hearing to highlight the areas of the court's inquiry and representations made by counsel therein and to underscore the court's disposition of each word or phrase of a claim that was construed.

As a predicate to the following patent claim construction, the court has determined that one of ordinary skill in the art in 1985 would be knowledgeable about night vision compatible aids, compatible instrument and panel lighting, and manufacturing displays for military cockpits.

1. "Display System."

Preamble language common to both Claim 1 and Claim 2 of the '914 patent states that the invention is: "A display system for use in association with a light amplifying passive night vision aid and a local color display including a local source of light[.]"

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

See '914 patent, col. 5, ll. 31-33, col. 6, ll. 11-13 (emphasis added).

The parties have proposed the following competing constructions of "display system" and other claim language for the court's consideration:

Honeywell's Proposed Construction	Defendants' Proposed Construction
Display system for use in association with a light amplifying passive night vision aid and a local color display including a local source of light: No further construction is necessary. To the extent preamble needs to be construed at all, it should be construed as follows: complex unity subject to a common plan or serving a common purpose that combines a light amplifying passive night vision aid and a local color display including a local source of light.	"Display System for Use in Association With" means two or more filters, which are used in combination with a night vision aid, such as night vision goggles, and a local color display, to make the color display compatible with the night vision aid. For use in association with: in combination with.

a. Honeywell's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Honeywell's pre-hearing brief informed the court that no further construction of the language of the preambles common to both Claim 1 and Claim 2 was necessary. See 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 8. In the alternative, if the court decided to construe " display system," Honeywell urged the court to consider the entire preamble, not just the first seven words. Id. In addition, Honeywell proffered that either a traditional or specialized dictionary definition supported the "ordinary meaning" of " system as a complex unity formed of often diverse parts," which in this case includes, "a light amplifying passive night vision aid and a local color display including a local source of light." Id. (emphasis added). Honeywell cautioned, however, that the "fact that the display system is recited as being for use in association with ... a local color display does not require that the display system be distinct from the local color display." Id. at 16 (emphasis added).

Next, Honeywell turned to the specification and figures therein to support the proposition that the " filter(s) may be either in front of the local color display or within the display." Id. at 10 (emphasis added); see also id. at 10-11 (comparing '914 patent , figure 1 showing filter 23 in front of 17, the local color display, with '914 patent, figure 3 showing filters 61, 62, and 63 within 37, the local color display).

At the claim construction hearing, initially Honeywell requested the court construe only the words "display system." TR at 126 ("I think perhaps on reflection the two terms, the two words that should be construed are 'display system.' "). After further inquiry by the court, Honeywell decided to request construction of "display system," as well as the remainder of the preamble language common to both Claims 1 and 2:

> THE COURT: So you're arguing that the words that now-you want to argue just about the words " display system" and not the rest?
> *431 HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: We are arguing ... in our position on the whole preamble, the word-we're going to take display system first, and then address how it's implicated in the balance of the preamble[.]

TR at 128 (emphasis added). Thereafter, Honeywell argued that "display system" means "the entire combination ... [rather than being] confined to the two components[.]" TR at 129. In that regard, Honeywell argued "[t]hat display has to be a local color display or the local source of light, and it's got to have a night vision aid." TR at 152.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

During post-hearing briefing, Honeywell argued that "display system" should be construed in accord with the ordinary meaning of "a system that includes a display or display functionality." 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 12 (emphasis added) and n.2 (citing Ieee Dictionary; PMX 28 at 264, 915; Lockheed PPT at 70-72); see also DMX 36 at D000087 (citing prosecution history where examiner construed "display system" to refer to a system having a "plurality of CRT's"); PMX 44 at 5:35 (Miller, '562 patent) ("display system" refers to "a system that includes a color CRT display and a contrast enhancement filter."). At this juncture, however, Honeywell appeared no longer to be arguing that a "display system" included both a night vision aid and a local color display, but only a "display or display functionality." Compare 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 8-9 with 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 12.

b. The Government's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

The Government's pre-hearing brief represented that the preamble language "establishes that this display system is comprised of two or more filters and not [the night vision goggles] and the local color display." 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 8-9 (citing Ex. 1 '914 patent, col. 5, ll. 31-33 and col. 6, ll. 11-14). The Government also asserted that the '914 patent specification supported its construction, because the "Background of the Invention" section of the specification provided that: "[t]he invention relates to electronic passive night vision aids and to a system for operating such night vision aids in conjunction with a local display such as a cockpit display." Id. at 9-10 (emphasis added) referring to '914 patent, col. 1, ll. 19-21. In addition, the " Summary of the Invention" section of the specification provided that: "In accordance with the present invention, an ANVIS aid, such as an ANVIS goggles set, is provided with an optical filter. A second optical filter blocking light in an opposite sense from the first optical filter is placed over displays, which may otherwise present light that would interfere with the ANVIS." '914 patent, col. 2, ll. 11-15 (emphasis added).

The Government further advised the court that the prosecution history established that the original '914 patent described an invention with "full color display which uses separate primary color light sources is made compatible with an ambient night vision (ANVIS) aid." Ex. 7 '914 Wrapper D0005. During prosecution, however, Honeywell distinguished the '914 patent invention from prior art representing that: "In order to enable highly-sensitive night vision (ANVIS) goggles to be operated in an environment having full color displays, it is necessary to provide a technique to protect the ANVIS goggles .... The present invention accomplishes that by filtering the display light with optical filters and by providing an additional optical filter at the night vision aid." Ex. No. 7 '914 Wrapper D000109 (emphasis added).

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, the Government stated that it was seeking construction of more than " display system," but rather the phrase "display system for use in association with[.]" TR at 165.

> GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: [T]he display system is clearly the noun .... I think the "for use in association with" defines a separate clause that is a description 432 of the intended use of the display system and nothing more.
>
> THE COURT: Well, what do you do with the " including" phrase?
>
> GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Well, we believe that the "including" phrase, including a local source of light refers explicitly to the local color display. So the local color display includes a local source of light [.] ... The specification makes very clear that the "including" phrase refers to the local color display, and not to the display system[.] ... Let's go to the specification.... It states that, and it uses the phrase "system." " The invention relates to an electronic passive night vision aids and to a system for operating such night vision aids in conjunction with a local display, such as a cockpit display ['914 patent, col. 1, ll. 19-21]." ... the system is something that brings them together[.]

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

During post-hearing briefing, the Government conceded that "display system" means "two or more filters," but that the "proper construction of 'for use in association with' ... shows that the display system, comprising two or more filters, is intended to be used in combination with a night vision aid and a local color display, but that these elements are not part of the claimed invention." 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 13 (emphasis in original). The Government emphasized that the '914 patent specification referred to "system" only once and in a way that supported the Government's construction, i.e., the "Technical Field" portion of " Background of the Invention" stated: "This invention relates to electronic passive night vision aids and to a system for operating such night vision aids in conjunction with a local display such as a cockpit display." DMX 1 ('914 patent, col. 1, ll. 19-21). Accordingly, the Government concluded that this phrase must mean that filters are the only required elements of the invention and that a night vision aid and a local color display are independent devices that operate in conjunction with the display system. See 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 15-16. The Government also urged that during the '914 patent prosecution history, in response to the Examiner's rejection for obviousness in light of USPTO No. 3,517,122 (Maass), Honeywell represented that the '914 patent filters were for a different purpose than generating RBG color signals, i.e., Honeywell filters "provide a technique to protect the ANVIS goggles from the relatively high intensity light produced by the local cockpit displays. The present ['914 patent] invention accomplishes that by filtering the display light with optical filters." 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 16 (citing DMX 7 at DE-328).

c. Intervenor Lockheed Martin's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Lockheed Martin's construction of "display system" was the same as that of the Government. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 8-14.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

The court considered the following colloquy at the claim construction hearing relevant to the court's decision to construe the entire preamble language common to Claim 1 and Claim 2.

> LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: And it's one of the reasons you can't turn to a dictionary definition and say let's take the dictionary definition of system, or let's take the dictionary definition of system as modified by display. You really have to look to a definition of system as modified by display, and is modified by the phrase "for use in association with" a night vision goggle and a local color display, including a local source of light, and that's the only way you can come to a definition, and it's one of the reasons why you can't rely on a dictionary here.

* * * * * *

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: [Honeywell's counsel] in his initial brief indicated that the preamble did not need to be construed because it simply discussed the purpose, if you will, of the invention. I *433 believe he has moved away from the arguments from what I heard today, would indicate that he understands that the preamble does need to be construed[.]

* * * * * *

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: Your Honor, we were discussing the preamble, and you can see from the prosecution history-... the preamble was considered to be a limitation on the claim by Honeywell. Because it's a limitation, it needs to be construed.... [W]e have an extract from the prosecution history where we deal with this issue of indefiniteness that we talked about before.... [T]he words "in association with" to be "in combination with."

THE COURT: Well, this was the patent examiner who felt it was indefinite.

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: Yes, this is the patent examiner finding that it was .... [I]ndefiniteness is one of the first things you look for when you're looking at patent issue, and here they found indefiniteness, and a change was made in the preamble to indicate that the-basically changed it so the preamble read "in combination with a night vision goggle and a local display, a display system comprising."
TR at 186-87.

* * * * * *

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: Also, Honeywell tried to argue around the Patent Office's prior art rejections, and successfully did it by claiming that its display system that was described in the body of the claim was distinct from prior art systems. That's the type of thing that brings the preamble into play as a claim limitation.

* * * * * *

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: [T]he night vision aid and the local color display were essential limitations because, as the patent acknowledges, the claimed novelty of the invention is the combination of filters which make up the display system, with the night vision goggle, and the local color display, and the only reference to night vision goggles and local color display is found in the preamble. The preamble also needs to be-... construed because the preamble is necessary to give life, meaning, and vitality to the claims.

* * * * * *

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: So turning to the specification, there are two pieces of the specification that are relevant to the definition of the display system, and both of those are consistent with the definition that-... in the specification that needs to be considered when looking at the definition of display system, and it is the statement in the specification that you find under the heading "Background of the Invention," which states: "This invention relates to electronic passive night vision aids and to a system for operating such night vision aids in conjunction with a local display such as a cockpit display." My point in quoting this is that this statement support[s] the interpretation that we have been discussing and it shows that there are three parts to this invention: night vision aids, a system for operating those aids, and local displays. So it is a night vision aid and a system that operates those night vision aids in conjunction with a local display such as a cockpit display.... [T]he summary of the invention in the 914 patent, and it provides that, and I quote: "In accordance with the present invention, an ANVIS aid such as an ANVIS goggle set is provided with an optical filter. A second optical filter blocking light in an opposite sense from the first optical filter is placed over the displays which may otherwise present light that would interfere with the ANVIS." So again what we see here is we see a reference to the ANVIS aid in the night vision goggles, a local display, and the filters, each of them forming their own separate

* * * * * *

THE COURT: I'm not sure I read that that way in 44, because it says the present invention basically includes the goggles 434 that have a filter, and then there is a second optical filter blocking light in the opposite direction. I don't read it the way you do. What am I missing?
LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: Well, it says you have with the present invention an ANVIS, such as goggles.
THE COURT: Got it.
LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: Which is provided with an optical filter.
THE COURT: Got it.
LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: Which [are] going to be part of the system.
TR at 198-99.

* * * * * *

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: I am attempting to show that the display system is in fact separate from the local color display, and the night vision goggles, I have a couple more slides along those lines that I would like to show the Court. The first is slide No. 58, and in this slide Honeywell is arguing in response to an action from the Patent Office that its claimed display system was distinct from prior art display systems that were cited when the Patent Office rejected its complaints.
THE COURT: Remind me what year this was that the PTO had this rejection....
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: It's September 9, 1986, and I know we were referring to-I believe Lockheed is also referring to Bates Nos. D000108 to 109, I believe.
THE COURT: Okay. Now, I have on my chronology, see I just did my own little thing, November 13, 1989, I said PTO issued a notice of allowability, and they did that after this episode-GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Right, right.
THE COURT: -in response. Okay.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: That would be right.

* * * * * *

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: So in order to show that their claimed display system was distinct from prior art display systems they argued to the Patent Office. It says, "In order to enable highly sensitive night vision ANVIS goggles to be operated in an environment having full color displays, it is necessary to provide a technique to protect the ANVIS goggles from relatively high intensity light produced by the local cockpit displays." And it goes on and states, "The present invention accomplishes that by filtering the display light with optical filters and providing an additional optical night vision aid. The filter for the night vision aid is adapted to block light from the preferred range of frequencies, thereby effectively blocking out light from the display." So again what this tells us is there is a display, the display is generating light, and their invention says let us filter that light so that we can keep offending light from reaching the night vision goggles. If we turn to slide 59, and here we have-again this is from Exhibit 7, the 914 file history, and the Bates number here is D000110. Honeywell makes another statement to the Patent Office which shows that its display system is operationally separate from the local color display. Here it says, "It is respectfully submitted that the prior art neither shows nor suggests that a multiple monochromatic tube color display be provided with separate filters in order to provide enhanced filtration of multi-color displays." So again what they are saying is is that their invention is to provide this enhanced filtration. This is the filtration that would filter out the offending light from reaching the night vision goggles.
THE COURT: I would read that that their enhancement would be the multiple monochromatic tube color display, which includes-no, no, no-which is provided together with, okay, separate displays, and it's different than what you said.
LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: Well, I would say I was reading it. "Respectfully submit that the prior art neither shows nor suggests that a multiple monochromatic tube color display be provided with separate filters."
THE COURT: What I am saying back to you is what they are saying is that the prior art didn't talk about-

*435 LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: That's correct.

THE COURT: -multiple monochromatic tube color display, but we are now. We meaning-

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: I think if we read this whole thing in context, what I have done is extract something here, we see the whole contact saying-

THE COURT: Right.

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: -that they were dealing with a piece of prior art that had multiple monochromatic displays, and in those monochromatic displays the displays were providing different colors, different primary colors that could be combined, and Honeywell tried to distinguish the prior art by saying, wait a minute, we're not just providing multiple monochromatic displays, we are providing a special filter, separate filters, and those separate filters are to give enhanced filtration of multi-color displays in order to achieve the night vision compatibility goal of the invention.

THE COURT: Let me go back and ask something that may be intuitive to you but not necessarily to me. Was the prior art basically tubes that they put filters on, but tubes that did something else, project the real color?

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: That's correct.

THE COURT: Okay.

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: What the prior art was you had a prior art display which consisted of three monochromatic tubes, each generating a primary color, red, blue, and green.

THE COURT: Okay.

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: And through the electronic signals that went into those tubes you can manipulate the intensity of the color.

THE COURT: And that was the way they wanted to address the issue of the redness?

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: Right, and those three tubes together could give you a full color display....

TR at 208-13.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

After the claim construction hearing, Lockheed Martin advised the court that one of ordinary skill in the art would construe the preamble phrase "display system for use in association with" to mean "two or more filters which are used in combination with a night vision aid, such as night vision goggles ('NVG '), and a local color display, to make the color display compatible with the night vision aid." 4/1/05 Int. Brief at 10. Lockheed Martin maintained that Honeywell "claimed only a filtering system that would render a full color display compatible with NVG." Id. Stated another way, Lockheed Martin contended that Honeywell claimed only: "A (a display system) for use in association with B (a night vision aid) and C (a local color display), comprising: D (a first optical filter or a plurality of filters) and E (a second optical filter or a fourth optical filter)." Id. Honeywell did not claim: "A, comprising: B, C, D, and E." Id.; see also 4/15/05 Int. Brief at 3-8.

In the court's judgment, Lockheed Martin's post claim construction hearing brief best described the dispute over the term "display system." Lockheed Martin argued that Honeywell's construction asserted that "display system consists of the entire cockpit." 4/1/05 Int. Brief at 10. Stated differently, the filters in Honeywell's display system "may make the local color display [not only] compatible with the NVG, [but also] producing red, green, and blue color bands generated by the three light sources that combine to make a full color image." Id. Lockheed Martin argued that "nothing in the claims, the specification[,] or the file history indicate that Honeywell's display system performed any role in the production of the color emitted by the display." Id. at 11.

d. Specific Precedent Governing Construction Of A Patent's Preamble.

[11] The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has instructed federal *436 trial courts that whether a preamble is treated as a limitation is determined "on the facts of each case in light of the claim as a whole and the invention described in the patent." Storage Tech. Corp. v. Cisco Sys., Inc., 329 F.3d 823, 831 (Fed.Cir.2003); see also Corning Glass Works v. Sumitomo Elec. U.S.A., Inc. 868 F.2d 1251, 1257 (Fed.Cir.1989) (reviewing the "entirety of the patent [is necessary] to gain an understanding of what the inventors actually invented and intended to encompass by the claim."); Bell Communications Research, Inc. v. Vitalink Communications Corp., 55 F.3d 615, 620 (Fed.Cir.1995) (A claim preamble has the "import that the claim as a whole suggests for it. In other words, when the claim drafter chooses to use both the preamble and the body to define the subject matter of the claimed invention, the invention so defined, and not some other, is the one the patent protects.").

Where the written description "consistently uses" specific terms to refer to the "invention as a whole, .. . [the] preamble of each claim serves as a convenient label [or descriptive name] for the invention as a whole." Storage Tech., 329 F.3d at 831 (citing IMS Tech., Inc. v. Haas Automation, Inc., 206 F.3d 1422, 1434 (Fed.Cir.2000)) (merely giving a descriptive name to the claimed invention does not limit the scope of the claim). Where the preamble "defines a structurally complete invention in the claim body and uses the preamble only to state a purpose or intended use for the invention," it is not limiting. See Rowe v. Dror, 112 F.3d 473, 478 (Fed.Cir.1997). On the other hand, where there is no "meaningful distinction to be drawn between the claim preamble and the rest of the claim, for only together do they comprise the 'claim. ' ... [T]he preamble ... is said to constitute or explain a claim limitation." Pitney Bowes, 182 F.3d at 1305.

[12] In addition, where claim language derives an antecedent basis from the preamble, it may be considered as a necessary component of the claimed invention. See Catalina Mktg. Int'l, Inc. v. Coolsavings.com, Inc., 289 F.3d 801, 808 (Fed.Cir.2002) (quoting Pitney Bowes, 182 F.3d at 1305) ("In general, a preamble limits the invention if it recites essential structure or steps, or if it is ' necessary to give life, meaning and vitality' to the claim.").

e. The Court's Construction Of "A Display System For Use In Association With A Light Amplifying Passive Night Vision Aid And A Local Color Display, Including A Local Source Of Light, Comprising" In This Case.

[13] In this case, the court has decided to construe all of the operative preamble language common to both Claim 1 and Claim 2 of the '914 patent, i.e., "A display system for use in association with a light amplifying passive night vision aid and a local color display including a local source of light," as necessary to understanding the '914 patent and therefore as a limitation thereof. See Eaton Corp. v. Rockwell Int'l Corp., 323 F.3d 1332, 1339 (Fed.Cir.2003) ("When limitations in the body of the claim rely upon and derive antecedent basis from the preamble, then the preamble may act as a necessary component of the claimed invention.").

The court begins with "system" in the aforementioned phrase modified by the adjective " display" to describe the general purpose or function of the system. The prepositional phrase "for use in connection with," applies to two other nouns that are objects of this phrase, i.e., "aid" and "display." "Light amplifying," "passive" and "night vision" are adjectives modifying "aid." Likewise, "local" and "color" are adjectives modifying "display," when it is used as a noun. The placement of the terms "night vision aid" and "local color display" in the prepositional phrase prior to the verb " comprising" advised one of ordinary skill in the art that the claimed system may include or be used together or in combination with a "night vision aid" and a "local color display." See '914 patent, col. 5, ll. 22-28.

From the use of the verb "comprising," the court also construed the preamble language common to both Claims 1 and 2 as "presumptively open-ended," i.e., encompassing display systems that include a first optical filter, as described, and a second optical filter, as described. See 437Gillette Co. v. Energizer Holdings, Inc.*, 405 F.3d 1367, 1371-72 (Fed.Cir.2005) (Where a claim uses the "word ' comprising' transitioning from the preamble to the body [it] signals that the entire claim is presumptively open-ended.... Because the patentee invoked this open-ended treatment ... the scope of [the] claim ... encompasses all [display systems] satisfying the elements set forth in [each] claim."); see also Crystal Semiconductor Corp. v. TriTech Microelectronics Int'l, Inc., 246 F.3d 1336, 1347 (Fed.Cir.2001) ("When a patent claim uses the word 'comprising' as its transitional phrase, ... [it] creates a presumption that the body of the claim is open. In the parlance of patent law, use of[the] transitional phrase 'comprising' creates a presumption that the recited elements are only a part of the device, and that the claim does not exclude additional, unrecited elements."); Genentech, Inc. v. Chiron Corp., 112 F.3d 495, 501 (Fed.Cir.1997) (" 'Comprising' is a term of art used in claim language which means that the named elements are essential, but other elements may be added."); Manual of Patent Examining Procedure § 2111.03 (8th ed.2001) ("MPEP"). In addition, the court has determined that the '914 patent optical filters are "essential elements" thereof and that a night vision aid and local color display may be included or used together or in combination with these filters. See '914 patent, col. 5, l. 31. Claim 2 encompassed all display systems "comprising" a plurality of three filters, as described, and a fourth filter, as further described. See '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 12-28.

Therefore, the court construes the operative preamble language as follows:

> A system comprised of optical filters that can be used in combination with an aid, with light amplifying, passive, and night vision qualities, and a display of colors that includes a source of light perceptible by the night vision aid.

See Pitney Bowes, 182 F.3d at 1306 ("If the claim preamble, when read in the context of the entire claim, recites limitations of the claim, or, if the claim preamble is 'necessary to give life, meaning, and vitality' to the claim, then the claim preamble should be construed as if in the balance of the claim. ").

Since the court has determined that the preamble language common to Claims I and 2 is unambiguous and not contradicted by the specification, the court rejects Honeywell's entreaty that it consider extrinsic evidence to interpret this claim, including the Ieee Dictionary and the testimony of the experts. See, e.g., 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 9-11; 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 12; 4/15/05 Honeywell Brief at 1.

2. "Local" And "Color Display."

[14] The term "local color display" appears in the preamble to Claim 1: "A display system for use in association with ... local color display including [.]" '914 patent, col. 5, ll. 31-32. The preamble to Claim 2 also utilizes the same language. See '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 11-13. In addition, in Claim 1(a), the '914 patent discusses "local color display" in the first two lines: "a first optical filter that filters light from the local color display [.]" '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 1-2. Claim 2(a)(1) also discusses "local color display" as "a plurality of filters at the local color display [.]" '914 patent, col. 6, 1. 15.

The parties have proposed the following competing constructions of the term "local color display:"

Honeywell's Proposed Construction	Defendants' Proposed Construction
Local: located in the vicinity of the night vision aid	Local color display: a functional device in proximity to an operator or an observer within a defined area, such as a cockpit, that presents information in a visual format in more than one perceptible color

a. Honeywell's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Honeywell's pre-hearing brief requested a separate construction of the word "local" and the term "color display," because "[t]he problem addressed by the '914 patent is interference between a full color display and a night vision aid ... [and][s]uch interference occurs 438 only when the full color display is operated in the vicinity of the night vision aid [,] ... [accordingly, the court was advised that] the most appropriate construction for local is located in the vicinity of the night vision aid." See 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 11 (quoting '914 patent , col. 2, ll. 1-3) (emphasis in original) ("[A] night vision aid such as ANVIS goggles [is to] be operable while a full color display is presented in the vicinity of the goggles[.]").

Honeywell criticized the Government's proposed construction of "local, as incorporated in its construction of local color display, [because] [f]irst, in the context of the patent, local means in the vicinity of the night vision aid, not in the vicinity of an operator or observer." Id. at 12 (emphasis in original) (citing Dr. Tannas). Second, the court was warned that the Government's proposed construction "introduces an unnecessary and extraneous requirement, namely that the local color display be 'within a defined area, such as a cockpit. ' Nothing in the language of the claims requires this limitation." Id. (emphasis in original). Honeywell insisted that "[t]he claims are broad enough to encompass a local color display that is used in the vicinity of a night vision aid, but necessarily not in a defined area, such as a cockpit." Id. (emphasis in original). Moreover, Honeywell cited the specification as instructing that " 'the present invention can be used by other viewers in association with environments other than an aircraft cockpit' without placing any limitation on the type of environment in which the invention can be used." Id. (citing '914 patent, col. 2, ll. 49-59) (emphasis in original).

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, Honeywell's counsel pointed out that the term "local" appears " twice in the preamble, first, to modify color display, to make it a local color display, and second, to modify source of light, to make it a local source of light." TR at 224. Honeywell's counsel further explained:

> HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: The normal rule for claim terms is that the same term gets the same construction each time it appears in the claim. Therefore, Honeywell took the approach to define local for all purposes. The only exception to that rule is where the specification or elsewhere in the intrinsic evidence the patentee clearly indicated that the term should have a different meaning in different contexts, and because we didn't see that in the claim, we defined local by itself to have the same meaning in each phrase. The Defendants, on the other hand, construed local color display and local source of light.... They say that local is in proximity to an operator or observer within a defined area such as a cockpit. But Honeywell's position is local is simply located in the vicinity of the night vision aid.

THE COURT: Why does it make a difference to you?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: I'm not sure why it makes a difference. We tried to define the term as we thought it-in accordance with the meaning given to it in the patent. Local does have a unique meaning in the patent. The whole patent is talking about the relationship between the light emitted from a display, and the night vision aid, and the light interferes with the night vision aid. The invention solves that problem.

So local has the meaning of location, where are things located.

THE COURT: In relationship to something.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: In relationship to something. I think the key here is the relationship between where the display is located in relation to the night vision aid. The operator, well, yes, the operator might be wearing night vision goggles, so that might be the same definition, but it might not in all cases. For example, if the display is located in the rear of the aircraft where there are no night vision goggles, but there is an operator viewing the display, then it wouldn't make sense to define local for local color display as being near an operator because that is not what's meant by the patent.

THE COURT: So if the operator is someplace totally different, then you don't-

*439 HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: That's right.

THE COURT: Obviously your patent is not going to be relevant-

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: That's right.

THE COURT: -to that fellow in the back seat.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Precisely. It's just as simple as that. We tried to define it as we understood the patent. So the first issue is ... does local have a different meaning in those two phrases. Honeywell's answer to that is no, it has the same meaning. The second issue is does local, is that in relation to the night vision aid or the operator or the observer? And Honeywell's answer to that is it's in relation to the night vision aid. And the third question is, is local limited to a defined area such as a cockpit? And we think the term is not so limited.... I don't think Defendants have pointed to any place in the intrinsic evidence to indicate that the term should have a different meaning and a different-

THE COURT: But how does it harm you if I construe the language the way that the Defendant wishes to have it construed?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: I think it's-I'm not sure what they are trying to accomplish by "in proximity to an operator" or-

THE COURT: Well, ... I'm just asking you does it make any difference to you.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Not that I know of, but I don't want to have it misconstrued because I don't know what's coming down the pike. And within a defined area though, such as a cockpit, I think that does harm us, because I don't think the invention is limited to cockpit applications.

THE COURT: Give me an example.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: An example would be-we gave the example later in our presentation of a foot soldier carrying a PDA and wearing night vision goggles, so there is light from the display.

THE COURT: All right, I need a PDA definition here.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Personal computer, like a palm pilot or-

THE COURT: Oh, okay, got it. All right. So he's carrying a palm pilot with his goggles on.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Right, and he's in a open area. There is no confined area such as a cockpit.... Like a handheld GPS as an example, Your Honor.

THE COURT: Okay, so?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: I mean, in this case we're not aware of any such-

THE COURT: But that circumstance has nothing to do with your patent.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Well, as far as we know reading the claims, it would have something to do with the patent.

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

THE COURT: Why? You don't have the two pieces that you're looking for, the display system.
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: The display would be the PDA, the palm pilot with the screen that's lite, and light coming out of that display.
THE COURT: And you're saying ... there is no filter on that, and there is nothing inside the machine that-HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Well, you certainly could put the night vision filter concept in a PDA. There is nothing in the claim that says you couldn't. Just because the example is given in the patent of a cockpit and a pilot-
THE COURT: That's a much broader reading of display[.]
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: I don't think-
THE COURT: The display was the box. I mean, I'm pretty sure that's exactly the way you defined it. Here is the display.
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: We were talking about display system being-
THE COURT: Yes.
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: -a comprehensive system.
THE COURT: Right.
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: That included the display, and the night vision aid, and the filters. But the local color display is just that. It's a color display. It has to 440 have more than one color. It has to display information to a viewer, and local places it in the vicinity of a night vision aid. But other than that the claim isn't limited. It doesn't say cockpit display. It isn't necessarily an instrument that's in an airplane.
THE COURT: Well, that went to ... my question about who was the person that's skilled in the art.
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Well, the history of the invention definitely goes back to aircraft and aviation.
THE COURT: I don't have any trouble with that, but I guess I-I'm having difficulty foreseeing whatever claims you may want to assert that may not even be in this case that are broader.
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: But technology expands. Somebody invented the personal computer, but nowadays we put computers in everything from dishwashers to microwaves to television. They are all ubiquitous, but that doesn't mean that the core invention of the computer isn't in these various devices. If the claim doesn't say cockpit, it's not limited to a cockpit.

THE COURT: [B]ut one does have some sense about when privilege is given up for a time period from the public to someone, what do they get for that period, and it cannot be the universe. It's got to be something less than the universe, in my view.
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Well, I think we've heard many times from opposing counsel the claims are king, and we agree with that principle, the claims are king.... And one of the concepts that comes out of Federal Circuit case law, the Rennashaw case, for example, stresses the importance that you have to find a word in the claim to define before you can engage in claim construction, and here we're trying to engage in construing the claim "local."
THE COURT: Yes.
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: And local certainly pertains to location, and where things are located in relationship to one another, but I don't believe there is anything in the claim that limits the invention to a cockpit.
THE COURT: Okay.... My local was not in relation to cockpit, it was a relationship to the pilot itself. I mean, without the pilot there is no-none of the rest of this makes much difference.
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: But I think it does as Mr. Brafman's example pointed out because the night vision aid could be hooked up remote to a remote viewer, and he could be viewing the area outside whatever confined area he happens to be in.

TR at 236-38; see also TR at 248.

In addition, Honeywell objected to the Government's proposed construction utilizing the words "visual" with "format," "functional" with " device," and "perceptible" with "color."

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: So Honeywell's construction for color display alone is a device that provides visual representation of data using more than one color, and Defendants have modified that construction, and the portion of their construction that pertains to the color display is a functional device that presents information in a visual format in more than one perceptible color. So as you can see, there are not great differences between those two definitions. However, what Honeywell takes issue with is the addition of the words "functional " to modify "device," and the addition of the word "perceptible" to modify the word "color." We think those words are extraneous, and unnecessary to define what the claim terms.

THE COURT: How is perceptible extraneous?
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: We believe a color is inherently perceptible. Color pertains to human vision. Without the human there would be no color. The world doesn't know color without the human, and the human visual system, and therefore perception .... We also rely on Dr. Task's definition in his expert report and in his direct. The definition did not 441 change. He defined color as a display presenting more than one color. He did not believe it was necessary to insert the word "perceptible." He did agree with it once Defendants adopted that, but he didn't believe it was necessary when he first defined it.
THE COURT: And functional, you disagree with that because you think that's redundant of device?
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Right, a device-
THE COURT: Because a device is inherently functional?
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: -is inherently functional, right.
TR at 240-42.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

During post-hearing briefing, Honeywell's briefs appeared to abandon arguing that "local" required construction separate from "color display" and, instead, moved to focus on "whether the starting period for filtering is inside or outside the local color display." 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 23. Here, Honeywell maintained that "[a]ll that is required is that you have 'light from the local color display' and a 'first optical filter' that filters such light [.]" Id. By shifting the argument to the location of the filters rather than construing the term "local color display," Honeywell failed to provide the court with any meaningful guidance as to the meaning of "local color display," other than to state: "in the case of the '914 patent, there is clear disclosure of filters located inside the local color display." Id. at 24 (emphasis in original). The court was advised, however, that "[s]uch filters filter light 'from the local color display,' even though the starting point for filtering is not external to the local color display, nor has the light left the local color display before it is filtered." Id. In addition, Honeywell asserted that "nothing in the language of the claims or the written description permits the court to limit the scope of claim 1 to the Figure 1 embodiment, in which a first optical filter 23 is 'located in front of local display 17.' " Id. at 25.

b. The Government's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

The Government's pre-hearing brief advised the court that one of ordinary skill in the art would conclude that the court should adopt the Government's proposed construction that a "local color display" is a "functional device that presents information in a visual format[,]" a fact the Government represented that Honeywell does not contest. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 15 (citing 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 12). In support, the Government cites the portion of the '914 patent specification that instructed: "Figure 3 shows an arrangement in which the local source of light 50 comprises red 51, green 52, and blue 53 color bands sourced from the monochromatic display transducers." '914 patent, col. 4, ll. 40-48; but compare '914 patent, col. 1, ll. 25-26 ("It is intended that the local display may be viewed either with or without the night vision aid in use.") with id. ll. 42-48 ("A local color display ... is also viewable by the crewmember ... the local display is intended to be viewable without the aid of the ANVIS.") with '914 patent, col. 2, l. 57 (emphasis added) ("The cockpit has several local displays such as color display[.]"). The prosecution history indicated that the "local color display" may be "a full color cathode ray tube display." Ex. 7 '914 Wrapper D000018, ll. 35-36; see also Ex. 8 '760 Application D001179, ll. 29-30. In fact, Figure 3 of the specification depicts CRTs that provide "a monochromatic image ... for full color display, which appears on a front screen as a combined full color image." 442

Therefore, the Government assured the court that " the proper reference point for 'local' ... is the observer." 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 15. But, the Government also argued that " 'local' refers to the location of the display within the cockpit such that it is visible with or without the use of ANVIS." Id. (citing '914 patent, col. 2, ll. 46-48, 58-59; col. 1, ll. 41-46) (emphasis added). The Government concluded that "one of ordinary skill in the art could understand that a local color display must be within a defined area for an operator or observer to view and to act upon, if necessary, the data and information produced by the local color display." 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 15 (emphasis added).

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, the Government continued to argue that "local" means in reference to a human observer.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: The differences are for local, what the reference point for vicinity is, and for color display, the functional and the perceptible. And we don't think that any of these terms are necessarily superfluous. We don't think that they are wrong. With respect to local, we believe that the correct reference point is the observer. This is straight out of the patent specification, and specifically out of the specification where it states that the local color display, ... needs to be visible to a viewer. So for example, the first section I cited here, which is column 2, lines 46 through 48, says that "The local display is intended to be viewable without the aid of the ANVIS," referring to, of course, as I spoke about before, the goggle sits in front of the eyes but not against the eyes so you can look around the goggles, so you can look down and see the display. The second provision is, "The cockpit has several local displays, such as a local color display, which are illuminated so as to be clearly visible without the use of ANVIS." Again, it makes it clear that the observer is the one that's going to be looking at the displays. So the reference point is again the observer. And finally, the last provision says, "It is important that the display indicators remain illuminated not only for the benefit of the crewmen who are not wearing night vision aids, but also because those using the goggles will typically view the instruments by looking under the goggles." And again this just recognizes the point that the observer is going to be viewing the display without the goggle. So really what should be important is whether the viewer is local to the display and not the goggle, because if the viewer is not *443 local to the display, he can't view it anyway.

* * * * * *

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: [W]e believe Honeywell's construction runs counter to the expressed purposes of the patent, which is to get a full color display which you can view without the goggles, and it doesn't overwhelm you [sic] goggles. So you want to be able to look around your goggles and see a full color display. If it wasn't important for the observer to be able to look at a display without the goggles and see color, then you wouldn't have any reason to have this patent.

* * * * * *

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: We think it's clear that local refers to a defined area. It doesn't have to be a cockpit enclosure. It could be some other defined area. But we believe that local carries with it the implication that there is a defined area. The phrase from the patent that was recited, it's column 2, lines 53 through 54, I believe, "The present invention can be used by other viewers in association with environments other than an aircraft cockpit." We believe that phrase-that term "environment" also implies that there is a recognized environment. There is a recognized region around the observer and the display that local implies. So it's a defined area, whether it's an environment, whether it's an enclosure, whether it's a cockpit, but we believe that all of this comes out of the clear meaning of local. If the Court is satisfied, I'll turn to perceptible in the color display. We don't believe the perceptible before color is superfluous. The whole point is having a full color display meaning it has to show more than one color. If the colors are not perceptibly different, then it doesn't look like a color display. It looks like a monochrome display. That's the only reason ... perceptible is in there. It's not superfluous, and it just shows that the colors need to be perceptibly different. And then finally, going back to the functional language, we don't believe that is superfluous either. As we discussed before with respect to display system, the-I'm sorry-as related to the display system, the color display has to be functional apart from Honeywell's proposed system. So saying it's a functional device implies that it is functional on its own. It doesn't require the patent to perform its function.

TR at 246-47.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

The Government's post-claim construction brief conceded that "local" means "in proximity to," but that the display should be proximate to an observer or operator, despite the fact that Honeywell maintained that "local" means in proximity to the location of the night vision aid. See 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 20. Since the specification clearly indicated that local color display may be seen by a crewmember not wearing night vision goggles, the Government argues that Honeywell's proposed construction is wrong. Id.; see also id. at 21 (citing '914 patent, col. 1, ll. 41-46) ("[I]t is important that the display indicators remain illuminated, not only for the benefit of the crewmen who are not wearing night vision aids, but also because those using the goggles will typically view the instruments by looking under the goggles.").

c. Intervenor Lockheed Martin's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Lockheed Martin's construction of "local color display" was the same as that of the Government. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 14-16.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, Lockheed Martin disagreed with Honeywell's explanation that "local is used differently when it's referring to the local display and local source of light ... the ordinary, customary meaning of local source of light is that the local source of light must be part of the local *444 color display." TR at 253. As for the specification, it teaches that the "original Figure 3 ... shows the local source of light as being integral to the local color display." TR at 257. In sum, the claims and specification "lead to the conclusion that local source of light must mean that ... it is integral to and part of the local color display." TR at 257.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

After the claim construction hearing, Lockheed Martin advised the court that the " '914 patent's claims do not expressly define the proper reference point for the local color display.... A review of the specification establishes, however, that the reference point for the 'local' is the observer and not simply the night vision aid." 4/1/05 Int. Brief at 24. Subsequently, Lockheed Martin appeared to move to seek a construction of a different phrase, " light from the local color display." 4/15/05 Int. Brief at 12. In that regard, Lockheed Martin argued that Claim 1 "applies to filters located outside of the [local color display] and Claim 2 applies to filters located inside the display." Id. at 13.

d. The Court's Construction Of "Local Color Display" In This Case.

The court has declined to construe the word "local" in the abstract. Construing an adjective without the object noun provides no guidance to the parties or the public as to how the court has determined the legal parameters of the '914 patent subject matter.

i. In The Preambles To Claim 1 And Claim 2.

The court has determined that a "local color display" is a device that may be used together or in combination with optical filters, i.e., "a display system." See '914 patent, col. 5, l. 31; see also '914 patent, col. 6, l. 13. In the preamble language common to Claims 1 and 2, a "local color display" is also one that shows or exhibits at least one color perceptible to an observer or observers who may be located near or in proximity to the "local display system." Since a display system would be irrelevant without an observer or observers capable of perceiving the display, necessarily a "local color display" also must be perceptible to an observer or observers, i.e., one utilizing a night vision aid. Therefore, the court construes "local color display" as:

> A device that may be used together or in combination with optical filters and shows or exhibits at least one color perceptible to an observer or observers utilizing a night vision aid.

This construction is not contradicted by the specification. See '914 patent, col. 2, ll. 46-48 and 58-59 (emphasis added) ("as the local color display is intended to be viewable"); see also '914 patent, col. 1, ll. 63-64 ("filtration of light according to wavelengths generally permits the use of full color displays").

ii. In Claim 1(a).

Claim 1(a) describes "a first optical filter that filters light from the local color display." '914 patent, col. 6 ll. 1-2 (emphasis added). The court does not construe this language to limit the location of the " first optical filter" 23, described in Claim 1(a), to a location external to the "local color display." Id. The "first optical filter," whether located internal to or external to the "local color display" is included in the claimed invention. Id.

iii. In Claim 2(a).

In Claim 2(a), a "local color display" includes a source of light having blue, red and green color bands. See '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 13-14. Therefore, the court construes "local color display" in Claims 2 and 2(a) to include a source of light presenting at least one or more colors. See '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 12, 15. Similar to the "first optical filter" in Claim 1(a), the "plurality of filters at the local color display" is not limited to a location internal or external to the local color display. See '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 15-22. The plurality of filters, whether located internal or external to the "local color display," is included in the claimed invention. Id.

Since the court has determined that claim term " local color display" is unambiguous and not contradicted by the specification, the 445 court considers it unnecessary to consider any extrinsic testimony regarding the meaning of "local color display."

3. "Local" And "Source of Light."

[15] The term "local source of light" appears in the preambles to Claim 1 and Claim 2 to describe part of the "local color display." See '914 patent , col. 5, l. 33; '914 patent, col. 6, l. 13.

The parties have proposed the following competing constructions of "local source of light:"

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

Honeywell's Proposed Construction	Defendants' Proposed Construction
Source of Light: device that emits electromagnetic radiation within the visible spectrum and may also emit infrared radiation	A local source of light: the integral element of the local color display that provides the light that enables the display to be seen by the human eye

Honeywell Markman Slide 73; Gov't Markman Slide 012 (bold added by parties).

a. Honeywell's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Honeywell's pre-hearing brief represented that " [t]he term light usually refers to electro-magnetic radiation in the visible spectrum." 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 13 (citing Webster's at 1308) (emphasis in original). In addition, Honeywell asserted that "it is clear that the source of light may also emit infrared radiation, i.e., longer wavelengths of electromagnetic radiation that are invisible." 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 14 (emphasis in original) (citing '914 patent, col. 1, ll. 38-40). The specification language cited by Honeywell, however, provides: "illumination from cockpit display sources overwhelms sensor elements which are used in such night vision aids, and thereby interrupts the night vision aid for up to several minutes. " '914 patent, col. 1, ll. 37-40. The remainder of Honeywell's pre-hearing brief weaved in extrinsic evidence, particularly that of Dr. Task, to persuade the court that "the claim states that the local color display includes the local source of light, [and therefore], it is superfluous to specify that it is integral with the display." 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 14-15 (emphasis in original).

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, Honeywell continued to argue that the "ordinary meaning of source of light does not require ... that it be an integral element of the local color display." TR at 250-51.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: So now I'll go to source of light, and this again is in the preamble, and Honeywell again has construed the term " source of light," and Defendants have construed the entire phrase "local source of light." And here the key difference between the parties' proposed constructions is the requirements in Defendant's construction that the local source of light be an integral element of the local color display.

* * * * * *

THE COURT: Well, I would think the "local," going back to your prior discussion, would be the focus for you.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: But once again, there is no indication in the patent that the term " local" when it modifies color display has a different meaning from when it modifies source of light, and the principle is that when the same term is used in different places in the patent, it has to be given the same meaning, and I don't believe Defendants have tied integral to local. They haven't come out and construed local differently when it comes to local source of light. I think what they rely on is the term "includes," but includes is not limited to a device that is integral. It has to include it. It has to be part of it, but it need not be integral. I don't believe Defendants have pointed to anything in the claim language itself or the specification that requires that the source of light be integral with the local color display, so it's a narrow difference.

During rebuttal, Honeywell's counsel argued:

> *446 HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: [T]hey say, " The ordinary and customary meaning of local source of light is the local source of light be part of the local color display." And Honeywell agrees with that, and we would accept that as the construction. And then ... with Figure 3, first of all, to address the new matter argument, the examiner approved the amendment of Figure 3, and held it was not new matter, so I think that's a red herring. Then we believe Defendants make irreconcilably different arguments with respect to these two figures. First, when they are talking about filter 61, 62, 63, they say those are functionally distinct from the local color display. But then when it comes to the local source of light, 51, 52, 53, they say those are integral with the local color display. We accept that both are integral. However, this is only one embodiment of the invention. The claims are not limited either to integral filters or integral source of [light]. But the Defendant[s'] arguments can't be reconciled, and do not support reading the term " integral" into "local source of light" because this is only one embodiment of the invention.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

In post-claim construction hearing briefs, Honeywell reminded the court that Claim 1(a) does not require that "the starting point for filtering the source of light ... is the local color display." 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 23. Instead, Honeywell argued that the claim is satisfied whether the "starting point for filtering is inside or outside the local color display. All that is required is that you have 'light from the local color display' and a 'first optical filter' that filters such light[.]" Id. Figures 2 and 3 demonstrate that filters 61, 62, and 63 are located inside the local color display 37 filtering light "from the local color display." Id. at 24. Therefore, Honeywell concluded that "nothing in the language of the claims or written description permits the court to limit the scope of Claim 1(a) to the Figure 1 embodiment, in which a first optical filter 23 is ' located in front of the local display 17.' " Id. at 25 (citing '914 patent, col. 3., 1. 15); see also 4/15/05 Honeywell Brief at 8. In fact, Figures 2 and 3 show that the filtering is done within the local color display. See 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 24.

b. The Government's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

The Government countered that one of ordinary skill in the art would conclude that the "local source of light is an integral part of the local color display .. .. Honeywell's [use] of the word 'including,' ... indicates that [Honeywell] intended for the local source of light to be part of, and not external to, the local color display[.]" 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 17. The Government relied on two portions of the specification in support. Id. at 17 (citing '914 patent, col. 3, ll. 9-10 ("it may be necessary to filter light from the local light source 50 of the display[.]")); see also id. (citing '914 patent, figure 3 (showing the local source of light 50 as being within the display)).

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, the Government deferred to the argument of Lockheed Martin. See TR at 257, 11. 18-23.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

The Government's initial post-hearing brief urged the court to construe "local source of light" to mean "the integral element of the local color display that provides the light that enables the display to be seen by the human eye." 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 21. In doing so, the Government appeared to abandon prior reliance on specification requirements in column 3, ll. 9-10, and instead argued that "[the] proposed construction arises from the plain language of the claim: The preambles of both claims state that the local display includes-i.e., has an integral part-a local source of light nothing more is necessary [.]" 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 22. The Government also argued that Honeywell adopted the Government's construction at the claim construction*447 hearing. Id. (citing TR at 258) (Honeywell's Counsel: "The local source of light [must] be part of the local color display. Honeywell agrees with that, and we would accept that as the construction. We accept that both [the filters and local source of light] are integral.").

c. Intervenor Lockheed Martin's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

In the pre-hearing brief, Lockheed Martin's construction of "local source of light" was the same as that of the Government. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 17-18.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, Lockheed Martin warned the court that:

> LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: [T]he cases indicate look at words in context, look at the totality of the words to arrive at a meaning. And when you look at the totality ... here you are going to find that local is used differently when it's referring to the local display and the local source of light. And we are focusing on the definition of "local" when we talk about local source of light.... [T]he ordinary, customary meaning of local source of light is that the local source of light must be part of the local color display.

* * * * * *

> LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: If we turn to the specification, ... we see ... new Figure 3 on the right, new Figure 3, that is, is the Figure 3 that appears in the 914 patent as opposed to the original application. And we have the description that new Figure 3 shows an arrangement in which the local source of light comprises red, blue, and green color bands sourced from monochromatic display transducers such as the three cathoid ray tubes which are used to provide a color display. We heard earlier today from [Honeywell's counsel] ... that the local source of light, that source of light was part of that display, was in that display. Certainly if we look to the original Figure 3 ... we find that the local source of light, which are the catho[de] ray tubes 51, 52, and 53. They are integral to or part of that local display. It's important to look at this original figure because ... Tanden Corporation ... basically holds that amendments to a patent cannot change the disclosure in any way contrary to its substance as filed. So when the Court looks at the prosecution history, looks at the different drawings, what you have to do is consider them in light of the original application.

TR at 254-55.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Lockheed Martin's initial post-hearing brief represented that one of ordinary skill in the art would conclude that "local source of light" means " the integral element of the local color display that provides the light that enables the display to be seen by the human eye." 4/1/05 Int. Brief at 26. The court also was advised that the specification does not show that Honeywell defined this term differently. See '914 patent, col. 3, 11. 9-10 ("it may be necessary to filter light from the source 50 of the display[.]"). Lockheed Martin also made no further argument about the meaning of "local source of light." See 4/15/05 Int. Brief at i.

d. The Court's Construction Of "Local Source Of Light" In This Case.

For the reasons previously discussed, the court has declined to construe the word "local" in the abstract. Construing an adjective without the object noun provides no guidance to the parties or the public as to how the court has determined the legal parameters of the '914 patent subject matter.

The court has determined, in the preamble language common to Claims 1 and 2, that "local source of light" as:

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

An essential element of the local color display that must be perceptible to an observer or observers with a night vision aid.

448 This construction is not contradicted by the specification. See '914 patent, col. 2, ll. 46-48; see also '914 patent, col. 1, ll. 63-64.

4. "Optical Filter" And "Filter."

The parties have agreed that the terms "optical filter " and "filter," when used as nouns in the claims of the '914 patent, mean "a device that selectively passes and blocks electromagnetic radiation." FN10 The parties agree that "filters" (plural), when used as a noun, means two or more filters.

FN10. The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit recently observed in Nellcor Puritan Bennett, Inc. v. Masimo Corp., 402 F.3d 1364, 1367 (Fed.Cir.2005) that the Authoritative Dictionary of the Instruments of Electrical and Electronics Engineers Standard Terms 435 (7th ed.2000) lists eight different meanings for " filter" when this word is used as a noun.

5. "Filters" And "Filtering."

The parties have agreed that the terms "filter" and " filtering," when used as verbs in the claims of the '914 patent, mean "selectively to allow (or allowing) light to pass and be blocked." Jt. Stip. ¶ 2.

6. "Filters Light From The Local Color Display."

[16] In Claim 1(a), "a first optical filter" is described as one that "filters light from the local color display." '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 1 and 2. No other claim recites this specific language.

The parties have proposed the following competing constructions of "filters light from the local color display":

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

Honeywell's Proposed Construction	Defendants' Proposed Construction
Filters light from the local color display: No further construction is necessary. To the extent this phrase needs to be construed at all, it should be construed as follows: "filters light coming from the local source of light that is part of the local color display and the filtered light is transmitted from the local color display."	Filters light from the local color display: the starting point for filtering the source of light is the local color display

Honeywell Markman Slide 91; Gov't Markman Slide 021 (bold added by parties).

a. Honeywell's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

In Honeywell's pre-hearing brief, the court was advised that the proposed construction of "filters light from the local color display" is consistent with the plain meaning of the claim and specification and that nothing therein requires that the starting point for filtering the source of light occur at the "local color display." See 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 19. The court was warned that it would be improper to limit Claim 1 to "embodiments wherein the optical filter is 'located in front of the display' or 'is placed over displays.' " 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 20 (citing '914 patent, col. 3, ll. 15-16; see also '914 patent, col. 2, l. 13).

The specification's use of the phrase "light ... from the local color display" includes the embodiment of Figure 2 that shows local color display 37, without any filter in front of the display. Id. at 20. Honeywell also argued that Figure 3 shows "the same local color display 37 as shown in Figure 2, but in more detail." Id. (citing '914 patent, col. 4, ll. 44-46). And, Figure 3 shows that "light from the local color display 37 is filtered by filters 61, 62, and 63, all of which are 'part of and located within the local color display.' " Id. at 20. In addition, the specification described the filtering in Figure 3 uses the same language as Claim 1(a), i.e., "a filter 61, such as a band pass filter, may be used with CRT 51 so that any light within a narrow range of frequencies may be transmitted from the local color display 37." Id. (emphasis added) (citing '914 patent, col. 4, ll. 49-57). Accordingly, Honeywell concluded that the specification is clear that filtering light from the local color display does not require an external filter in front of or over the local color display or that the starting point for filtering is the local color display. Id.

449 ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, Honeywell reiterated that:

> HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: The plaintiff's primary position is that [this] term ["filters light from the local color display"] does not require any construction whatsoever.... If it does need to be construed, it has got to mean at least what we say .... So the plain meaning of the claim then is clear from its face and there is no reason to rewrite the English here, Your Honor. We have light from the local color display and we have a first optical filter that filters light and that's exactly what the claim says. Nothing in the claim places that filter anywhere.

TR at 329; see also TR at 331.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

After the claim construction hearing, Honeywell continued to argue that the phrase "filters light from the local color display" in Claim 1 does not require that the local color display be the "starting point" for filtering light. See 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 23. Instead, Honeywell advised the court that this claim only required that there be "light from the local display" and a "first optical filter" that filters that light. The starting point for filtering may be either inside or outside the local color display. Id. In support, Honeywell emphasized that Figure 2, showing a local color display at 37, and Figure 3, showing the filters at 61, 62, and 63 within the display, teach that they all filter light "from the local color display, the starting point for filtering is not external to the local color display and the light is filtered before it exits the local color display." 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 23-24.

In addition, Honeywell disputed defendants' dictionary definition of "from" to require that the first optical filter must filter light that has left the color display. See 4/15/05 Honeywell Brief at 8. Instead, Honeywell suggested that an alternative definition that designated the "source or origin" of light as the color display. Id. at 8-9. Honeywell also relied on specification language instructing that "a filter 61 ... may be used with CRT 51 so that only light with a narrow range of frequencies may be transmitted from the local color display 37." Id. at 9 (citing '914 patent, col. 4, ll. 54-57). In addition, Figure 3 teaches that the starting point of the color band is not the local color display, but filter 61 inside the local color display. Id. Therefore, Honeywell disputed defendant's attempt to limit Claim 1 to Figure 1 since the phrase "from the local color display" is used to describe Figure 2 and Figure 3. Id.

b. The Government's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

The Government, in its pre-claim hearing brief, conceded that the '914 patent "indicates that some of the filters for its display system will be placed external to the local color display and thereby filter light from the local display." 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 24 (citing '914 patent, col. 3, ll. 15-24) (" first optical filter is placed over displays"); see also '914 patent, col. 2, ll. 10-15 (emphasis added) ("an [aviator's night vision ("ANV")] aid, such as [a] ... goggles set, is provided with an optical filter. A second optical filter blocking light in an opposite sense from the first optical filter is placed over displays, which may otherwise present light that would interfere with the ANVIS.").

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, the Government's principal focus was the preposition "from" in the phrase: "filters light from the local color display."

> GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: We believe the claim term "from" does need to be construed. It provides structure and function to the claim. There is obviously a disagreement over what it means, so it is obviously ripe for construction.... First optical filter that filters light from the local color display. I don't think that could be any clearer that the light has to be from the local color display before it is filtered. 450 It is the clear meaning, it is absolutely clear from the English grammar what we're talking about here.

* * * * * *

> GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: [Honeywell] started talking about figure 3 and I think a couple misrepresentations were made and I want to clear that up. But first I want to just note that the specification uses this sort of the same way. It shows that filter can be placed over displays. [Honeywell's counsel] spoke at length about figure 3 and how it shows things inside the displays. I don't think that's clear from the specification at all.... [I]t shows that there are filters at the display in figure 3, but ... figure 3 is even irrelevant to what we're talking about here because ... we have figure 1, which actually [Honeywell's counsel] started to try to put up in front of figure 3 when we started talking about this[.] Figure 1 is obviously what is being described by claim 1. There is no requirement that every claim read on every embodiment of the invention. Claim 1 can pertain to figure 1. Claims 2 and 3 could pertain to figures 2 and 3.

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

There is nothing saying that claim 1 has to cover figure 3. So I don't think that argument carries any weight at all. As you see from figure 1, there is clearly a filter on top of the display. The specification clearly says located in front of the local display, 17, is a first optical filter 23. That filter is on top of it, would filter light from the local color display. Again, as I mentioned before, Honeywell turns to figures 2 and 3 and which there is absolutely nothing in the patent tying claim 1 to figures 2 and 3. There is nothing in there that says figures 2 and 3 show a filter filtering light from the local color display.

TR at 339-40 (emphasis added).

* * * * * *

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Claim 1 talks about something with two filters but also says the first filter filters light from the local color display.

When we get to claims 2 and 3 we're talking about a different embodiment. Now, that's what figures 1, 2, and 3 show is different embodiments, different examples of the different embodiments.

So figure 1, again, is relevant because it shows light being filtered from the local color display; whereas 2 and 3 don't.

* * * * * *

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: And there is nothing in the specification that would tie claim 1 to figures 2 and 3, which plaintiff is trying to do.

I don't have much else to say on this. I think it is absolutely clear from the language, from the grammatical usage of the word "from" in the common, ordinary meaning of "from."

TR at 342.

The Government also argued that it was not necessary to consult the specification because the clarity of the language at issue:

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: The claims are clear. It says filters light from the local color display. You don't need to look at the specification. You don't need to look at the figures. If you do look at those things, they confirm our construction, but it is a clear reading of the English that it filters light from the local color display. I don't know how you can be any clearer than that. Now, we got into this argument about preferred embodiments and that you can't read the claims to exclude preferred embodiments. That is accurate law. I agree.

We have two things missing here. One, there is no preferred embodiment listed in the claims or listed in the specification, so I don't know what they are saying is the preferred embodiment.... I would like to hear it but I don't know.

THE COURT: So it is not the three figures?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: I don't know. There is nothing in there that says in a preferred embodiment, this happens. You see that sometimes in patent language in the specification, but I don't think it is in the specification here.

The other thing is that the rule is that the claims cannot be construed to exclude the preferred embodiment. Each claim does not have to cover each embodiment. And that's the difference.451

You can't construe the claims as a whole such that it would read out the preferred embodiment because that makes sense, if you have a preferred embodiment, the inventor would have drafted the claims to cover it. But what does not follow from that is that claim 1 has to cover every embodiment, claim 2 has to cover every embodiment. That's wrong. It is also wrong to characterize claim 1 as a generic claim. There are Vitronics claims, and then you can have, they are genus and species, sometimes, that's what they are called, but that's not what we're talking about here. We're talking about claims that are directed to different embodiments. And, again, it comes out in a clear reading of the claims. It doesn't have to say in the specification that claim 1 pertains to one embodiment and claim 2 to a different embodiment. It just comes out of the claims.

TR at 362-64 (emphasis added).

iii. Post-Claim Construction Briefs.

The Government's post-hearing brief argued that the "claim construction analysis [of "filters light from the local color display"] can literally 'begin and end ' with the words of the claim." 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 27. Here, the Government made three new arguments. First, that Honeywell's construction improperly reads "from" out of the phrase "filters light from the local color display." Id.

Second, Honeywell's reference to Figure 3 confused the issue by misreading language that provides: Figure 3 shows "light within a narrow range of frequencies may be transmitted from the local color display." Id. at 28. Instead, the Government argued that this language confirms that because Figure 3 shows exiting the display that light is being transmitted from the display and hence is filtered external to the display. Id.

Third, the Government criticized Honeywell for misreading Vitronics for the proposition that a claim should not be construed to exclude preferred embodiments. Id. The Government distinguished Vitronics as inapplicable because there was only one claim at issue in that case, and the court excluded the only embodiment in the patent. Id. (citing Vitronics, 90 F.3d at 1583). Accordingly, the Government reasoned that Vitronics did not establish a rule that all claims must cover all embodiments described in the specification. Therefore, since the Government concluded that the '914 patent did not state a preferred embodiment in this case, the law does not require that Claim 1 " cover Figure 3" or that all claims be construed to cover all figures. Id. Instead, a patent claim should be "construed to encompass at least one disclosed embodiment in the written description." Id. at 29 (quoting Johns Hopkins Univ. v. CellPro, Inc., 152 F.3d 1342, 1355 (Fed.Cir.1998)).

c. Intervenor Lockheed Martin's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Lockheed Martin's proposed construction of "light from the local color display" was the same as that of the Government. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 24.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: And for our definition of the term "from" we mean "from" when it is used "with". From the local color display means the starting point for filters the source of light is the local color display. So the filtering occurs outside the local color display, not in the local color display under our recitation.... Claim 1 recites a first optical filter that filters light from the local color display. And the plain and ordinary meaning-

THE COURT: Why is it that the box at the bottom of the 3 doesn't do that? Explain that to me.

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: You know, it is interesting when you look at the box at 3. You can't tell where those filters are located when you look at that particular box. It is indeterminate. The box is not like-we see in figure 1 of the patent that I'm showing up here where we 452 show the filter 23 being outside the display 17.

* * * * * *

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: [Y]ou can't tell whether those filters are inside or outside from that particular diagram, whether those filters are inside or outside the local display. We have tried. Everybody has tried to look at it, but you can't tell from that particular one. If you looked at original figure 3, which we don't have, you would see those filters are inside the local display.

THE COURT: That's what I thought.

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: In the original figure 3. The original figure 3 is that rectangular box that shows the three cathode ray tubes and filters in front of them. Now, under the rules that we talked about yesterday, you would have to read this figure 3 as being consistent with the original figure 3, so you would say that-

THE COURT: They would have to be then outside?

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: On the inside. They would have to be on the inside because they were in the original specification that was filed, they were on the inside. And figure 3 can't change the original-and that was figure 3 in the original specification.

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

66 Fed.Cl. 400
(Cite as: 66 Fed.Cl. 400)

THE COURT: Okay.

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: So the new figure 3 can't change that specification. But the key term is it filters light from the local display. It does not filter light in the local color display. And we know that figure 1 is an embodiment that shows a filter being outside the display, not only from figure 1 itself, but also from the statement that appears in the patent in column 2, line 13 that says a first optical filter is placed over displays. So ... the ordinary meaning of the term "from the first optical display" means that it must filter light that has left the local color display at a filter that's located inside or internal to the display, cannot filter light from the display, it can only filter light in the display. [T]he Federal Circuit has held in the Forest Laboratories [v.] Abbott Laboratories case at 239 F.3d 1305 [(2001)], that there is a difference in meaning and scope presumed when different words are used in different claims. And if ... we were to look at the claims, claim 2, comparing it to claim 1, claim 2 recites a plurality of filters at the local color display. And from [Webster's] we know that "at" can mean "in" and we also know from [Webster's] that "from" can never mean "at" or can never mean "in." Consequently, we have different meanings. "From" is different from-" from" is different from "at." The terms were used differently and that further supports the argument that "from" should be interpreted that way that we believe it should be interpreted. [I]f we look at the page provided to us ... by Honeywell. All that this page says is that there is light that may be transmitted from the local color display. And that's all that it supports. It doesn't address the claim where the claim is reciting an optical filter, a first optical filter for filtering light from the local display. So what we have here in this provision of the specification is a discussion of a different embodiment of the invention than we see in figure 1. It is the embodiment we see in figure 3. So to sum it up, again, "from" never means "in." It means external. It means away from. And, therefore, the term "from" should be construed in the manner we suggest.

TR at 344-47.

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: Just three brief points. It seems to me that it is impossible to have a filter inside a display that can filter light from the display. I don't know how you do that. [Honeywell's counsel] suggests that you can but it seems to me that that violates the law of physics.

With respect to ... my comment on figure 3 ... was that you can't tell from figure 3, the figure 3 that's in the patent, where those filters are. I then went on to describe the figure 3 that appeared in the original application, and saying there it showed in the original application that the filters were inside the 453 display, but the original application of figure 3 also showed things that you don't see in this figure 3. It showed three cathode ray tubes, each of which provided individual sources of light. So there are differences between the two figures.... And in respect to the issue on embodiments, a lot has been made out of the fact that every claim has to include an embodiment.

It can't exclude an embodiment. [Honeywell's counsel] just got up here and said claims 2 and 3 do exclude embodiments, that they are limited to the embodiments only shown in figures 2 and 3. And there are patents issued every day by the Patent Office where claims are listed in a hierarchical fashion or listed in series, where you have a separate set of claims, that the only way you would read them was to read them as being limited to one embodiment. And the specification may have five embodiments and you will find five sets of claims in the patent, each directed at different embodiments. That's what we had in this case. When we look at the history of this case, we started out with the '637 patent, which eventually was spun off in a continuation.

Part of it was spun off in a continuation. The '637 patent claims are limited to particular embodiments and that's the use of polarizers.

The claims in the '637 patent that dealt with band pass filters were the ones that appear in the continuation and show up in the '914 patent. So even in the history here, we have a situation where we have claims limited to particular embodiments and that's the standard practice of drafting claims.

(Cite as: 66 Fed.Cl. 400)

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

After the claim construction hearing, Lockheed Martin argued that "from" in Claim 1 means "a starting point" and cannot be constructed to mean " at." See 4/15/05 Int. Brief at 13. Therefore, Claim 1 "applies to filters located outside of the display and [C]laim 2 applies to filters located inside the display." Id. Lockheed Martin discounted Honeywell's argument that both Figure 2 and Figure 3 disclose that the filters are located inside the local color display and that Claim 1 therefore covers both of these embodiments, because not every claim must read on every embodiment. Id. (citing Johns Hopkins, 152 F.3d at 1355). In addition, Lockheed Martin asserted that Honeywell admitted at the claim construction hearing that Claim 2 does not read on Figure 1. See TR at 359.

d. The Court's Construction Of "Filters Light From The Local Color Display" In This Case.

The term "a first optical filter" in Claim 1(a) of the '914 patent consists of the noun "filter," modified by the adjectives "first" and "optical" to describe the order and functional type of filter. The term " filter" also is modified first by the phrase "filters light from the local color display" that described the purpose or function of the "first optical filter," which necessarily requires: 1.) the presence of a local color display; 2.) light emanating from the local source of light; and 3.) light filtered at least once thereafter, i.e., by the first filter.

Accordingly, the court construes "filters light from the local color display" as: "the starting point for filtering light occurs at the filters."

Contrary to the Government's representation, see TR 362, the specification at the Detailed Description of the Invention Section does designate Figure 1 as the preferred embodiment. See '914 patent, col. 2, 1. 49. The specification clearly provides that the "display system" invention "can be used by other viewers." See DMX 1 ('914 patent , col. 2, 1. 52).

7. "Notch Filter."

[17] The language of Claim 1(a) states that "a first optical filter ... is a notch filter that passes light ... and that substantially blocks light associated with color bands[,] other than predetermined color bands. " '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 1-6.

The parties have proposed the following competing constructions of "notch filter:"

Honeywell's Proposed Construction	Defendants' Proposed Construction
Notch filter: optical filter that either passes or blocks a narrow range of wavelengths of electromagnetic radiation	Notch filter: a narrowband filter that may block light within the narrow wavelength band or may pass light within the narrow band, and do the opposite outside of the narrow wavelength band

a. Honeywell's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Honeywell's proposed claim construction of "notch filter" did not differ with that of the defendants, insofar as all parties agree that a "notch filter" either passes or blocks a narrow range of wavelengths of light. See 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 22. Honeywell, however, disputed defendants' imposition of "an additional limitation, namely that the notch filter [does] the opposite outside of the narrow wavelength band," as being inconsistent with the language of the claims and the specifications. Id. Therefore, Honeywell warned the court that if defendants' construction was adopted, it would "exclude a common type of notch filter, namely a filter with multiple notches, such as a triple notch filter." Id.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, Honeywell advised the court that the use of "notch filter" was generic and therefore could be limited to either a single notch filter or a multi-notch filter.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Plaintiff's construction of notch filter is that it is an optical filter that either passes or blocks a narrow range of wavelengths of electromagnetic radiation. Defendant's construction generally agrees with that-well, does agree with the first part of our construction, but then inserts a second component to the construction that says that it does the opposite outside of the narrow wavelength band. And what this is all about is that-

THE COURT: Let's talk about what a notch is.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Yes. I have that, Your Honor. First of all, a notch filter, the key issue is whether or not a notch filter has this element of requiring to do the opposite, and what this goes to, Your Honor, once again, is the notion of whether a notch filter is limited to a single notch or excludes multi-notches as it is used in the patent and understood by one skilled in the art. And I can show you what a notch filter is.

THE COURT: Good.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Okay. A notch filter is a filter that has a portion, it is used to basically allow a range of wavelengths to be passed or blocked. So you can think of that, if I have a red filter, just a single red filter that I put over a white light, Your Honor, which has the entire visible spectrum in there all mixed together, which is why it is white. And if you put the red filter over that, the filter will only permit the red light to go in, go out, and it will exclude the other red light to go out, if it is a single notch filter. If it is a multi-notch filter, it may permit, say, red, green and blue light to come out, but block everything else in between.

THE COURT: So what, notch means one color?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Notch means-notch is referring to the notch in the wavelength spectrum which you see up here, Your Honor. The reason it is called a notch filter is that this is the notch. Here is the wavelength. This is the light. If this is your white light coming out of here, this spectrum was all the white coming out. The notch, see, this is zero and this is-well, in this particular instance, it will be not letting any light through in these wavelength ranges and only letting out what they call a notch. And they call it a notch because it sort of cuts out of the spectrum a notch and let's the red light through. And this notch filter, you have the light letting through-the filters are letting through the blue line, the green light, and the red light and blocking everything in between. So it has got a notch-and this has notch, okay? Now, in the patent, that is significant, because we use 455 these notch filters in the patent to alter the characteristics of the light. Remember when we talked in the beginning about using, for example, a red filter, which is one notch of the notch filter, to block certain wavelengths and pass certain wavelengths, lambda 1 is the light permitted through the notch. It would look like the red notch over there. Likewise, the green filter passes only the green notch and the blue filter only the blue notch. And then you combine those three colors together on the front face of the projector, which is defined as 55 in the display, to combine them all together to make an image just like here.

THE COURT: What does the word notch mean?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: The notch means the notch out of the visible spectrum that is either allowed to pass through or not allowed to pass through.

THE COURT: One notch equals one color?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: One notch equals-well, it can or cannot be limited to one color but it is at least limited to a wavelength range. It doesn't have to be associated with a particular color, so one notch per wavelength range.

THE COURT: All right.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Now, the defendants would like to limit the term, notch filter, to read in that it is a single notch filter, and they say that instead of meaning notch filter in the claim, they meant to write single notch filter and that would then limit it to the circumstances you have on the left-hand side. The plaintiffs make-

THE COURT: What would the plural of notch filter be, notch filters?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: No, no, you would use-the generic term is notch filter. And if you want to have a single notch, you call it single notch filter. If you want multi-notch, you call it multi-notch filters. Again, we will-

THE COURT: But you didn't use the word multi-notch.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: We didn't use the term single notch either. The generic term is notch. That's the point of the discussion here. There is nothing in the ordinary meaning of notch filter that requires a single notch. To the contrary, it is common parlance, both within the industry, filter area, and even in patents to use the term notch to talk about either single or multi-notch filters, okay?

TR at 385-89.

Honeywell also argued that the language referring to color bands in Claim 1 "are multiple bands being passed ... that correspond to the multiple notches. A fair reading of the patent is there is no way to get those multiple bands or to cover a full color display unless you, in fact, have a notch filter which is passing multiple bands which makes it a multi-notch filter. So from the face of the patent and the claim itself, it is clear that certainly multi-notch filters are contemplated." TR at 391. Therefore, Honeywell concluded that since the specification contemplates a full color display, multiple notches must be used and the term "notch filter" must not read a multi-notch filter out of the claim. See TR at 392.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Briefs.

In Honeywell's post-claim construction briefs, prior art is discussed, i.e., U.S. Patent No. 4,663,562 (the "Miller Patent") that discloses a multi-notch filter in the specification thereof. See 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 28. The Miller Patent also used the specific terms "multi-notch didymium filter" and a " multi-notch filter" in the claim language, although the latter uses the term "notch filter." Honeywell represents that the "use of a multi-notch filter [in the Miller Patent] was 'indicative of what those skilled in the art generally believe a certain term means.' " Id. at 29 (quoting Vitronics, 90 F.3d at 1584). Therefore, Honeywell concluded that " [m]ultiple color bands implies multiple notches, one for each color band, as taught for example, by the Miller patent." 4/15/05 Honeywell Brief at 10.

456 b. The Government's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

The Government argued that "one of ordinary skill in the art would conclude that the term notch filter means a narrowband filter that may block light within the narrow wavelength band or may pass light within the narrowband, and do the opposite outside the narrow wavelength band." 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 25. Although the Government recognized that the term notch filter is not defined in the '914 specification, the Government argued that Claim 1 provides that "the first optical filter is a notch filter that passes light, comprising predetermined color bands ... and that substantially blocks light associated with color bands[.]" '914 patent, col. 6, ll 2-3, 5. Therefore, a notch filter is one that both "passes light" and "substantially blocks light." Id. The specification, however, provides that the "[l]ight blocking device 39 on the ANVIS may therefore be a notch filter for blocking light corresponding to the narrow color band ." '914 patent, col. 5, ll. 13-15 (emphasis added).

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, the Government argued that a notch filter "could also be termed ... a band pass filter ... no light is getting through, and then ... you let some light through and then you go back up on the other side." TR at 400-01. "[A]t zero ... no light is getting through and then as you get to this wavelength here, you drop down and you . .. let some light through ... [n]ow what you have is a pass, passage of a band of light.... [T]he other thing is what is called a band stop filter which according to this representation here, you would have something going along at the bottom and it would peak up like this and come back down.... And so there you would have light over a broad range transmitted and only blocked within a certain area. And that's what's called a band stop filter." Id. In addition, the Government asserted that notch filter " can either pass or block light with that narrow range of wavelengths ... the patent as a whole is silent on what the transmission of a notch filter looks like." TR at 401-02.

THE COURT: Let's flip back to your other chart, you go to "it may block light or may pass light."
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL Right.
THE COURT: What would be required for [a notch filter] to do either?
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL Well, it has to do one or the other. It may block light or it may pass light. And I think that that's just implicit in the-they say either passes or blocks. We say may block light or may pass light. I think we were trying to be more explicit, that it may do one or may do the other.
THE COURT: I thought the notch filter always passed the light.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL If you have one-no. And I think that comes out here. And I will show you how it comes out in the specification as well that the patent contemplates that it can pass or block within a narrow range.
THE COURT: What features does it have that makes it do that or what makes it do that?
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL What makes it sensitive to that one band?
THE COURT: Yes. What about the notch filter allows it to do one or the other?
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL It is the construction of the filter. I'm not a filter expert. I think once we get our experts on the stand they can explain it better than me. It has to do with-they are typically called interference filters. And as I understand it that means that the light interferes with itself in certain wavelength ranges and doesn't in others. So it is able to go through in some and not in others.
THE COURT: But there is nothing inherent within a notch filter which does one or the other?
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL Well, I think once you have built it, it is a notch filter and so it does one or the other. But when you say notch filter, it could mean one or the other. You are talking about *457 two different pieces of hardware. Notch filter could be a band pass or a band stop filter.... Now, you asked me why it must block when all the examples we saw from [Honeywell's counsel] were passing a narrow range. I think that comes straight out of the specification, which says light blocking device may be a notch filter for blocking light corresponding to the narrow color band, lambda sub 1. There you go. Going back to it has to be read in light of the specification. The specification clearly says that the notch filter blocks light within a narrow band. Now, it also comes out here, why it must do the opposite outside of that, because, as I have highlighted there, this provides a minimum of filtration of total light input. The idea is the-you want to block light in the narrowest band possible and let the rest of the light in because as you can see on figure 3, the excerpt I pulled out there, the filter they are talking about is the filter on the ANVIS. As we talked about before there is always a tradeoff with the sensitivity of the ANVIS versus what lights are getting out of the display. So you want your ANVIS to be able to see as much light as possible because it allows you to see better at night. So you want lambda sub 1 to be as narrow as possible. And you want to allow all the other light in that you can. That's what this part of the specification talks about. It shows clearly that it needs to-

THE COURT: What do I do with the word "may" ?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL Right. It is because as I said before, the figures are exemplary. They show that this is one embodiment of the invention. We believe that it is clear that notch filter must do at least what it says that it may do. Now, it may do other things as well, or, as I said before, as [Honeywell's counsel] put up here, it may be a band pass filter which would be the opposite of what it is talking about here. But you have got-it would be the conversion. You can think of them as mirror images of one another, the mirror image of a band pass filter would be a band stop filter, if you inverted it.

THE COURT: Okay. Both of which could be notch filters?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL Yes, Your Honor. TR at 402-05.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

The Government's post-claim construction hearing briefs continued to insist that in addition to passing or blocking light, the specification required that the notch filter also "must have a specified characteristic outside the narrow band." 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 29. Therefore, the Government asserted that the filter " 'does the opposite'-namely block-light outside the narrow range." Id. at 30. Not surprisingly, the Government dismissed Honeywell's view that the notch filter could include multiple notches as contrary to the claim and specification language. Id. at 31; see also 4/15/05 Gov't Brief at 12-13.

c. Intervenor Lockheed Martin's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Lockheed Martin's pre-hearing construction of " notch filter" was the same as that of the Government. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 25-26.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, the issue of whether notch filters meant a single notch or permits the use of a multi-notch filter was explained by Lockheed Martin:

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: So what we're saying is that the notch filter here is referring to a single notch. I will discuss that a little bit more but it is referring to a single notch that passes light comprising predetermined color bands and also has a feature that it substantially blocks light. It passes light including a predetermined red color band and then substantially blocks light associated with color bands other than said predetermined color bands. So it doesn't define the size of the notch but it simply defines the size 458 of the characteristic which are to both pass and block.

THE COURT: By size, you're not meaning several notches, you are saying how long?
LOCKHEED MARTIN'S: Right. It doesn't say how wide, how wide or how long.
THE COURT: How much of the band is taken up?
LOCKHEED MARTIN'S: Right, how much of the band is taken up, how deep is the notch. And it doesn't say, there is no reference there that there is more than one notch. Now, our position is based on the language of the claim that's understood by one of ordinary skill in the art, and, again, it doesn't, this construction doesn't contradict the intrinsic evidence and specification and prosecution history. The specification-
THE COURT: You mean, do we run into a problem with this notch filter issue, meaning "a" doesn't mean one?
LOCKHEED MARTIN'S: We run into a problem where "a" means one or more notch filters? You do when you say a first optical filter is a notch filter. But it is describing here what we have, it is describing a notch filter. So, I mean, if they are going to say one or more optical filters that are one or more notch filters, I think we run into problems with whether "a" means one or more.
THE COURT: Well, the word "is" before that, though, the tense on that would imply that it is single.
LOCKHEED MARTIN'S: Exactly. We're saying the filter is a notch filter.

TR at 411-12.

* * * * * *

In addition to discussing the specification references cited in its brief, Lockheed Martin also discussed the relevance of the prosecution history of "notch filter:"

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: [W]e see a reference to a letter that the Patent Office issued on March 20th, 2001. And that letter, by the way, went to both the '760 application and the '914, the application that was then the '914 application because the '760 application had not yet been banded. So the identical letter went out for both the '760 and the application that was the then-the one that was supporting the '914 patent. And there the Patent Office rejected the claims that were pending as being unpatentable over a patent issued to Swift. And what the Patent Office did is it gave their interpretation of the application, that was the '914 and '760 application.
THE COURT: Were they any more specific in saying why it was unpatentable?
LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: There are more details that go into-on the next page.
THE COURT: Okay.
LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: We have, we give you more from that, more of an extract from it but essentially what you had in Swift was you had a filter, a notch filter at the goggles, not at the display. And the notch filter at the goggles had basically a hole in them to allow a certain amount of light, for example, green light, to pass through because green light doesn't interfere with the night vision goggles. And so there was some ability to look at a, to have that type of light in the cockpit without interfering with the night vision goggles. But, anyway, what the patent examiner said is that Swift teaches "an effective filter by virtue of the operation" and it is a reference to filter 9 in column 3, where "it may be such as to transmit all available light in the circumstances of use, except for one narrow spectral band." Our point in citing this correspondence is that here the patent examiner is rejecting the application and the claims in the application based on the conclusion by the patent examiner that what was taught in the applications was a notch filter that had one narrow spectral band.

TR at 414-15.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

In the post-hearing brief, Lockheed Martin argued that the specification descriptions concern a single notch filter, although Claim 1(a) admittedly did not specify whether a 459 notch filter is a single notch filter or multi-notch filter. See 4/1/05 Int. Brief at 38 (citing '914 patent, col. 3, ll. 34-38) (specification providing that either the first or second filter (23 or 25) will be a notch filter; the other filter (23 or 25) will substantially block the " light of a predetermined red color band , passed by the notch filter."); see also '914 patent, col. 5, ll. 13-15 (the "[l]ight blocking device 39 on the ANVIS may therefore be a notch filter for blocking light corresponding to the narrow color band ."); '914 patent, col. 4, ll. 52-57 ("a filter 61, such as a bandpass filter [a type of notch filter], may be used with CRT[.]"); '914 patent, col. 4, ll. 59-61 (CRTs "may be provided with high pass ... filters 62 and 63[.]").

d. The Court's Construction Of "Notch Filter" In This Case.

Honeywell's proposed construction, defining an optical filter that "either passes or blocks," must be rejected since the claim language provides that a notch filter both "passes" and "substantially blocks light." '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 2-5 (emphasis added). Since the court is satisfied that the claim language clearly delineates the purpose and function of a notch filter, the court also declined to adopt the Government's more restrictive construction, i.e., defining a "notch filter" as a "narrow filter that may block light ... or may pass light ..., and do the opposite outside the narrow wavelength band." See Renishaw PLC, 158 F.3d at 1248 ("A party wishing to use statements in the written description to confine or otherwise affect a patent's scope must, at the very least, point to a term or terms in the claim with which to draw in those statements; without any claim term that is susceptible of clarification by the written description, there is no legitimate way to narrow the property right."); see also id. at 1249 (quoting Specialty Composites v. Cabot Corp., 845 F.2d 981, 987 (Fed.Cir.1988)) (" Where a specification does not require a limitation, that limitation should not be read from the specification into the claims."). Although the term "notch filter" is "susceptible" to further clarification, the specification of the '914 patent does not require that the "notch filter" exclude multi-notch filters. A

Accordingly, the court construes "notch filter" to be "an optical filter that has the capacity both to pass and substantially block light and may be a single-notch filter or a multi-notch filter."

8. "Passes."

The parties have agreed that the term "passes," as used in the claims of the '914 patent, means "allows to go through." Jt. Stip. ¶ 3.

9. "Color Band[s]."

[18] "Color band" does not appear in the '914 patent, although the plural "color bands" is found in Claim 1(a) to describe the light that is passed at a filter notch, i.e., "a notch filter that passes light comprising predetermined color bands." See '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 2-3 (emphasis added).

The parties have proposed the following competing constructions of "color band [s]:"

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

Honeywell's Proposed Construction	Defendants' Proposed Construction
Color Band: range of wavelengths within the visible spectrum	Color Band: a range of wavelengths within a single color

Honeywell Markman Slide 118; Gov't Markman Slide 031 (bold added by parties).

a. Honeywell's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Honeywell's pre-hearing brief argued that "color band" means "a range of wavelengths within the visible spectrum." 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 25. Honeywell asserted that defendants agreed with this definition but also imposed an impermissible limitation that the range of wavelengths be "within a single color." Id. Honeywell further asserted that because the '914 patent does not specify any particular division of the visible spectrum, there is "no requirement that a particular color band falls within a single color." Id. at 26.

460 ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: What we say is a color band is a range of wavelengths in the visible spectrum. Visible spectrum is what you can see, it is this.

THE COURT: Correct.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: And the parties agree that a color band is explained as a range of wavelengths. And what we disagree on is that the defendants seek to say, add the word, the color band means a single color band, okay?

TR at 461-62.

* * * * * *

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: The color band definition, like what we discussed before, the color band is a continuum. There are any number of ways around the color band. What we call those colors is a matter of convention, not a matter necessarily of science. It is what individuals over the years have been programmed to call red or to call green or to call blue. And, in fact, you might go to other countries and they refer to it differently. It is frankly very much a cultural thing. It is an industry-specific thing. And so the reason we say that you should not be talking about a color band as limited to a specific single color by name is, first of all, the band is a continuum around here. This is the visible spectrum, if you will. And what single color you name it depends very much on how you carve it. Are you going to call it red or reddish orange? And the notion that you would call, pick a single name is not just the-it doesn't make any sense because what one person calls red, somebody else might call reddish-orange. And what one band, the band includes what somebody calls red, might be a band somebody else calls reddish-orange. And the notion of a color band generically is only intended to make it clear that ... [i]t starts with wavelengths down here, which are x-rays, for example. And then you have got all the-from there you go to the other end, which is, you know, long electrical oscillations and microwave, infrared, we have x-rays, gamma rays, cosmic rays. These are all in the electromagnetic spectrum. Each one of these can be defined as a range of wavelengths in the electromagnetic spectrum, but they are not colors because they are not in the visible spectrum. So the notion of a color band is nothing more in this patent than a band ... that covers the visible spectrum. It is something within the visible spectrum and it is called a color band because the visible spectrum can differentiate it from an x-ray band, cosmic ray band, it is a range of wavelengths. The patent, on the other hand, when it wants to talk about a particular band, it does so. When it wants to talk about the red color band, it calls it the red color band. And when it talks about the green color band, it calls it the green color band. And you can have an orange-red color band and a green-blue color band, it would be a wider band. So the idea that there is nothing in the way the term color band is used that suggests it should be a single color. That doesn't make any sense to suggest that-whether it is a single color or multiple colors depends on how thin you slice it.

THE COURT: Let me ask you this ... under claim 1(a), you used the word predetermined red color band. Now, to me what that means is you have wavelengths within the parameters of what is red that you predetermined.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Yes.

THE COURT: It could be from wavelength here to here, all these are red, or it may be within that red grouping.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: That's correct, Your Honor. We start out with color band and sort of whistle your way down. Color band is something within the visible spectrum, and then you can have a red color band which says that red color band is now within the red portion or red region of the visible spectrum. And now you can have a predetermined color band or I think it is also called, in claim 2, the narrow band of the red color band, so you can have a portion of the red color band. So in each instance, though, the patentee has said when he wants to refer to a particular aspect of the color band, of the visible 461 spectrum, he tells you what aspect he has in mind.

THE COURT: Now, why wouldn't the inventor put in ... specific, wavelengths between X and Y? . .. Why don't they say, including-I don't know how you measure these things, but by wavelength 1 to wavelength 3?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: -actually, the inventors certainly could have written a claim that said we want to block everything between 620 and 630. I think that's your question, Your Honor, why don't they instead say we're going to call that a predetermined color band.

THE COURT: Right.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: I think the answer is that shows manifest intention that the claim shouldn't be narrowly limited to a specific range of wavelengths, but should be limited to what the people consider to be the red color band and red region.

TR at 467-72.

* * * * * *

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: We would agree with the defendants that the color band is a range of wavelengths. And I believe we have agreement that that range of wavelengths has to be within the visible spectrum. The place we seemingly disagree with the defendants on is whether or not you need to be-a color band has to be associated with a specific single color. And just to point out the dilemma in doing that, Your Honor, as I indicated previously, you can divide up the spectrum by any variety of color names, but if you look, for example, over here, that-this would be a color band[.]

* * * * * *

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Your Honor, let me answer the question you were interested in first and then I will hit the other points.... When we get to the claim on color bands, we're not designing to a color band. We're designing to the red, green, and blue color bands, which are later on specified in the claim. For example, here, in claim 1, we're designing to the red color band and if we had claim 2 up, I have it here, because [the Government's counsel] put it up, there you are designing to the specifics called out, blue, green, and red color bands. What I mean by that is when you want to practice the invention, you know you need a blue, green, and red color band. And the engineer, the person who-

THE COURT: But the second portion of 1(a) says associated with color bands other than predetermined ones, which could be a large-that could be a bit of a guessing game, wouldn't it?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: No, because you know which ones you are blocking. It says it is a filter that passes light comprising a predetermined color band, including the red color band. That means it has to be at least red, it is passing some other colors, that's how you get the color display.

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

And it substantially blocks light associated with the other color bands. All that says, Your Honor, is we're going to figure out which ones are passing, it is going to be red and something else. So if it is a full color display, it is passing red, green, and blue, and it is blocking-
THE COURT: What about the associated with? What does that mean, associated with color bands?
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: And blocks light associated-
THE COURT: Next to?
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Because the color bands are the mathematical formulations of what is part of the spectrum.
THE COURT: What does associated with mean?
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: So it is the light, it is the light that is in those wavelengths of that color band. So the light associated with the red color band, if we assume the red color band was 600 to 620, the light associated with the color band would be the light at 600 to 620.
THE COURT: Isn't that substantially blocks light within, would have been a better way of saying it if that's what you wanted to do?
*462 HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: No, not if it is. This is the predetermined color band. So it is-
THE COURT: I am looking at the part that goes, "and that substantially blocks light associated with color bands other than said predetermined color bands."
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Yeah, maybe within or maybe at. We can always sit here and sort of figure out another way to write it, but that's what it means. I think that's-I have never got focused on that language. It is clearly the light, though, at those wavelengths. I don't think that's particularly in dispute. So it blocks the light. Let's assume we said that the color band that is-it says it is passing certain light, that's the reds and greens, and it is blocking the blues, okay. Then it is blocking the light associated with the blue color band, but the claim-which would be the range of wavelengths that are blue. But the claim is not attempting to specify anything other than say-which is they clearly want to block red and depending on what other colors you want to let through, you are either going to block them or pass them. It doesn't really have anything to do with what the color bands are in terms of how you specify them. What is claim-
THE COURT: Well, within this, let's just stay within 1(a) right now. Is the only thing that's predetermined is red?
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: The only thing that is required to be predetermined is red. But it says it passes light comprising predetermined color bands, plural, including a red. So it has got to be more than one band but at least one of the bands has to be red. This all goes to the notion that claim 1 is, again, not specific to whether it is full color, whether you have the idea of three bands or two bands. You know you have to have more than one band. The claim is being drafted in a way that is broad enough to be multiple color bands, whether it is two or three, and doesn't tell you which ones are being blocked and which ones are being passed. And it doesn't need to. All it is telling you is for sure you have to block the red.
THE COURT: Wasn't that this other gentleman's point, it doesn't tell you that and how would someone know?
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: You don't have to know. The invention only worries about making sure you block the red. And whatever else comes and goes, is going to affect the color gamut associated, the colors you can get out of your display.
THE COURT: Because the red is the only thing we're worried about.
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: So the claim is intentionally broad to make sure, okay, we know red has to be stopped, but now there is going to be other things that are stopped, other things that pass. And we're not necessarily going to decide here now because that's not really the important part of the invention. The important part of the invention is making sure that you at least block the predetermined red color band.
THE COURT: Why are they making the argument they are making? I am going to flip it on you.
HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: I don't know for sure, but I have a guess. I am trying to think of what is the best exhibit to use to explain this. Maybe it is-this is the Westinghouse guide, Plaintiff's Markman Exhibit 24. This is a phosphor handbook. This is a book-we're going to see more of these later on, but these are specifications for particular phosphors. And in this particular case, it is-it happens to be an orange, what they call an orange-red phosphor. And so what that means is that this area from here to here (indicating) is clearly a range within the color portion of the spectrum. It satisfies our definition. And our definition never says it is the entire spectrum. It says it is a range within. So we're not trying to cover the entire visible spectrum. It is always a subset of it. But you see this particular one goes back all the way down from roughly 550 and all the way up to-I don't know where it trails off and that clearly would be a band, it clearly is associated with something, with red and orange, but it is not associated with a single color. But it is a range of wavelengths in the *463 color spectrum. And I assume that they would probably want to say that this is not a color band. I think it also comes into play when they try to carve up certain bands, they want to call in Plaintiff's Markman Exhibit 44.... [W]hen they were trying to-when defendants were trying to explain their theory of why claim 1 has multiple color bands instead of just one, they said, well, under their definition, maybe not ours, this band covers both red and orange. So they would want to say that's multiple bands, and in our definition, we would say, no, that is a band within the visible spectrum here. It happens, and it is a range within, it is not the whole spectrum, and it is a range within the color spectrum, which makes it a color band. And it happens to be associated with these two, this area, which, one may call-they would call, red and orange. So they would say that's not one band, it is two, and we say no, it is one band, it is one range, it is within the color spectrum. And just because somebody chose to call it red versus orange doesn't make it two color bands. It clearly-see, it has, this is a filter, but if you assume this is light, it has, you see, the characteristics of being one band. This also gets to the point that [the Government's counsel] said, which was what he said, in claim 2, that he says when they meant bands, plural, they said bands, and when they meant band, singular, they must mean band singular, so it must mean one color. And he pointed to the claim where he talks about having blue, red, and green color bands, plural, and he said uh-huh, down here, when they want to talk about one band, they talk about the green color band. That's, I think, making our point once again, that there are-see, we're not suggesting that the color band is the entire spectrum. And when you talk about red, green, and blue, they are separated apart. So they are separate bands. They happen to be called red, green, and blue. And when you want to talk about one of those bands, one of those ranges within the color spectrum, you talk about a red band. We're not saying, we have never said this whole thing is one big band and then that's why it should be singular, not plural. So the claim is entirely consistent. There are three bands, that's why you use, when you are talking about all three, it uses a plural. And when it talks about the single band, it talks about it in the singular. But nothing in the definition of color band by itself says we have to figure out and call it by some conventional single name. And if we can't find the color system that comes up with a name that particular band, it is not a color band. It is clearly a range within, regardless of what you call it.

b. The Government's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Lockheed Martin's pre-hearing construction of " color band" was the same as that of the Government. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 28-34.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: [W]e agreed that color band is a range of wavelengths. And we actually agree that it is the range of visible wavelengths. The difference is whether it is within a single color. We believe it is clear from the extrinsic evidence, clear from claim construction rules you don't read a word out of the claims that it needs to be within a particular color. I want to point out that-

THE COURT: How would they be reading out? . .. So, in other words, that his construction would be band equals a range of wavelengths? Is that what you are saying?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Right, Your Honor, by adding in color, specifying it is a color.

* * * * * *

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Claim 2 uses color bands a number of times. But if you notice, every time it refers to one color, it is a color band. Every time it refers to multiple colors, it is color bands. I think that clearly shows that every time *464 you are talking about a color band, you are talking about one color, a primary color. It doesn't have to be a primary color but the claim clearly shows that it is a primary color. The only thing time you get into multiple colors, the blue, red and green is color bands.

THE COURT: But how could you convey to someone that you are just working within the wavelengths that we, most people look at as blue without saying it the way they did? What would you suggest they do?

THE WITNESS: I guess I don't follow the question.

THE COURT: Well, what you are arguing is that every time they use bands they have several colors. Every time they use the word band, they only have one color. And therefore, what you are suggesting is that your argument is band means one color. And they are saying, no, it is the entire, it can be the spectrum or portion of the spectrum, depending on kind of what you want to convey.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Yes, Your Honor. I think it is clear from this, and I will show you some more evidence, more intrinsic evidence that a color band is also referred to as being within one color. You are not talking about the whole spectrum. It doesn't make sense to say the red, orange, yellow, green, blue, color band. It just doesn't make sense to say that.

THE COURT: I would agree with you on that.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: As I said before, claims never refer to a color band as containing more than one color. So when you use color bands, plural, it refers to more than one color. The specification says-figure 2, each color band provides a monochromatic image in one primary color.

THE COURT: Each.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Each color band, meaning one color band provides a monochromatic image in one primary color. Because what this is referring to is figure 3 that they keep flashing up, there is 51 through 53, 51, 52, 53 are the color bands. Each one is one color. And again, the portion of the specification that discusses figure 3 says figure 3 shows an arrangement in which the local source of light, 50, comprises red, green, and blue color bands. Source for monochromatic display transducers, again, monochromatic again meaning one color.

THE COURT: One color.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Again, this is going back to what I said before. The color band under their definition could cover the entire spectrum. Again, reading color out of the claims, you talk about, you know, as I said before, red, orange, yellow color bands. It doesn't make sense to say it that way. Now, there is no evidence where a color band refers to more than one color. And that's just-you read the whole entire specification, every time you talk about a color band, it is one color. You don't say the red-blue color band. It doesn't make any sense.

THE COURT: Your argument is there are color bands within the spectrum and really what they are using is using the word color band to mean spectrum?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: That would be the effect of their interpretation, Your Honor, is that the entire visible spectrum could be a color band.

THE COURT: And what you are saying is that their use of color band means this effect or where you are defining it as each color is a band?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: That's correct, Your Honor.

TR at 489-92.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: One of skill in the art reads red and they say, oh, I know exactly what that means. The lay person has to pick up a dictionary or treatise and educate themselves up to that level of skill but that's what you get when you read it. So there is no need to put that in there. Some level of knowledge is always assumed or else patents would be hundreds of pages long.

THE COURT: Well, I guess I can see your construction by looking at 1(a) because465 when they decided to talk about red color and they have got that-and then they have associated with other color bands, meaning other bands of color. That's what I was mentioning before. So they did not really mean to have it being associated with the entire spectrum.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Exactly, Your Honor.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

In the Government's post-hearing brief, "color band" was asserted, without citation, to mean: "range of visible wavelength within a single color." 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 32. The Government also argued that Honeywell agreed during the claim construction hearing that "color band" means "a range of visible wavelengths," but later modified its construction to mean "light that can be characterized by color." Id.; see also TR at 479 (Honeywell's Counsel: "We would agree with the defendants that the color band is a range of wavelengths ... and ... that range of wavelengths has to be within the visible spectrum."). The court, however, did not find that portion of the record inconsistent with Honeywell's argument that "color bands" means a range of wavelengths within the visible spectrum.

c. Intervenor Lockheed Martin's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Lockheed Martin's construction of "color bands" was the same as that of the Government. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 28-29.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, Lockheed Martin argued that unless color band is defined by a specific color: "how does the optical engineer know which wavelengths are of interest? If a color band can go across individual color bands, what do you design to [in order to avoid infringement]?" TR at 498.

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: I think that when you subject any of the terms that Honeywell is or any of the definitions or constructions that Honeywell is proposing throughout the course of the Markman hearing, and you subject them to the analysis that [Lockheed Martin's co-counsel] set forth under Vitronics, what you are going to conclude is that they don't work.... There is going to be examples where Honeywell acted as a lexicographer. There are going to be examples where the specification defines things in a manner that is inconsistent with the construction that is being proposed by Honeywell. And the other thing you are going to find is that there are numerous instances in the intrinsic evidence, the patent file history, where they have surrendered the broader definition that they are now trying to take back and they can't do that.

THE COURT: But they didn't do that on color band.

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: No, ma'am, they didn't.

TR at 499-500.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

Lockheed Martin further asserted that "[o]ne of ordinary skill in the art would conclude that the term 'color band' means 'a range of visible wavelengths within a single color.' " 4/1/05 Int. Brief at 40. The court was warned that Honeywell's proposed construction reads the adjective "color" out of the term "color bands." Id. Therefore, Lockheed Martin argued that the specification refers to single primary individual color bands. See '914 patent, col. 4, ll. 46-47 (" [e]ach color band 51-53 provides a monochromatic image in one primary color for the full color display. ").

d. The Court's Construction Of "Color Bands" In This Case.

The specification provides no definition of "color band." "Color bands" appears at '914 patent, col. 4, l. 51, wherein we are informed that the invention has "different" color bands that are to be filtered by "multiple monochromatic display transducers." '914 patent, col. 466 4, ll. 51-52. In Claim 1, where " color bands" is used, without such adjectives as " predetermined" or "predetermined red," the court construes "color bands" as: "a range of visible wavelengths that may include all colors visible to the human eye." See '914 patent, col. 6, l. 5.

On the other hand, when "color bands" is used in Claim 2(a), with adjectives such as "blue, red, and green color bands," the court construes "color bands " "to include the range of wavelengths, within which the colors blue, red, and green are visible to the human eye." See '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 13-14.

This construction is consistent with the specification that discusses "color band" in two contexts. First, the specification refers to single primary individual color bands. See '914 patent, col. 4, ll. 46-47 (" Each color band 51-53 provides a monochromatic image in one primary color for the full color display. "). Second, in Figure 3, local source of light without reservation "comprises red, green, and blue color bands[.]" '914 patent, col. 4, l. 41.

10. "Predetermined Color Bands."

The parties have agreed that the term " predetermined color bands," as used in Claim 1(a) of the '914 patent, requires no further construction aside from the term "color band." Jt. Stip. ¶ 4.

11. "Red Color Band."

[19] The term "red color band" appears in the preamble to Claim 2 and in Claim 2(a)(3) of the '914 patent. The preamble to Claim 2 speaks of "a local source of light having ... red ... color bands[.]" '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 13-14. Claim 2(a)(3) provides for a "third filter for filtering the red color band." '914 patent, col. 6, l. 21. FN11

> FN11. Claim 2(b) and Claim 3 include the term "narrowband of the red color band," which the parties have agreed means "a narrow range of wavelengths within the red color band." Jt. Stip. ¶ 6.

The parties have proposed the following competing constructions of "red color band:"

Honeywell's Proposed Construction	Defendants' Proposed Construction

a. Honeywell's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Honeywell's pre-hearing brief argued that the term " red color band" means a "range of wavelengths within the red region of the visible spectrum." 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 27. Honeywell asserted that this construction also is consistent with the specification wherein there is a reference to "the first monochromatic display transducer, such as a CRT providing a red color band 51, projects an image in the red spectrum." '914 patent, col. 4, ll. 52-54. In addition, the '914 patent provides: "In the case of CRT displays, the narrow color band may be defined for example as the band at which the most light is transmitted by a phosphor coating on the CRT." '914 patent, col. 5, ll. 8-11. Honeywell insisted that this language "clearly defines the narrow band , (an example of a red color band) as the region of the spectrum where a red phosphor emits most of its light." 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 32. Honeywell also argued that since the '914 patent does not define a red color band by reference to any specific range of wavelengths, it would be improper for the court to limit this claim term in that manner. See 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 27 (citing Invitrogen Corp. v. Biocrest Mfg., L.P., 327 F.3d 1364, 1371 (Fed.Cir.2003)) ("The district court properly declined to read into the claim any specific numerical improvement, such as ten-fold increase in competence."); RF Delaware, Inc. v. Pacific Keystone Tech., Inc., 326 F.3d 1255, 1263 (Fed.Cir.2003) ("When a claim term is expressed in general descriptive words, it typically will not be limited to a numerical range."). In the alternative, Honeywell argued that if the court were to define " red color band" by using a specific wavelength, a plethora of extrinsic evidence contradicts defendants' selection of 622 nanometers467 as the lower limit of the "red color band." See 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 28-33.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: We believe that both parties agree that a color band is a range of wavelength, as we have talked about. We believe that for purposes of the patent, it is more appropriate to define it as the red region of the spectrum, but not to pick one set of numbers that define that with sharp boundaries because we don't think it lends itself to sharp boundaries, as I will go into more detail. We think that the patent itself gives you guidance as to how to determine whether you are red or not[.]TR at 509-10.

* * * * * *

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: [T]he question is, you know, is this the proper time for the Court to engage in fact-finding, to try to define an absolute bright line lower boundary for red because we don't believe we're ever going to get there in this case. I mean, that could be figured out through testing and psychological studies or through other resources and references, perhaps, but that hypothetical exercise is not going to be important because we know that the displays have red. The government calls them red. And we know that they are right within the range of what people call red, so we will never have to figure that out. Even if you did, that number just won't-doesn't square with the display industry. So maybe if I walk through it, it will become clearer as well.

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

So we had based our construction on the intrinsic evidence, which the patent itself does not put wavelengths in, because everybody knows what the red color band in [sic]. It is a region within the red portion of the spectrum.
TR at 512-13.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

After the claim construction hearing, Honeywell continued to argue that "red color band," as " described in the specification and set forth in the claims of the '914 patent, is light from the local source of light that provides the primary red color for producing a full color image in the display." 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 30 (emphasis added) (citing '914 patent, col. 4, ll. 46-54) ("Each color band 51-53 provides a monochromatic image in one primary color for the full color display, which appears on a front screen 15 as a combined full color image ... For example, ... the first monochromatic display transducer, such as a CRT providing a red color band 51, projects an image in the red spectrum[.]"); see also '914 patent, figure 3 (wherein the red color band 51 is mixed with the blue and green primaries to generate a full color image).

Honeywell's revised proposed construction was submitted to conform to the evidence at the claim construction hearing that "red color band" could be differentiated from other color bands by wavelengths. See 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 31. As Honeywell recognized, however, at least three extrinsic sources were cited as providing a wavelength for the "red color band," e.g., the CIE color chromatic diagram, Munsell coordinates, and dominate wavelength. Id. Therefore, Honeywell urged the court to adopt "dominant wavelength," i.e., 600 nm "or greater" to demark the boundaries of the "red color band." Id. at 31-32.

b. The Government's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

The Government's pre-hearing brief advised the court that "red color band" inherently would be understood by one of ordinary skill in the art to be " light in wavelengths from 622 to 770 nanometers." 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 30 (citing Mcgraw-Hill Dictionary of Scientific and Technical Terms (3d ed.1984) at 1344); see also id. at 31 (citing Ex. 22 at 52 (RCA Electro-Optics HandbookK) that red is in the 622 nm-770 nm range). The court also was advised that the prosecution history supported this proposed construction. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 468 31 (citing Ex. 7 '914 patent Wrapper at DOOO364-5,369) (referring to French patent application concerning night vision goggles compatible with "rouge" wavelengths bounded at approximately 620-770 nanometers); see also id. (citing Ex. 7 '914 patent Wrapper at D000633) (referring to United States Department of Navy document discussing night vision goggles compatible with a color chart showing a boundary of red at approximately 620 nanometers).

In addition, the inventor of the '914 patent testified during his deposition that "Red is in the range of 625 to 700 (nanometers)." Ex. 5 at 66.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: We talked a lot about color. I want to go back. I mean, I know that Your Honor has had a chance to review the primer, but color is a psychological response to a physical perception.
THE COURT: I found that very interesting when I read that. Because I certainly-did not consider it that way.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: You ask the inventors, I don't remember which one said it, but I asked him, you know, how would you determine if something is red and he said-
THE COURT: Psychological primer.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: There was a little bit of dispute over which one. I think-I mean, I think there is a physical element to it as well, but whichever one, the key is it is psychological. We asked one of the inventors how would you define what red is. He said I would ask a bunch of graduate students and do a study, but the key is the study has been done and that's what that Beare study that was cited by the plaintiffs talks about.

* * * * * *

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: You look at the claim context first. I know a lot of times I will come across things I know from the context I can't figure out, and I have to go to the dictionary. This is one of the instances where that's the case here. So we believe that since the patent doesn't define it, it is not defined anywhere in the intrinsic evidence, you have to say, well, what does one of ordinary skill in the art say about it. And we believe the [Mcgraw-Hill Dictionary] authoritative, famous book, shows clearly 622 to 770. There is no disputing that's what it says. Now, it is backed up by the [RCA Electro-Optics Handbook.]

* * * * * *

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Now, I want to talk about Honeywell's construction briefly. There are a number of problems with it, but I think the Court is focused in on the most important one. They say: Well, okay, it is inappropriate to construe red color band to any particular range of wavelengths. [Honeywell's counsel] said today maybe we can do a study and figure out what it is. That's not what that says in their brief. I don't know what their position is. But if it is this first one, patent is indefinite, claim is indefinite because you can't figure out whether you are in the red color band or not.
THE COURT: That's why I asked this gentleman before, why didn't the Patent Office pick that up.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: I mean, I really can't say. I think it is because the patent examiner has the same understanding of what red means as we do, which is that it is set within a particular well-known wavelength range. Now, what I am saying is that if you adopt their definition, it is indefinite because you cannot find whether you are inside the claim or outside the claim.... That's only if one of skill in the art would understand the bounds of the claim, when you read the claim. Now, we think that they would. They think that one skilled in the art wouldn't. And you would have this vague-
THE COURT: Remember yesterday when I asked the question, who was the person skilled in the art and whether or not they had to have-I probably said it inartfully, but aviation background, okay? 469 And it seemed to me that that question is equally relevant here because one who is skilled in the art of, it is more than just aviation, it is in terms of what is used in [instrument and panel lighting,] IPL they would have to be skilled in IPL?
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: I think the knowledge of night vision goggle compatible lighting is relevant.
THE COURT: Which is the broader category.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: But the claims are construed as one of skill in the art at the time of the invention.
THE COURT: And you wouldn't have had the IPL at that time?
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: You would have had IPL. You wouldn't have had NVIS red. So you go and ask-
THE COURT: Which came up in '88.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Right. So that's another reason why we think NVIS red is inapplicable. The wavelength cutoff, sure, they don't change over time, but somewhere, [the inventor] writing the patent in 1985 had no idea what NVIS red was because it didn't exist yet, so how could he have referenced that?
THE COURT: Right. And you don't want to use the word IPL. You gave me-GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Instrument and panel lighting.
THE COURT: I have got that. There was a broader category you used a moment ago.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Aviation red.
THE COURT: No, no.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Night vision compatible lighting?
THE COURT: Yes.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Okay.
THE COURT: Hold on.... [I]f I use that term in the time the patent was filed, that would have been a known specialty?
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: I think if you talk to someone who was knowledgeable in night-vision goggle compatible lighting and displays, we will add that in there since this talks about displays, that they would have had knowledge in display, manufacturing for cockpits.

c. Intervenor Lockheed Martin's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Lockheed Martin's pre-hearing construction of "red color band" was the same as that of the Government. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 29-35.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: Honeywell's construction potentially includes any range of visible wavelengths. And it is regardless of the color, and so there are no divisions. There are potentially no limits. And we think that such a construction really violates one of the fundamental tenets of patent law that we have been talking about over the past two days. And that is that a patent has to have metes and bounds. It has to have some definite tightness to it so people that are trying to improve upon what's there or make it better know what the invention is so they know what they are trying to improve upon. And we think that the construction of color band doesn't enable people to accomplish that.
THE COURT: Why wasn't that picked up by the patent examiner?
LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: I don't know, Your Honor. It could have been the patent examiner interpreted the term in accordance with our definition. Because, again, yesterday when-
THE COURT: Because if your point is valid, that is a big issue.
TR at 496-97.

LOCKHEED MARTIN'S COUNSEL: [I]f you look at Honeywell's proposed construction, it doesn't provide any guidance. If a color band isn't a specific band of blue, red, or green, how does the optical engineer know which wavelengths are of interest?470 If a color band can go across individual color bands, what do you design to? So in order to know which color bands to design to-
THE COURT: That's a very good point.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

Lockheed Martin represented that "[b]ased on the intrinsic evidence, one of ordinary skill in the art would determine that the term 'red color band' means a 'range of colors ... from 622 to 700 nanometers.' " 4/1/05 Int. Brief at 41. For the construction of this term, the court was advised that it was appropriate to consult dictionaries and technical treatises, along with the intrinsic evidence, i.e., specifically the Mcgraw-Hill Technical Dictionary (DMX 18 at DE-963; DMX 21 at DE-980) or the RCA Electro-Optics Handbook (DMX 22).

Here, Lockheed Martin emphasized the relevance of the prosecution history to the need to construe the color red within a specified wavelength range. Since Honeywell relies on a February 14, 2001 Information Disclosure Statement citing a French patent designating that the "red color band" begins at approximately 622 nanometers. See IMX 36 at DE-1401. Therefore, on June 20, 2002, Honeywell submitted a Supplemental Disclosure Statement, to include a technical article by Breitmaier and Reetz that contained the Kelly Chart of Color Designation of Lights, showing that the "red color band" begins at 622 nanometers. See IMX 36 at DE-1670.

Therefore, Lockheed Martin argued that this prior art confirms that one of ordinary skill in the art would define the color "red" in accordance with the defendants' proposed definition, rather than by dominant wavelength, particularly since the '914 patent does not specify a dominant wavelength and the only reference in the specification are to peak wavelength. See 4/1/05 Int. Brief at 46 (citing '914 patent, col. 5, ll. 8-12) ("the narrow color band may be defined ... as the band at which most light is transmitted by a phosphor coating on the CRT, typically a five to twenty nanometer band.").

Nevertheless, Lockheed Martin insisted that peak wavelength is "more important" than the dominant wavelength because "optical filters filter the physical manifestation of light, i.e., the peak wavelengths of phosphors in the visible range of the electromagnetic spectrum, and not the dominant wavelength, which is the wavelength at which the human eye perceives color." 4/1/05 Int. Brief at 46. Lockheed Martin also pointed out that Honeywell could have drafted the patent to cover specific lower wavelengths or define red to include " reddish orange, orangey red, or orange," but did not do so. Id. at 47. Therefore, Honeywell should not now be allowed to interpret words "to convey the special definition it now asserts." Id.

In Lockheed Martin's April 15, 2005 post-hearing brief, the court was urged "to define the term 'red color band' according to its peak wavelengths," because "one of ordinary skill in the art would utilize peak wavelength because this is where the filtering will occur." 4/15/05 Int. Brief at 20 (citing '914 patent, col. 5, ll. 8-11). In this regard, Lockheed Martin staked out a more aggressive position than the Government by arguing that " subsumed within Honeywell's construction is the apparent belief that if a display produces a color that is defined by a dominant wavelength, then the device must infringe irrespective of the wavelengths filtered by Honeywell's display system." 4/15/05 Int. Brief at 21.

d. The Court's Construction Of "Red Color Band" In This Case.

The term "red color band" is not defined in the claims or specification. Honeywell conceded that wavelengths are an appropriate measure of this term, as it must, in light of numerous citations to the symbol in the specification. See '914 patent, col. 3, l. 38; col. 4, l. 56; col. 5, ll. 7-8, 15. The court, however, declines to construe "red color band" without defining a specific range of light wavelengths, because the claim would be indefinite, in light of the psychological and subjective nature of the term without such 471 parameters. FN12

> FN12. The court is mindful that in Modine Mfg. Co. v. U.S. Int'l Trade Comm'n, 75 F.3d 1545, 1557 (Fed.Cir.1996), the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit held that "technical terms are not per se indefinite when expressed in qualitative terms without numerical limits .. . [m]athematical precision should not be imposed for its own sake." The court, however, does not view "red color band" as a technical term, but rather as a synonym for wavelengths expressed within a range measure of nanometers. See, e.g., '914 patent, col. 4, l. 13 ("colors at lower wavelengths (red)").
> In addition, as will be discussed below, after the claim construction hearing, Honeywell changed its position to agree to defendants' proposed construction of "blue color band" and "red color band" by specific ranges of wavelengths. Therefore, Honeywell's continued insistence that the court should not construe the "red color band" by a specific range of wavelengths, but may do so with regard to "blue color band" and "green color band," has no credible basis in logic.

Since defendants agree that the prosecution history of the '914 patent recognized the lower end of a red color band is 620 nm, rather than 622 nm, the court construes 620 nm as the lower end wavelength boundary of the "red color band." See 1/12/05 Def. Joint Brief at 31 (citing '914 Wrapper at D000364-65, 368-69); see also D000633. The court is aware that Honeywell's expert, Mr. Tannas, criticized Dr. Task's opinion that red color band begins at 622 nm, because "numerous prior patents .. . (see U.S. Patent Nos. 4,542,084; 4,390,637; 3,742,277; and 3,721,849) [have] cited a lower range." See PMX 36 ¶ 15 at 4. None of these patents, however, are listed as prior art of the '914 patent. See DMX 1. Moreover, although Honeywell introduced these patents at trial, see PMX 3-6, they are still extrinsic evidence that the court does not need to consult at this juncture in light of the fact that the intrinsic evidence provides a low range parameter in this case.

To determine the high end of the red color band, the court has no alternative based on the record, but to turn to extrinsic evidence. Although both the Mcgraw Hill and RCA Electro-Optics Handbook define the upper end of the red color band range as 770 nm, the court must decline to adopt that suggested construction since prior art of a related technology is more relevant than dictionary or treatise definitions, albeit latter are industry-specific and widely respected reference sources. In this case, USPTO No. 4,390,637, filed on September 9, 1981 and issued on June 28, 1983, "X-Ray Absorbing Glass For A Color Cathode Ray Tube Having a Controlled Chromaticity Value And A Selective Light Absorption" describes "highly transparent for the red color light (the wavelength of about 610-780 m)[.]" 4,390,637 patent, col. 1, ll. 29-30. FN13 The court has reviewed the entire prosecution history of the '914 patent and related patents and found no reference to USPTO No. 4,390,637. Nevertheless, this prior art is extrinsic evidence and, in the court's judgment, more relevant and reliable than either industry-specific references and the expert testimony proffered by the parties. Therefore, the court construes "red color band" in this case as having an upper end range of 780 nm. FN14

> FN13. The invention described in this patent "relates to glass for use as a color cathode ray tubes, and in particular, to X-ray absorbing glass for use as panels of color television tubes having a selective light absorption and a controlled chromaticity value." 4,390,637, col. 1, ll. 8-12.
> FN14. Although several federal trial courts have issued constructions related to the wavelength of the color red, these constructions have not been reviewed by the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit. See, e.g., Metrologic Instruments, Inc. v. PSC, Inc., 2003 WL 22077652, at *2 (D.N.J.2003) ("Because laser light is usually measured in the range of 640-670 nanometers, ... the appropriate wavelength of the color red .... [T]he high band-pass filter, which blocks ambient light with wavelengths above 640 nanometers, is also called the red pass filter. [The invention at issue] lies at 670 nanometers, in the visible region of the electromagnetic spectrum, at or near the color red."); Jena v. Bio-Rad Lab., 2002 WL 181699, at *12 (S.D.N.Y.2002) (federal trial court relying on Eugene Hecht and Alfred Zajac, Optics (1974), stating that the low end of the red color range was 622 nm and the high end was 780 nm).

Honeywell also argued that in the event that the court construed "red color band" by a range of wavelengths, the court also should specify that the " dominant wavelength" should be 600 nm or greater. See 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 31. Although there was a great deal of discussion at the claim construction hearing about the relevance of dominant*472 versus peak wavelengths, since the '914 patent did not specifically address this issue, the court has declined to import what might be viewed as a limitation into the '914 patent by construing "red color band" either by a dominant or peak wavelength. See Nellcor Puritan Bennett, Inc. v. Masimo Corp., 402 F.3d 1364, 1370 (Fed.Cir.2005) (forbidding a federal trial judge from adding a "limitation that is not present in the claim language and is not supported by the specification or prosecution history"). FN15

> FN15. On April 20, 2005, after the claim construction hearing, Honeywell moved for leave to supplement the record with: Dr. Darrel Hopper, "Draft Standard for Color Active Matrix Liquid Crystal Displays in U.S. Military Aircraft: Recommended Best Practices" (Doc. No. GVT032-0001-00740). Honeywell represented to the court that this document states that red is defined by a dominant wavelength and in the field of military cockpit display, a claimed wavelength of 610 nanometers is considered "red." See 4/20/05 Honeywell Motion at 1-5 (citing GVT032-00034; GVT032-00037, Table 4). The court admitted this document into the record to create a complete record, but has not relied on it to construe "red color band" because the document was published in June 1994, almost a decade after the '914 patent issued and therefore is irrelevant. Moreover, the document is not a party admission against interest for several reasons, not the least of which is it is a "draft" and never formally was adopted by the Government for any purpose.

12. "Predetermined Red Color Band."

The parties have agreed that the term " predetermined red color band," as used in the claims of the '914 patent, means "a specific range of wavelengths within the red color band." Jt. Stip. ¶ 5.

13. "Substantially Blocks."

[20] Claim 1(a) describes a display system comprising a first optical filter that "filters light" and "substantially blocks light[.]" '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 1, 5. Claim 1(b) describes a display system comprising a second optical filter that also "filters light" and "substantially blocks light. " '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 7, 8-9.

Claim 2(b) describes a display system comprising a fourth filter that "filters light" and "cooperating with said plurality of filters to substantially block at least said narrowband of the red color band[.]" '914 patent, col. 6, l. 26.

The parties have proposed the following competing constructions of "substantially blocks":

a. Honeywell's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

In Honeywell's pre-hearing brief, the court was advised that "[a]s used in the patent, substantially blocks means to obstruct the passage of light sufficiently to permit the night vision aid to be used for the intended purpose." 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 34 (citing PMX 37 (Tannas Suppl. Report) ¶ 2 at 2; Webster's at 235 defining "block"). In all three claims utilizing the term " substantially blocks," Honeywell argued that "the objective of the substantially blocking is to permit the night vision aid to work ... without being disrupted by light from the local color display." 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 35 (citing '914 patent, col. 2, ll. 5-7) ("[T]o permit light which originates at the full color display from overwhelming the night vision aid."). The court further was advised that the "benchmark" for determining whether light is "substantially blocked is whether the night vision aid can be used for its intended purpose." 12/20/04 Honeywell Brief at 36 (emphasis added).

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, Honeywell argued that "substantially blocks" is "talking about what night vision goggles do." TR at 702.

> HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: So Plaintiff's construction is that it obstructs the passage of light sufficiently to permit the 473 night vision aid to be used for its intended purpose.

TR at 704.

* * * * * *

THE COURT: Is your noun the same for all of the ...

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: The noun is different ... in ours [construction of "substantially blocks"], we're saying it's the night vision aid, to render night vision aid suitable. And in the second, in Defendant's construction, they are saying it renders the invention suitable.

THE COURT: Is there a difference?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Well, we think there is a difference, Your Honor. I don't know how-this is one of those where we're just trying to do what we think the claim says. I'm not sure why-what the significance of what the issue is, but it's one we didn't reach agreement on. I think the claim example here, it's quite clear substantial blocking-this is claim 2, substantial blocking that is associated with the fourth filter which is on the night vision aid. So the whole notion is that you're blocking to make the night vision aid work the way it's supposed to work. The-likewise, here, you are substantially blocking-this is in claim 1, to make the night vision aid work. And then substantial blocking up here. It all seems-the whole invention is associated with preventing interfering with the night vision aid. So I'm not sure what it means when they say, you know, the-render the entire invention suitable for its intended purpose, versus a night vision aid. So since we don't know what they're getting at, and we do think the claim itself, the whole substantial blocking aspect was relating to the proper functionality of the night vision aid, that's why we have focused on that in our construction.

And perhaps we'll learn more from the Defendants and why they think that's incorrect. But there's no requirement-substantially blocked imposes no particular requirement on the colors that are displayed on the local color display itself.

It's all-it's all surrounding what's happening for the functionality of the night vision aid in both claims. Here even in claim 1, in 1(a), we have substantially blocks the light. But, again, that blocking, going back to figure 1, which there's no-

* * * * * *

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: So in any event, the-the substantial blocking, again, if you look at figure 1, remember, the whole notion of why we're doing this blocking is to permit the night vision aid to operate as it's intended to, at the same time that it, again, doesn't-without interfering with the display itself[.]

THE COURT: So the pilot can look at the display and look straight out into the ... window?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Right. So there are three areas we disagree on. We already touched on one. I haven't got much more to say on it other than the fact that the third one, which is what we just covered-substantially blocks requires that the night vision aid or the entire-whether substantially blocks requires the night vision aid or the entire invention to be used for its intended purpose. That's the question.

We think that intended purpose is a perfectly good way to characterize this term. But we think the perfectly good ought to be looked at in the context of the night vision aid.

THE COURT: Well, your construction ... you're using the word obstruct the passage of light sufficiently, which to me means "a lot of."

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Actually, I think it might be the other way around. We're not trying to quantify it. Our second issue-

THE COURT: You're not.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: No. The quantification is does it work for its intended purpose. In other words-but there's no quantification of this in the patent, nor should there be. If the thing works and it's doing what it's supposed to do, then so be it.

THE COURT: Let's back up ... [i]s there a finite amount of light that needs to be either blocked or obstructed?

*474 HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: The reality-

THE COURT: Do we know?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Well, I think-I don't think there's a number that exists.

THE COURT: Could you put a number there?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: There certainly have been-there are certainly numbers of things that have been done, well after the patent, to try to figure out well, how good does it have to be, you know, and so forth. That wasn't in existence at the time of the patent. That wasn't in the inventor's head. In the inventor's head was I am going to make something which is unsuitable suitable. Our view is that's sort of self-explanatory in the end, frankly, if this thing makes its way into a $500 million aircraft with a several hundred thousand dollar display, it must be there because it's doing its job. And I-we don't think there's really any more that needs to be said about that in these patents. One might come up with another patent that has all sorts of other things and tests and parameters, but that's not what this patent is all about. This patent tells you you're going to do this and make it, and it's going to do what it's supposed to do.

THE COURT: Let's go back to the idea of the engineer looking at this and wants to make one of these things, or make something better than what you have. How does that person know that a-a person skilled in the art know how much [light] to block?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Well, you know, frankly, there's no-you have to see if it works. There's nothing in the rules or the law that says you can't do routine experimentation. Not everything in the world is set down and quantified. But if it's doing its job, if it's blocking-if it didn't work adequately without the filters and it does work adequately with the filters, it's substantially blocking and it's achieving its intended purpose.

THE COURT: Well, is the amount blocked each time different? In other words-

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Well, I think-I guess, the reality is if the display has a changing image, what's actually blocking is going to vary with what's in the-what the output is of the display.

THE COURT: Of the display.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: I think as a general matter the filter properties are not going to change, you know. So that's an implementation area. But, again, this is not a patent that's designed to sort of figure out exactly how you implement, nor do you have to. But the invention here is the notion of striking a compromise, it's block some light that makes the night vision goggles suitable and, you know, permit enough so you can see color in the display.. .. There are really three issues. The first one, I think we've actually touched on the first one a little bit here, because the claim talks about substantially blocks. We've talked about obstructing passage sufficient to work for its intended purpose. And the Defendants have added in the word, a large degree. Well-

THE COURT: Go back ... It seems to me-obstructed to me is kind of a measure. It seems to me that you're-it implies to me that you are blocking more in your definition than they are in theirs.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: That's funny, because I certainly hadn't intended that, Your Honor. We say obstructs it sufficiently to make it work. They say obstructs a large degree. I guess our view is it doesn't make much sense to go from substantially to large degree. You're substituting one word of degree for another one, ... they're trying to import a large measure of blockage in there. And it may not have to be a large amount. It just has to be substantial enough to do the job. So we think [the defendants are] the ones who are putting in a measure of degree of blockage that's just not there. And it really doesn't make much sense to take one relative term of degree and swap it out for another one. Claim construction doesn't sort of compel you to sort of say let's change every word in the claim and come up with a synonym for it. Because it's not particularly helpful to go from one synonym*475 to another, ... there's nothing that's compelling. Large degree, for example, is not anywhere in the claim. It may well be ... one of many definitions of substantially[.] But I don't think that means ... we haven't gone in the claim and every word you find substitute a dictionary definition. And oftentimes dictionary definitions don't shed any light on things.

* * * * * *

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: [T]he claim language itself says substantially blocks. And in their construction, they then convert that. I think their large degree of is probably their synonym for substantially. So what they're doing is saying let's take substantially, which is a matter of degree in the claim, and let's stick in a large degree in lieu of that word in our construction. And I don't think that necessarily sheds a lot of light on the subject. And frankly, whether it's a large degree or an adequate degree or a-is-all that really matters is is it doing the job.

THE COURT: Would it be the same if they had you eliminate the words a large degree so it would be to render light unsuitable?

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: I have a problem with that part of the construction, too.... they have substituted blocks ... if you were to figure out where that came from, the light-the unsuitable for passage is a dictionary definition-one dictionary definition for the word blocks. I can block the door and render it unsuitable for passage, right. In the context of a filter and light, it's just not the appropriate definition because-actually filters don't render light unsuitable for passage. That's not what [filters] do. So it's just the wrong definition. Filters do block. Or they can absorb or they can reflect. There's all sorts of ways filters work. They don't render light unsuitable for passage. It's just not technically correct. It doesn't do anything for the light. It either sort of turns it into heat or redisburses it. So we don't think it's a proper choice for a dictionary definition in this case. So for that reason we-we think that the more proper-the notion of blockage is obstructs the passage.

THE COURT: All right.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: We agree it obstructs the passage, but doesn't render the light unsuitable. And ... the last point, substantially blocks requires that the night vision aid-or doesn't require the night vision aid or the entire invention to be used for its intended purpose. I'm not quite sure where the [G]overnment is going with that. But the claim itself to us seems to suggest that the substantially blocked terminology is being used in the context of the night vision aid....

THE COURT: Are you going to move to the difference between [defendants'] use of the word invention and your use of the word night vision aid? Because your invention is larger than just-or more than just the aid itself.

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

> HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Well, the invention is ... what the filter is doing ... it's the filter that is substantially blocking. And that's the filter on the night vision aid to render the night vision aid unsuitable. I don't know that that's a huge issue for us. I just think that what we've proposed is correct.... I don't want to muddy up the issue into ... I don't know what [defendants are] suggesting we have to prove when they say the invention is used by-I guess I don't understand-I don't think they've helped us any here.

TR at 707-16.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

In post hearing briefing, Honeywell reaffirmed that " substantially blocks" appears in three claims to describe the "function of three different filters," i.e., 1.) the first optical filter in Claim 1; 2.) the second optical filter in Claim 1; and 3.) the fourth filter in Claim 2. See 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 47 (citing '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 5, 8-9, 26). Therein, Honeywell contended that the term "substantially blocks" has the same meaning in each of the claims, i.e., "obstructs the passage of light sufficiently to permit the night vision aid to be used for its intended purpose." Id. Each term has the same 476 meaning each time that it is used, i.e., "obstruct the passage of light sufficiently to permit the night vision aid to be used for its intended purpose." 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 47. When "block" is used in context with the claim, Honeywell asserts that it is clear that "light is being rendered unsuitable and that the 'obstruction' is an optical filter." Id. at 36 (citing '914 patent, claim 1, i.e., " optical filter ... that substantially blocks light."). Honeywell further advised the court that the " objective of the substantial blocking is to prevent light from the local display from interfering with the night vision goggles ... [i.e.,] the appropriate benchmark for measuring the degree to which light must be blocked is whether the night vision aid works for its intended purpose." Id.; see also 4/15/05 Honeywell Brief at 23 (emphasis added) (" no quantitative test is required for those skilled in the art to understand the meaning of substantially blocks or determine the limits of the claim.").

Honeywell also attacked defendants' interpretation of "substantially" to require that the offending light is to be blocked "to a large degree." 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 47. To which Honeywell appropriately asked the rhetorical question: by how large a degree? Id. at 48. Although Honeywell conceded that no quantifiable answer is provided by the Government, the court was informed that the '914 patent "implicitly defines substantially blocks by describing the objective of filtering light for the display 'to prevent light which originates at the full color display from overwhelming the night vision aid.' " Id. at 48 (citing '914 patent, col. 2, ll. 6-7). Therefore, "substantially" should be construed as " requiring the night vision aid to function for its intended purpose." Id. (citing Seattle Box Co., Inc. v. Indus. Crating & Packing, Inc., 731 F.2d 818, 826 (Fed.Cir.1984)) ("[The] court must determine whether the patent's specification provides some standard for measuring that degree."). Honeywell also urged that "in the context of the '914 patent, ' substantially' should be construed as requiring the night vision aid to function for its intended purpose . .., i.e., if the filters do not block light for the display sufficiently to allow night vision goggles to be used in the cockpit, then the claim is not infringed." 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 48.

Finally, Honeywell challenged defendants' proposed construction of "such that the invention is fit for the intended purpose" to render the claim "vague and indefinite." 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 48. Honeywell asserted, however, without citation, that "the '914 patent imposes no such requirement." Id. On one hand, Honeywell argued that "[t]he objective of substantially blocking 'light from the local color display' pertains solely to the night vision aid." Id. On the other, Honeywell argued that "one of the objectives of the ['914 display system] invention is to allow the full color display in a NVIS compatible cockpit"-an "objective not invoked by the substantially blocks." Id. (emphasis in original). Nevertheless, the court was advised that the objective of allowing a full color display in a NVIS compatible cockpit is "achieved by ... the requirement for a color display and a red color band." Id. (emphasis added) (citing Golight, Inc. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 355 F.3d 1327, 1331 (Fed.Cir.2004)) (holding that patentees are not required to include in each claim all of the " advantages or features described as significant or important in the written description."); Resonate Inc. v. Alteon Websystems, Inc., 338 F.3d 1360, 1367 (Fed.Cir.2003) ("[W]hen the written description sets out two different problems present in the prior art, is it necessary that the invention claimed, and thus each and every claim in the patent, address both problems? We conclude ... the answer is no.").

b. The Government's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Prior to the claim construction hearing, the Government argued that the " 'ordinary meaning' of 'substantially blocks' is clear from intrinsic evidence ... the claim terms ... read in light of the specification, i.e., "filtration must 'be very efficient' so light from the display will be nearly completely blocked." See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 36-37 (citing '914 patent, col. 1, ll. 1-54). Since the purpose of the optical filter "is to allow *477 the use of a color display in connection with an NVG ... 'substantially' means 'to a larger degree ... such that the invention is fit for its intended purpose.' " 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 37 (citing '914 patent, col. 3, ll. 8-11) ("[T]he purpose of the optical filter is to allow the use of a color display in the connection with an NVG.").

The Government, however, appeared so uncertain about the persuasiveness of this argument that it resorted to a dictionary definition and expert testimony in support before even mentioning the prosecution history in passing, that it attempted to reinforce by the disfavored testimony of the inventor. Compare 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 36-37 (citing Webster's and Dr. Task) with 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 38 ("This purpose is evident from ... the prosecution history and repeated by the inventors.") (citing '914 Wrapper D000109; Ex. 5 Cohen 7, ll. 16-18).

On the other hand, the Government persuasively argued that the word "overwhelm" is not defined in the patent, discussed in the prosecution history, and apparently is not a common term used by one skilled in the art. Therefore, to define " substantially blocks" by reference to "overwhelm" could render Claim 1(a), Claim 1(b) and Claim 2(b) indefinite. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 38.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

At the claim construction hearing, the Government summarized the three significant differences in the parties' construction of the term "substantially blocks."

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: [T]he biggest difference ... is the invention versus night vision aid.... [W]e believe that [our construction] provides a workable test as one reading the patent would understand it.... [O]ne skilled in the art ... in night vision goggle compatible, will understand what the invention as a whole was meant to do.

THE COURT: I was surprised that both sides decided they wanted to construe this. Do you want to shed some light as to why?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Why construe this at all? ... Well, Your Honor, I think it becomes necessary because, first of all, substantially ... has different meanings depending on the application and depending how the specification shows you should use it.

THE COURT: Okay.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Second of all, substantially has different meanings depending on what the purpose of the invention is. So we wanted to make clear what the purpose of the invention was. Also we want to give Your Honor sort of a context for deciding this in terms of what someone would understand substantially blocked to mean.

THE COURT: Okay.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Substantially blocked was used in the claims. Your Honor was right to point out that there are three times it's used. We don't believe it's always used in conjunction with the goggles.... [Y]ou can see that from 1(a). It says the filter passes light comprised of predetermined color bands, including predetermined red color band, and substantially blocks light associated with color bands other than that predetermined color band. That filter is on the display.

* * * * * *

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: The filter in part A is the filter on the display.... This filter in part B is the filter on the goggles. Both of them must substantially block, whatever that means, whatever we decide that to mean.

THE COURT: Right. But they're two different items.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Two different items. Two different things. We think that draws the invention in as a whole as opposed to just the night vision aid.... [T]here's nothing in the claim that tells you exactly what substantially means and what it doesn't. It doesn't give you a whole lot of context. But the specification uses substantially blocked only once. And, again, it's not extremely helpful. But what it does tell you is that the other filters, 23, 25, ... probably 24 may need to be in there as well, and that refers to figure 3, 478 which-... 23 and 25 are the filters that-you know, it says 25 being a notch filter. The other filter 23, 25, I think that's probably a typo. I think they probably meant to refer to one or the other. Substantially blocks light in a predetermined red color band. So that's the one use of it in the specification....

THE COURT: Let me ask you something totally different. Is substantially blocks in one sense redundant if you use the word notch?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: No, Your Honor. Because it has to block light or substantially block light of-

THE COURT: But I thought that's what [it] did, when we were looking at what a notch was, the notch did block within that range.... Do you remember what I'm talking about?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: I do exactly know what you're talking about.... Filters don't have to be 100 percent blocking or passing.

THE COURT: So the notch itself is not a total block.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: You could have a notch that only blocks at 50 percent.

THE COURT: Okay.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: I think that what this does is it adds in it must substantially block, whatever substantially means. Now, we think there's context for this given in the specification, because it says filtration of the objectionable light must be very efficient because small amounts of light within the active frequency range of the night vision goggle will overwhelm the aid. So it ties it to very efficient blocking. The blocking must be very efficient.

THE COURT: I thought that was an unusual use of words, too.... [F]iltering needs to be efficient.

* * * * * *

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Now, the term substantially blocks isn't used in the prosecution history [or] in any of the art. We believe that it's a common word without special meaning. A dictionary definition is appropriate. The renders light unsuitable for passage comes straight out of [Webster's] dictionary. They use [Webster's] dictionary as well, a different definition. We believe ours is appropriate because it's a transitive verb, and because it says that the filter substantially blocks light. So if the filter is acting on the light and needs to render the light unsuitable for passage.... Now, getting to ... substantially in patent law is a term of magnitude or approximation.... If you look at claim 3, [it] says substantially 5 to 20 nanometers wide. We haven't even discussed claim 3 .... But substantially is used there as an approximation term. Approximately 5 to 20 nanometers wide. But it can also be used as magnitude. Now what you do to determine which one is you look at the specification and how it's used in the specification. The specification says it must be very efficient. Okay. Well, what does very efficient mean. That's a matter of degree as well.

So that leads you to the conclusion that substantially means to a large degree. Now, [Honeywell's counsel] has said well, that's just substituting one-one word for another.... But we think that it's actually clarifying between the two uses of substantially in patent law, which is that it's signifying a large degree. Now, I would also point out that [Honeywell's] construction suffers from the same fault, which is they use sufficiently. That's a matter of degree as well ... substantially necessarily has a sort of mushy definition. And so sufficiently large degree, ... [defendants' construction] is more appropriate because of the very efficient language. You understand that it has to be, to a fairly high degree, a blockage. That's why we inserted that language there. And I don't think it's redundant ... [or] useless to make that construction. Now, I want to also talk briefly about how one of skill in the art would understand what substantially block means, because I think that goes to the invention as a whole.

THE COURT: That's why you use the word invention in your definition.... As opposed to just the night vision aid.

479 GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: That's correct, Your Honor. We believe the law is clear that when you're construing substantially, you look to the purpose of the invention. And so substantially has to mean that whatever it does, it achieves the purposes of the invention. I think that's pretty much common sense, but it's also the law. So you need to look at the invention as a whole. Now, what's the purpose of the invention as a whole? Is it to have a workable night vision aid? Yes. But there's more to it than that. Because it's also you have to have a color display-

THE COURT: You've got to be able to read at the same time.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: That's readable, usability within the same environment as the night vision aid. So that adds a little bit more complexity to the whole question. I-I think it's going to come out later, and again, I don't want to get into it too much, but I think that the-the night vision aid being workable is not a usable distinction. And-a usable measure of what substantially blocks is. If you look at the invention as a whole, there were known ways to measure compatibility between a color display and a night vision goggle in 1985. And I'll give you two of them right here.

THE COURT: In terms of quantitative-quantified?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: There's both a quantitative and a qualitative way to do it. The quantitative way to do it is you measure overlap, you look at the curve that the filtered light is putting out. And you look at the curve that the sensitivity of the goggle is. Then you do sort of a mathematical integration under the overlap. Because they're going to overlap ... the area under that had to be under a certain amount.... [I]t was called ANVIS radiance.... [T]hat's actually how the military measures compatibility today. But it was coming out in 1985 ... is even talked about in the prosecution history as one of the ways [the military was] looking at making things compatible and measuring whether things are compatible.

* * * * * *

THE COURT: Well, could they have put a measurement into the claim? ... Or is this one ... where you don't need to because the person skilled in the art automatically is going to know what that number is?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: ... [S]omeone skilled in the art would understand. Now, I'm not saying that they adopted it. As I'm going to say here, there are two measurements. We think they give about the same answer.

THE COURT: And what type of skill would the person have to have to know both of these measurements?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: These were known in the field in 1985. And by the field, I mean the field of night vision goggle compatible lighting and displays.

THE COURT: Okay.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: It was being developed by the military. They were really the ones that were looking for how to do all of this. Now the qualitative measurement, as I was getting to, is what you would do is ... put a user in a cockpit with the goggles on in a dark hangar, simulating night. And you put a chart with a whole bunch of lines, a contrast chart on the far wall of the hangar. With the lights off. Then you turn on the cockpit lights. And he would be looking through the goggles at this chart. If there was any degradation of performance, they didn't pass this test.... [T]he first one was designed to sort of mimic the second, but you can get a quantitative measurement rather than qualitative. Now the reason I bring this up is that these were tests that were known at the time. Again, it goes back to definiteness. And a claim has to be understood, the metes and bounds have to be understood by those skilled in the art. And we believe these were out here and they were understood. And, therefore-and these measure whether the invention as a whole-

THE COURT: And the patent examiner would know all that just by looking at this? He would have understood that these two measurements-

480 GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: I think he would have learned by reviewing the prosecution history.... I'm assuming, because I don't know what the examiner was reviewing.... [T]he problem with-with focusing on whether the NVGs operate is problematic. First of all, ... it's contrary to the stated purpose of the invention, which comes out at the very beginning of the ['914] patent language, ... [and] says [that] it is desired that a night vision aid be operable while a full color display is ... presented in the vicinity of the goggles. And in particular, to operate them in an environment in which a full color display is illuminated. So you've got to have a workable goggle and workable display. If you just focus on the goggle, you can just turn off the display. Or you can cover it up so it's not readable during daylight. That's a big problem. Because if you put too thick of a filter over the top of it, you can't read it during the day.... But the problem is Honeywell can't tell you what the test for goggles working for an intended purpose is. They're going to say, well, you look at the patent and the patent says it won't overwhelm the goggles. What does overwhelm mean? And they'll give you a list of things. Now, my problem with that is that if you've got five different tests and you meet three of them, do you fall within or without the claims. And that's the real problem here. So our view is that, if you only look at the goggles, the claims become indefinite because you can't-there's no accepted, in 1985, measure for whether a goggle works for its intended purpose. That's why you need to look at the invention as a whole.... [T]he prosecution history ... comes out of the same article that we were discussing earlier with the Kelly chart, which is by two gentlemen named Breitmaier and Reetz. And if you recall, Your Honor, ... Ferdinand Reetz was the gentleman who drafted that document that described the rationale behind the military standard... [that] comes from a-the 10th European Rotorcraft Forum that-... is August 28th through 31st, 1984.... [I]t's part of Defendant's Exhibit 36 . .. DE 1621[.]

THE COURT: Okay.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Now, do you see the spectral radiance limitations in ... the middle of the page? It talks about defining a new quantity called ANVIS radiance, defined in the units of AR. It's the amount of energy emitted by a light source that is visible through the ANVIS defined as the integral of the curve generated by multiplying the spectral radiance of the light source by the relative spectral response of the ANVIS. That's what I was talking about before, the two curves. When you multiply the two curves together, you get some-some function. And then what this shows you is that ANVIS radiance is you integrate from 450 to 930 the-that function.

THE COURT: And why do you want to know that?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Because ... that's a measure of how much light is getting through.... And so if you integrate under it, that gives you the area under the curve.

THE COURT: So under ... is what you're telling me is that you could actually determine whether it was substantially blocked or not by utilizing this formula?

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: There was a standard set-and it's in here that the military says [its]-okay.... They wanted to use-helicopter pilots wanted to use these goggles. The problem was ... defoliated trees, trees with no leaves on them are very dark, don't reflect very much light at all. And you want to fly on nights where there's no full moon. You want no moon at all because you want the other guy not to see you coming.... Now the problem is ... you don't want anything to show up brighter than tree bark and starlight. So what they did is calculated what the radiance was of tree bark and starlight and came up with a number. ... That ends up being this number here. It says that the cockpit lights should be no brighter than the outside scene when viewed through the ANVIS. The ANVIS radiance of the cockpit lights should not exceed 1.7 times 10 to the negative 10 AR when the cockpit is lighted to an acceptable level. So that was a standard that *481 was known ... you could use that to determine whether a display was compatible with your night vision goggle.

THE COURT: Okay. And how does that affect the substantially blocks?
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: We believe that that is one measure that one of skill in the art would use to determine-
THE COURT: To determine whether it's substantially blocked.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Whether it was substantially blocked. If it met that standard, it would be substantially blocked.... This was known, this is a test that was known-
THE COURT: At the time of the patent.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL:-in 1985. And-
THE COURT: Why wasn't it referenced then? Does it need to be?
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Well, I don't know. I think it was referenced in that it was inserted in the prosecution history.
THE COURT: Okay.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: So it was before the Patent Office.... The examiners presumed to have considered everything in the prosecution history.... So it was at least familiar with this. As I said, there was another measure that was being used at the time that was this qualitative measurement, you sat in the cockpit and looked at the chart. But I think that the idea was that those were approximations. I don't think Honeywell is going to give you a test such as this that is going to give you ... what can the night vision goggle be used for. What is the intended purpose of the night vision goggle. Well, it's to look outside. Well, what is preventing the intended use from happening? Is it a 10 percent reduction in view? Is it a 20 percent reduction in view? They don't know. We don't know. So you ... need to look at the whole thing.

TR at 722-37 (emphasis added).

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

The Government's post-hearing claim construction brief argued, again without citation to authority, that the "ordinary meaning of 'substantially blocks' ... is to render a large degree of light unsuitable for passage by an optical filter, such that the invention is fit for the intended purpose." 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 44. Moreover, in this regard, the Government advised the court that it is necessary to consider " some extrinsic evidence to determine the degree of blocking that would have been considered ' substantial' at the time of the invention ... because the claims ... [i.e., the specification and prosecution history] context provides little information as to the meaning of the term 'substantially.' " Id. The Government conceded, however, that the specification's use of "blocks" implies that an optical filter was acting on "incident light to obstruct or prevent its passage." Id. (citing '914 patent, col. 3, ll. 22-24).

c. Intervenor Lockheed Martin's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Lockheed Martin's proposed construction of " substantially blocks" was the same as that of the Government. See 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 36-38.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

Lockheed Martin also adopted the Government's proposed construction of "substantially blocks" at the claim construction hearing. See TR at 737.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

Likewise, in Lockheed Martin's post-claim construction briefs, the Government's proposed construction of "substantially blocks" also was adopted. See 4/1/05 Int. Brief at 48; see also 4/15/05 Int. Brief at 24.

d. The Court's Construction Of "Substantially Blocks" In This Case.

© 2005 Thomson/West. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

66 Fed.Cl. 400

In Claim 1(a), a first optical filter is described as a notch filter that "substantially blocks" light associated with color bands. 482 See '914 patent, col. 6, l. 5. The court construes the verb "blocks" as preventing light from a color display from reaching the night vision aid and "substantially" to mean in a sufficient amount to enable the night vision aid to function. See '914 patent, col. 2, ll. 6-7 ("It is ... desired to prevent light which originates at the full color display from overwhelming the night vision aid."); see also '914 patent, col. 2, ll. 13-15 (" [T]he first optical filter is placed over displays, which may otherwise present light that would interfere with the ANVIS."); Ecolab, Inc. v. Envirochem, Inc., 264 F.3d 1358, 1367 (Fed.Cir.2001) (quoting Pall Corp. v. Micron Seps., Inc., 66 F.3d 1211, 1217 (Fed.Cir.1995)) (" We note that like the term ... 'substantially' is a descriptive term commonly used in patent claims to 'avoid a strict numerical boundary to the specified parameter.' "); Uniroyal, Inc. v. Rudkin-Wiley Corp., 837 F.2d 1044, 1056 (Fed.Cir.1988) (The term " 'substantially' ... must be interpreted in light of the specification and prosecution history[.]").

In Claim 1(b), a second optical filter is described as a notch filter that "substantially blocks" light associated with color bands. See '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 8-9. Here, too, the court construes the verb " blocks" as preventing light from a color display from reaching the night vision aid and "substantially " to mean in a sufficient amount to enable the night vision aid to function. Id.

In Claim 2(b), a fourth filter located at the night vision aid works with other filters to "substantially block" at least a narrowband of the red color band from being admitted into the night vision aid. The court construes the verb "block," at a minimum, as preventing light from the narrowband of the red color band from entering the night vision aid. The use of the verb "being admitted" renders the term " substantially blocks" unnecessary surplusage, since if the light at issue is prevented from being admitted into the night vision aid, ipso facto, such light also is substantially blocked.

14. "First," "Second," "Third," "Fourth," And " Filter."

Claim 1(a) includes the term "first optical filter" twice. See '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 1-2. Claim 2(b) includes the term "second optical filter" twice. See '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 7-8. Claim 2(a)(1) includes the term "first filter." See '914 patent, col. 6, l. 6. Claim 2(a)(2) includes the term "second filter." See '914 patent, col. 6, l. 18. Claim 2(a)(3) includes the term "third filter." See '914 patent, col. 6, l. 20. Claim 2(a)(4) includes the term "fourth filter" twice. See '914 patent, col. 6, ll. 23-24.

The parties have proposed the following competing constructions of "First," "Second," "Third," " Fourth," and "Filter:"

The court has not repeated the parties' arguments here since, as a matter of law, it is settled that the use of "first," "second," "third" is clearly "not a serial or numerical limitation, [because] the claim does not follow a consecutive order.... The claim is thus clearly not using the ordinals-first, second, third-to show a consecutive numerical limit but only to distinguish or identify the various members of the group." Gillette Co. v. Energizer Holdings, Inc., 405 F.3d 1367, 1373 (Fed.Cir.2005); *see also 3M Innovative Properties Co. v. Accordingly, the court declined to construct "first," "second," "third," etc., to impose a serial limitation on a claim, but rather identify the various members of a group. See Gillette, 405 F.3d at 1373-74.

Honeywell Markman Slide 190; Gov't Markman Slide 079 (bold added by parties).

a. Honeywell's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

In Honeywell's pre-hearing brief, the court was advised that "[i]n the context of the patent, blue color band means a range of wavelengths with the blue region of the visible spectrum." 12/23/05 Honeywell Brief at 36 (emphasis in original) (citing Tannas Initial Report ¶ 17; Tannas Rebuttal Report ¶ 18). This construction was represented as being consistent with the specification wherein the "blue color band 53 is the light emitted by a monochromatic display transducer, such as a CRT, in the blue region of the visible spectrum." 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 37 (citing '914 patent, col. 4, ll. 40-43) ("the local source of light 50 comprises ... blue 53 color bands sourced from monochromatic display transducers, such as for example three monochromatic cathode ray tubes[.]"); see also id. at '914 patent, col. 4, ll. 46-47 (" Each color band 51-53 provides a monochromatic image in one primary color for the full color display. "). Honeywell argued that it is improper to define " blue color band" using specific wavelengths. See 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 37. In the alternative, if the court were to define "blue color band" by wavelength, Honeywell asserted that the defendants' proposed ranges are incorrect, referencing U.S. Patent No. 4,390,637, wherein the following wavelengths for the blue color band emitted by a cathode ray tube were represented to be 430-460 nanometers, as opposed to the defendants' proposed 455-492 nanometers. Id. (citing USPTO Patent No. 4,390,637, col. 5, 11.20-22). Based on this prior art, and other extrinsic evidence, Honeywell warned the court that defendants have specified a lower limit for the blue color band that excludes the wavelengths emitted by a blue CRT, which the '914 patent provides as "an example of a blue color band. " 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 38 (citing '914 patent, col. 4, 11. 40-43).

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: Our position, for the same reasons we described previously, is that it's just not appropriate to put wavelength ranges. And now I have this same concern that I'm-that once you start using these ranges which came from the same source, I don't know what they mean or how they get interpreted. I'm not so sure-I have now come to the conclusion they don't shed much light on the subject. I'm not sure if anybody is any better off trying to figure out what's red, green or blue based upon these numbers, because we're all interpreting the actual numbers differently. But we do think, once again, there is, as you remember from all of the arguments-literature I showed Your Honor has RGB, red, green, blue. So the same sort of data that's out there to define or empirically establish red is out there to empirically establish green and blue.
So I think in the end these issues are going to-I think ought to resolve themselves the same way, however that is. And for that reason, we haven't said a whole lot about this. Again, as you'll see, the specification, in the same area it does talk about the green and blue bands the same way it talks about the red band. And by the way, just to-I didn't address [Government's counsel's] point before, but I'm happy to do it. These are not-there are no such things as monochromatic CRTs, but you can get pretty close. If you look at the-they are in a sense one color, which is what is meant by that, but they're not monochromatic in the Kelly chart sense. Because there is no such thing as a phosphor that looks like that. They all have a spike and a wavelength around them. So this is perhaps not 484 the most artful language, but those skilled in the art would certainly understand there is no such thing as a monochromatic CRT, at least I don't think there is.TR at 686-87.

* * * * * *

HONEYWELL'S COUNSEL: And that is because, if you look, they have selected a range of 455 to 492, for example, for blue. If you look at the Kelly chart-and by the way, there's absolutely-there's only one Kelly chart. So whatever is in the intrinsic evidence, whatever-it's got to be a bad copy, because there aren't different versions of the Kelly chart. And that's what's referenced in the Breitmaier and Reetz thing. So whether it looks like 620 or not, it's just not 620. Because it says it's the Kelly chart. And blue on the Kelly chart starts at around 460 and ends at 480. And their construction is 455 to 492. So once again, 492 extends all the way out to about here. So once again, you know, we have lots of experts disagreeing on those ranges. This came out of [Mcgraw-Hill] again. This is the Kelly chart, yet a different one. And JEDEC would be different still.

TR at 688-89.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

After the claim construction hearing, Honeywell conceded that the "blue color band" could be construed as "light that can be characterized ... between approximately 455 and 492 nanometers." 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 47. Although Honeywell changed its position regarding the nanometer ranges that the defendants designated for "blue color band," Honeywell, nevertheless, maintained that if "blue color band" is to be construed by specific wavelengths, the court should specify a "dominant wavelength for the same reasons argued regarding the 'red color band.' " Id.

b. The Government's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

The Government advised the court that "blue color band" means "a range of color in the range from 455 and 492 nanometers." 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 39 (citing Ex. 30 Mcgraw Hill at 701-02). The Government challenged Honeywell's construction based on extrinsic patents and phosphor references as providing "no metes or bounds." 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 39. The Government also noted that Honeywell's reliance on a numerical indication of acceptable wavelengths from phosphor references is an impermissible use of extrinsic evidence, since the '914 patent contains no mention of specific phosphors, but, relies on such sources to expand the claim terms-to the point of indefiniteness. Id.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: We've, again, shown what one of ordinary skill in the art would understand, which is definite wavelength boundaries .... [W]e believe this is known to those skilled in the art. The analysis is exactly the same as with red.TR at 692.

* * * * * *

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: And, again, blue, 455 to 492, bleu, 455 to 492. The brief-and Mr. Gotts didn't turn to this, but their brief cites two things, one is the Westinghouse phosphor guide, we've discussed that to death. And then the U.S. patent 4,390,637, they say that shows different ranges than ours. I don't care. It's extrinsic. It doesn't matter. And finally, I don't know what their construction is anymore. The one that was popped up there, the one they had before that was in the briefs, the blue region and green region, again the same problem with the red color bands. It's unworkable, it's indefinite. Or if it is definite, we should decide where the boundaries are.

THE COURT: But the PTO didn't bounce it for that reason.

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: No, because we think that one of skill in the art, 485 when they look at blue ... color bands, something clicks in their mind and they know what the wavelength boundaries are. But you and I maybe don't, and so we need to go to the dictionary. The PTO, the examiner is either one of skill in the art or he educates himself to skill in the art. So he didn't bounce it for that same reason. He knew-

GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: Possibly. Or again, he can educate himself just as well as we can.
THE COURT: Okay.
GOVERNMENT'S COUNSEL: So I don't know what their new definition is that they're going to come up with, the same way they come up with the red one. I don't know if they are. If they don't, I think that's wrong and indefinite. If they do come up with a new one, if it's anything like the red one, I again think it's wrong. That's all I have.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

Although Honeywell changed its position after the claim construction hearing to agree with the Government that the nanometer range of "blue color band" was "between approximately 455 and 492 nanometers," Honeywell continued to seek a construction that designated a dominant wavelength. 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 47. Likewise, the Government continued to argue that Honeywell's assertion that peak wavelength should be adopted as the "proper measure" was erroneous. 4/1/05 Gov't Brief at 48; see also id. at 34.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Lockheed Martin adopted the Government's proposed construction of "blue color band." See 1/21/05 Def. Joint Brief at 39.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

Lockheed Martin also adopted the Government's position regarding the meaning of "blue color band" at the claim construction hearing. TR at 694.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

After the claim construction hearing, Lockheed Martin continued to adopt the Government's proposed construction of "blue color band." See 4/1/05 Int. Brief at 50.

d. The Court's Construction Of "Blue Color Band" In This Case.

The court construes "blue color band" as a range of color from 455 nm to 492 nm. For the reasons discussed in the court's construction of "red color band," however, the court has declined to designate a dominant or peak wavelength to the construction of "blue color band."

16. "Green Color Band."

a. Honeywell's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

In Honeywell's pre-hearing brief, the court was advised that "[i]n the context of the patent, green color band means a range of wavelengths within the green region of the visible spectrum." 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 36 (emphasis in original) (citing Tannas Initial Report ¶ 17, Tannas Rebuttal Report ¶ 18). The court was informed that this construction is consistent with the specification wherein the "green color band 52 is the light emitted by a monochromatic display 486 transducer, such as a CRT, in the green region of the visible spectrum." 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 37 (citing '914 patent, col. 4, 11. 40-43) ("[T]he local source of light 50 comprises ... green 52 ... color bands sourced from the monochromatic display transducers, such as for example three monochromatic cathode ray tubes[.]"); see also id. (citing '914 patent, col. 4, 11. 46-47) ("Each color band 51-53 provides a monochromatic image in one primary color and for the full color display."). Honeywell also argued that it is improper to define " green color band" using specific wavelengths. See 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 37. In the alternative, if the court were inclined to define "green color band" by wavelengths, Honeywell asserted that defendants' proposed wavelengths are incorrect, referencing U.S. Patent No. 4,390,637, wherein the following wavelengths for the green color band emitted by a cathode ray tub is represented to be 500-570 nanometers, as opposed to defendants' proposed 492-577 nanometers. Id. (citing U.S.P.T.O. Patent No. 4,390,637, col. 5, 11. 20-22). Based on this prior art, and other extrinsic evidence, Honeywell concludes that defendants have specified a lower limit that excludes the wavelengths emitted by the green CRT. See 12/23/04 Honeywell Brief at 37.

ii. At The Claim Construction Hearing.

Honeywell argued at the claim consideration hearing that "green color band" should be construed under the same parameters as "blue color band." See TR at 685.

iii. Post-Claim Construction Hearing Briefs.

After the claim construction hearing, Honeywell changed its position to agree with the Government that the nanometer range of the "green color band" was "between approximately 492 and 577 nanometers." 4/1/05 Honeywell Brief at 47. Honeywell continued to insist that the "green color band" should be construed by a dominant wavelength.

b. The Government's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

The Government advised the court that "green color band" means a "range of color in the range from 492 to 577 nanometers." 1/14/05 Def. Joint Brief at 39 (citing Ex. 30 Mcgraw-Hill at 197).

c. Intervenor Lockheed Martin's Proposed Construction.

i. Pre-Claim Construction Hearing Brief.

Lockheed Martin supported the Government's proposed construction of "green color band" at the claim construction hearing. See TR at 694.

Lockheed Martin's proposed construction of "green color band" continued to be the same as that of the Government. See 4/1/05 Int. Brief at 50; see also 4/15/05 Int. Brief at 23.

487 d. The Court's Construction Of "Green Color Band" In This Case.

The court construes "green color band" as a range of color from 492 nm to 577 nm. For the reasons discussed in the court's construction of "red color band," however, the court has declined to designate either a dominant or peak wavelength to the construction of "green color band."

17. "Narrowband Of The Red Color Band."

The parties have agreed that the term "narrowband of the red color band," as used in the claims of the '914 patent, means "a narrow range of wavelengths within the red color band." Jt. Stip. ¶ 6.

IV. CONCLUSION.

For the reasons discussed herein, defendant-intervenor Lockheed Martin Corp. is hereby granted the right to intervene in this case pursuant to RCFC 24(a). In addition, the court has determined as a matter of law that the disputed claims discussed herein are to be construed consistent with this Memorandum Opinion and Order Construing Certain Claims of United States Patent No. 6,467,914.

Judge Braden was appointed to the bench of the United States Court of Federal Claims on July 14, 2003, by President George W. Bush, after being confirmed by unanimous consent of the United States Senate. She was sworn into office by Senator Jeff Sessions, Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight & the Courts. Her investiture was conducted on October 24, 2003 by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

On October 22, 2004, Judge Braden was inducted as a Senior Fellow of the ABA's Administrative Law and Regulatory Section by Justice O'Connor at a ceremony held at the Supreme Court. Judge Braden also was recently named to the Editorial Board of the American Intellectual Property Law Association.

Judge Braden received a B.A. degree (1970) and J.D. degree (1973) from Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland, Ohio. She also attended post graduate courses at the Harvard Law School in the summer of 1978.

Prior to joining the bench, Judge Braden litigated complex federal and administrative law cases in private practice in trial and appellate courts. In particular, her work in the intellectual property area received favorable notice in the Wall Street Journal, New York Times, National Law Journal, Journal of the American Bar Association, and Interfaces on Trial: Intellectual Property and Interoperability In The Global Software Industry. In 1996, Judge Braden was honored by the Computer Law Association for winning multiple decisions in the Eastern District of New York, the Eastern District of Texas, the Second Circuit, and a certified question to the Supreme Court of Texas in Computer Assocs. Int'l, Inc. v. Altai, Inc., a landmark case that changed the application of copyright law to computer software. In 1998, she also won a companion case brought in France before the Cour de Appel de Paris.

In addition, Judge Braden has been lead counsel in a number of cutting edge cases. In 1995, she was lead counsel in a constitutional and state income tax case that challenged the industrial incentive law of the State of Alabama and received favorable mention in the Wall Street Journal, Business Week, and State Income Tax Alert, where it was described as "the case to watch." In 1991, she was lead counsel in a case noted in the Wall Street Journal where the federal district court awarded her client indemnification of environmental liabilities required to be assumed under an antitrust divestiture. In 1990, she was appointed by the Governor of the State of Alabama as a Special Assistant Attorney General to handle an antitrust divestiture required by the Federal Trade Commission.

In private practice, Judge Braden also represented a wide variety of client interests before almost every major department and federal agency, testified before the United States Congress on a variety of matters, and was a principal advocate of the Emergency Oil and Steel Loan Guarantee Act of 1999, which established a $1 billion federal loan guarantee program to assist bankrupt and troubled steel mills and small oil companies.

Prior to entering private practice, Judge Braden served as Senior Counsel to the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission and his predecessor, who was Acting Chairman and a Commissioner (1980-1985). In both positions she was responsible for advising on antitrust and consumer enforcement actions and handling congressional relations. From 1973-1980, Judge Braden was a Senior Trial Attorney in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice. She joined the Department under its Honor Law Program and initially was assigned to the Cleveland Regional Office, where she assisted in the trial of the first antitrust felony case and served as lead counsel in numerous criminal bid rigging cases and major merger investigations. In 1978, she was assigned to the newly formed Energy Section as lead counsel in a proceeding that conditioned the nuclear licenses of several electric utilities, bringing Texas into the national power grid. From 1978–1980, Judge Braden also represented the Department of Justice at OECD meetings in Paris, London, and Dusseldorf. During her tenure in government, Judge Braden received numerous Superior and Outstanding Performance Merit awards and in 1984, she received the Federal Bar Association's Distinguished Service Award.

Judge Braden is admitted to the Bars of the United States Supreme Court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, the District of Columbia, and the Supreme Court of Ohio.

Judge Braden is married to Thomas M. Susman, a partner in the law firm of Ropes and Gray. Their daughter is a recent graduate of Yale University. Judge Braden is an avid gardener and passionate supporter of the Washington Opera and Shakespeare Theatre.

ABOUT WLF'S LEGAL STUDIES DIVISION

The Washington Legal Foundation (WLF) established its Legal Studies Division to address cutting-edge legal issues by producing and distributing substantive, credible publications targeted at educating policy makers, the media, and other key legal policy outlets.

Washington is full of policy centers of one stripe or another. But WLF's Legal Studies Division has deliberately adopted a unique approach that sets it apart from other organizations.

First, the Legal Studies Division deals almost exclusively with legal policy questions as they relate to the principles of free enterprise, legal and judicial restraint, and America's economic and national security.

Second, its publications focus on a highly select legal policy-making audience. Legal Studies aggressively markets its publications to federal and state judges and their clerks; members of the United States Congress and their legal staffs; government attorneys; business leaders and corporate general counsel; law school professors and students; influential legal journalists; and major print and media commentators.

Third, Legal Studies possesses the flexibility and credibility to involve talented individuals from all walks of life — from law students and professors to sitting federal judges and senior partners in established law firms — in its work.

The key to WLF's Legal Studies publications is the timely production of a variety of readable and challenging commentaries with a distinctly common-sense viewpoint rarely reflected in academic law reviews or specialized legal trade journals. The publication formats include the provocative COUNSEL'S ADVISORY, topical LEGAL OPINION LETTERS, concise LEGAL BACKGROUNDERS on emerging issues, in-depth WORKING PAPERS, useful and practical CONTEMPORARY LEGAL NOTES, interactive CONVERSATIONS WITH, law review-length MONOGRAPHS, and occasional books.

WLF's LEGAL OPINION LETTERS and LEGAL BACKGROUNDERS appear on the LEXIS/NEXIS® online information service under the filename "WLF" or can be visited at the Washington Legal Foundation's website at www.wlf.org.

SETTLEMENTS IN SECURITIES FRAUD CLASS ACTIONS: IMPROVING INVESTOR PROTECTION

INTRODUCTION

In 1941, Harry Kalven, Jr. and Maurice Rosenfield suggested a new use for class action lawsuits based on the emerging marketplace for publicly traded securities.[1] Kalven and Rosenfield argued that the securities markets had become so complex that investors had little incentive to seek remedies under the Securities Act because the cost of prosecuting a claim far surpassed the expected recovery.[2] To remedy this problem, the authors proposed using civil class actions to police abuses in the securities markets – a theory that would later be dubbed the "private attorney general."[3] The

[3] The term was coined by Judge Jerome Frank of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. See Associated Indus. of New York State, Inc. v. Ickes, 134 F.2d 694, 704 (2d Cir. 1943) ("[T]here is nothing constitutionally prohibiting Congress from empowering any person, official or not, to institute a proceeding involving such a controversy, even if the sole purpose is to vindicate the public interest. Such persons, so authorized, are, so to speak, private Attorney Generals."). For a discussion of the rise of private enforcement actions under federal regulatory current class action provision codified in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23 embodies Kalven's and Rosenfield's idea that civil class action suits could empower individual consumer redress while simultaneously ensuring enforcement of the federal securities laws.[4]

While securities class actions have offered some of the social benefits Kalven and Rosenfield envisioned, experience has shown that, like many other well-intended social experiments, they are not exempt from the law of unintended consequences, having brought with them vast social costs never imagined by their early promoters. Today, economic incentives unique to securities litigation encourage class action lawyers to bring meritless claims and prompt corporate defendants to pay dearly to settle such claims. These same incentives operate to encourage significant attorneys' fee awards even in cases where class members receive little meaningful compensation. And the problem is widespread. Recent studies conclude that, over a five-year period, the average public corporation faces a 9% probability of facing at laws, see generally John C. Coffee, Jr., Rescuing the Private Attorney General: Why the Model of the Lawyer as Bounty Hunter Is Not Working, 42 MD. L. REV. 215 (1983). Miller, The Plaintiff's Attorneys' Role in Class Action and Derivative Litigation: Economic Analysis and Recommendations for Reform, 58 U. CHI. L. REV. 1 (1991) (proposing private rights of action be auctioned to attorneys seeking to bring the class claim).

[4]Although there is little documentation of the discussion of Kalven's and Rosenfield's theory during the advisory committee sessions, their arguments proved important to the final proposed rule. See Note, Developments in the Law — Class Actions, 89 HARV. L. REV. 1318, 1321-23 (1976).

least one securities class action lawsuit.[5] As Congresswoman Anna Eshoo (D-Cal.) has put it, "Businesses in my region place themselves in one of two categories: those who have been sued for securities fraud and those that will be."[6] In the last four years alone, securities class action settlements have exceeded two billion dollars per year.[7]

What are the sources of the problems confronting securities class litigation? And how might we address them in a way that ensures we protect the valuable function securities class action litigation was originally intended to serve? This article seeks to offer a preliminary step toward answering these questions.

I. CERTAIN STRUCTURAL PROBLEMS OF SECURITIES FRAUD CLASS ACTIONS

A. The Incentive to Bring – and the Pressure to Settle – Meritless Suits

Because the amount of damages demanded in securities class actions is frequently so great, corporations often face the choice of "stak[ing] their companies on the outcome of a single jury trial, or be forced by fear of the risk of bankruptcy [into settling] even if they have no legal liability."[8] Unsurprisingly, executives faced with the potential destruction of their companies in a single trial typically opt to settle – even if it means paying out on meritless claims. They are, as Congress has recognized, "confronted with [an] implacable arithmetic . . . even a meritless case with only a 5% chance of success at trial must be settled if the complaint claims hundreds of millions of dollars in damages."[9] Illustrating just how powerful the incentive to settle can be, Bristol-Myers Squibb recently agreed to settle a pending class action for $300 million even after the suit was dismissed with prejudice at the trial court level.[10]

With such pressure to settle meritless suits comes, unsurprisingly, a concomitant incentive to bring them. As one academic commentator has candidly recognized, there is simply "no appreciable risk of non-recovery" in securities class actions; merely "[g]etting the claim into the legal system, Indeed, [Melvyn I.] Weiss and his partner William S. Lerach of the Milberg firm have stated that losses in these cases are 'few and far between,' and they achieve a 'significant settlement although not always a big legal fee, in 90% of the cases [they] file.'"[12] Even the Supreme Court has acknowledged that, as a result of this phenomenon, securities class action litigation poses "a danger of vexatiousness different in degree and in kind from that which accompanies litigation in general."[13] Illustrating how tempting these cases are for plaintiffs' lawyers, one court found it "peculiar that four of the lawsuits consolidated in this action were filed around 10:00 a.m. on the first business day following [the defendant's] announcement" of business problems and that "[m]ost of the complaints are virtually identical (including typographical errors)."[14] At the hearing on the defendant's motion to dismiss, the judge inquired:

> [H]ow did you get to be so smart and to acquire all this knowledge about fraud from Friday to Tuesday? On Friday afternoon, did your client suddenly appear at your doorstep and say 'My God, I just read in the Wall Street Journal about Travelers. They defrauded me,' and you agreed with them and you interviewed them and you determined that there was fraud and therefore you had a good lawsuit, so you filed it Tuesday morning, is that what happened?[15]

The court tellingly noted that "[c]ounsel for the plaintiffs was not responsive to this line of inquiry."[16]

B. The Incentive to Reward Class Counsel But Not Necessarily Class Members

While plaintiffs' attorneys have a strong financial incentive to bring meritless suits, and defendants have a strong incentive to settle them, neither has a particularly strong incentive to protect class members. Once the scope of the settlement fund is determined, defendants usually have no particular concern how that fund is allocated between class members and plaintiffs' counsel. And with the threat of adversarial scrutiny from the defendant largely abated, plaintiffs' counsel has free reign to seek (and little reason not to try to grab) as large a slice of the settlement fund as possible. Thus, settlement hearings frequently devolve into what the Third Circuit has called "jointly orchestrated . . . pep rallies," in which no party questions the fairness of the settlement or attorneys' fee request and "judges no longer have the full benefit of the adversarial process."[17] This arrangement has led one prominent securities fraud attorney to boast that "I have the greatest practice in the world because I have no clients. I bring the case. I hire the plaintiff. I do not have some client telling me what to do. I decide what to do."[18]

Just how true that is can be illustrated by a 2002 settlement involving AT&T and Lucent regarding allegedly improper billing practices. A settlement fund for class members and counsel was established and valued at $300 million in settlement hearing proceedings. Soon after, the lawyers for the class collected some $80 million in fees, or more than 26% of the $300 million fund. Class members, meanwhile, "didn't collect as easily."[19] Two years later, in 2004, the parties revealed that class members found the settlement terms so unattractive that they had bothered to redeem a mere $8 million from the settlement fund – meaning that the plaintiffs' lawyers earned ten times the amount of the injured consumers.[20]

In re PeopleSoft Securities Litigation exemplifies the same problem.[21]

Immediately following a decline in the common stock of PeopleSoft, Inc., 19 complaints were filed alleging that top company executives had made materially false and misleading statements to inflate the stock price. At the onset of the action, counsel represented that the case was worth hundreds of millions of dollars in damages. Yet, one year later, the plaintiffs sought approval for a settlement of $15 million. In reviewing the proposed settlement, the district court concluded that counsel had engaged in "minimal" discovery, "on the borderline of acceptability" given the purported scope of the case. Although the district court concluded that "a substantial part of the allegations that led the court to sustain the complaint in the first place are untrue, were never true, and had, at most, razor-thin support," plaintiffs' counsel pocketed $2.5 million in fees and expenses all taken from the common settlement fund.[22]

C. The Transfer Effect

Yet another unique structural issue affects securities class action settlements. Because settlement payments often come largely out of corporate coffers (directors' and officers' insurance policies also contribute), securities class actions frequently involve only "a transfer of wealth from current shareholders to former shareholders."[23] That is, to the extent the corporation pays out, it is only transferring a portion of that wealth to existing shareholders' bank accounts (essentially an economic wash) in addition to sums paid to former shareholders who sold at some point during the class period and, of course, class counsel. Thus, to the extent that class members still own shares in the company at the time of the suit (as they often do), "payments by the corporation to settle a class action amount to transferring money from one pocket to the other, with about half of it dropping on the floor for lawyers to pick up."[24] All this led Judge Friendly to observe that securities fraud litigation carries the risk of "large judgments, payable in the last analysis by innocent investors, for the benefit of speculators and their lawyers."[25]

the negative side-effects of securities class action litigation.[26] In 1995, Congress enacted the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act[27] ("PSLRA").[28] It followed up in 1998 with the Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act ("SLUSA").[29] Together, these bills sought to toughen pleading standards for securities class action suits,[30] encourage the appointment of pension funds as lead plaintiffs in the hope that they might better oversee class counsel,[31] and ensure that cases are tried in federal courts rather than in state courts.[32]

Congress's reforms, however, did little to address the underlying incentives that encourage plaintiffs' lawyers to bring – and defendants' lawyers to settle – meritless suits, or the incentives the parties have to benefit class counsel more than class members.[33] In fact, there has been a 32% nationwide increase in the mean number of securities fraud suits filed in the six years since the enactment of the PSLRA.[34] According to one published report, public companies now face a nearly 60% greater chance of being sued by shareholders.[35] And virtually all of these suits continue to be settled. One recent opinion quoted a statistic showing the dismissal rate in the Ninth Circuit as only 6%.[36] Studies show, too, that six years after the passage of the PSLRA, shareholders in class action suits collected, on average, just six cents for every dollar of claimed loss while their counsel continue to reap enormous fees.[37] As a result, despite congressional efforts at reform securities class action settlements reached an all-time high in 2004 of $2.9 billion.[38]

More recently, Congress passed the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005.[39] That law imposes several new hurdles for class action litigants. First, the Act expands the original jurisdiction of the federal courts to include suits where the aggregate amount of controversy exceeds $5 million and the class includes at least 100 potential members, only one of whom must be a citizen of a different state than the defendant.[40] Second, the Act eliminates restrictions on removal, including the one-year time limitation otherwise applicable to civil suits, the need for all defendants to consent to removal, and the inability for defendants to remove from state courts where they are citizens.[41] Third, the Act closes the so-called "joinder loophole" that allowed massive actions on behalf of numerous plaintiffs to proceed without seeking class action certification by extending federal jurisdiction over most all civil actions seeking monetary damages on behalf of 100 or more persons.[42] The Class Action Fairness Act also places new controls on the settlement of class actions, particularly certain settlements awarding coupons in lieu of damages.[43]

For better or for worse, however, the Class Action Fairness Act will have little impact on securities class action litigation. By its terms, the Act does not apply to claims that could not already be removed under SLUSA, suits relating to "internal affairs or governance of a corporation," and suits relating to breaches of fiduciary duties in the sale of a security.[44] As a result, securities fraud class actions remain susceptible to the very problems that Congress sought to redress in other forms of class action litigation.

Beyond Congress, some have promoted recent changes to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as ways to improve the class action mechanism. Like Congress's reforms, however, these recent rule changes simply do not address the fundamental problematic incentives and structures unique to securities litigation.

First, until its recent amendment, the decision whether to opt out of a Rule 23 class action frequently had to be made early in the case – often before the nature and scope of liability and damages could be fully understood. As amended, Rule 23(e)(3) now permits courts to refuse to approve a settlement unless it affords a new opportunity to request exclusion at a time when class members can make an informed decision based on the proposed settlement terms. Early experience, however, shows that few courts have permitted additional opt-out periods following settlement approval.[45] Critically, too, a second opt-out offers no protection where settlement occurs before a class is certified – yet such early settlements are the norm in securities class action litigation given the scope of damages they involve, and the fact that securities class actions are so frequently certified.[46]

Second, Rule 23(f) has been amended to encourage interlocutory appeals from district court class certification orders. Early reports indicate, however, that Rule 23(f) has been used modestly, resulting in approximately nine published opinions per year since the rule was adopted in 1998.[47] The discretionary nature of Rule 23(f), moreover, has led to a patchwork of standards and guidelines in the circuit courts, thus raising the possibility of inconsistent remedies depending on the forum.[48] And, once again, Rule 23(f) provides little assistance in cases where settlement occurs before class certification – and that is, again, the dominant practice in securities class actions.[49]

B. Toward Meaningful Reform in Securities Class Action Settlements

While the procedural fixes and patches enacted by Congress and in the federal rules may help, it seems clear that they have proven insufficient to the task of preventing unmeritorious securities fraud cases or deterring settlements that benefit lawyers more than their clients. Future reform efforts may be more effective if focused less on procedures and more directly on the underlying economic incentives. What does this mean? Here are some possibilities.

1. Enforce the PSLRA's Loss Causation Requirement

A majority of circuit courts have held that a securities fraud plaintiff must demonstrate that the price of the security at issue declined as the result of disclosure of previously concealed information, and have limited the plaintiff's damages to the amount of that decline.[50] As recently explained by the Second Circuit in an opinion affirming the decision of the late Judge Milton Pollack in Lentell v. Merrill Lynch, "to establish loss causation, a plaintiff must allege . . . that the subject of the fraudulent statement or omission was the cause of the actual loss suffered."[51] There, a class of investors in once high-flying Internet startups brought suit for losses suffered after the now-famous "irrational exuberance" that fueled investments in the late 1990s diminished and the Internet stock price bubble burst. Eager to find someone to blame for their losses, the plaintiffs filed suit against Merrill Lynch claiming the company issued false recommendations in its analyst reports – this despite the fact that the plaintiffs were not clients of Merrill Lynch and had not relied on, read, or even seen a copy of any of Merrill's reports. The Second Circuit rejected the plaintiffs' construction of the loss causation requirement and held that they failed "to account for the price-volatility risk inherent in the stocks they chose to buy" or plead any other facts showing that "it was defendant's fraud – rather than other salient factors – that proximately caused [their] loss."[52]

In contrast, the Ninth Circuit has held that a securities fraud plaintiff need only argue that the price of a security was "inflated" when he or she bought shares.[53] Rather than holding companies liable for the damage they inflict, as reflected by actual market events, the Ninth Circuit's rule thus permits liability to be found and damages to be awarded even when the plaintiff can point to no actual market price reaction to a corrective disclosure at all. Under this regime, a plaintiff can bring a class action simply on the allegation that a company's share price was once "inflated" because of the undisclosed accounting issue – and do so without ever having to establish a causal link between any price decline and the alleged misrepresentation. The Ninth Circuit's approach thus allows recovery where investors are never hurt by the alleged fraud, including in cases where the plaintiff sold before the alleged misrepresentation was exposed; where the misrepresentation was never exposed at all; or where the misrepresentation was exposed but the market did not respond negatively.

The facts of the Ninth Circuit case are illustrative. On February 24, 1998, Dura Pharmaceuticals announced a revenue shortfall for the following year, unrelated to any alleged fraud. By the next day, shares in Dura dropped from $39.125 to $20.75 for a one-day loss of 47%. Some nine months later, on November 3, 1998, Dura announced for the first time that the Food and Drug Administration had declined to approve its Albuterol Spiros product – an announcement that plaintiffs themselves contend constitutes the first public disclosure of the alleged fraud in this case. Following this announcement, however, Dura shares fell only slightly and briefly. Share prices initially dropped from $12.375 to $9.75, but, within 12 trading days, they recovered to $12.438, ultimately climbing to $14.00 within 90 days of the announcement. A claim of fraud on behalf of Dura investors followed.

But seeking to boost their recovery, the class plaintiffs never alleged damages based on the brief and shallow $2.625 stock price dip after the November 3 disclosure of the supposed fraud. Rather, they demanded recovery based on the much more significant February 24 stock price decline of $19. In other words, the plaintiffs sought damages based on a decline in share value that occurred nine months before the disclosure of the alleged fraud. The facts were as simple, and seemingly insufficient, as if Mrs. Palsgraf had filed suit for a headache she developed before ever leaving for the train station. The district court agreed and dismissed the action. The Ninth Circuit saw things differently, finding loss causation satisfied where the plaintiffs "have shown that the price on the date of purchase was inflated because of the misrepresentation."[54]

The economic implications of the Ninth Circuit's holding are staggering. Rather than holding companies liable for the damage they inflict, as reflected by actual market events, the Ninth Circuit's rule permits liability to be found and damages to be awarded even when the plaintiff can point to no actual market price reaction to a disclosure of the supposed fraud. Denying courts any means for weeding out at the pleading stage suits where the alleged fraud had no empirical effect on share price, and thus imposed no demonstrable harm on class members, the Ninth Circuit's rule adds fuel to a fire in which virtually every case is settled, wealth is transferred away from current shareholders to former shareholders.

Recently, however, the Ninth Circuit's treatment of the loss causation requirement received a cool response when the Supreme Court granted certiorari and heard arguments in the Dura case – a case that gives the High Court its first chance to explain the loss causation doctrine.[55] The questions posed by the Justices at oral argument suggest a fundamental disagreement with the Ninth Circuit's logic, exemplified by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg's observation: "How could you possibly hook up your loss to the news that comes out later? There is no loss until somehow the bad news comes out."[56]

[55]The Solicitor General had urged the Supreme Court to review the decision concluding that the Ninth Circuit's reasoning was "difficult to reconcile with the well-established principle that transaction causation and loss causation are distinct elements of a Rule 10b-5 cause of action." See Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae at 12, *Dura Pharms., Inc. v. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor also summed up the problem: "The reason why loss-causation is used is because a 'loss' experienced by the plaintiff is 'caused' by the misrepresentation. You have to put pleadings that are clear, which you didn't do."[57]

The Court's skepticism is well-founded. The Ninth Circuit's holding introduces a new legal rule that only further encourages plaintiffs to file and companies to settle meritless claims by removing a key safeguard against such suits. Worse still, the Ninth Circuit's rule encourages risky investment behavior, effectively forcing issuers to insure against speculative losses having nothing to do with their own conduct. Under the Ninth Circuit's rule, an investor can file a claim and obtain recovery even when the disclosure of an allegedly fraudulent statement has absolutely no effect on the stock price. To estimate damages in the absence of any contemporaneous real world stock price movement, moreover, the Ninth Circuit's rule encourages, and in fact depends upon, a return to the use of "junk science" by allowing recovery where disclosures do not prompt any stock price decline – i.e., any actual harm. Under this standard, the parties and courts are, by necessity, forced to rely on a grab-bag of speculative theories to estimate damages since no empirically verifiable proof of injury exists. Like Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals and its progeny, the loss causation requirement arms courts with a tool to ensure that the legal system compensates fully for empirically confirmable losses, but not for "phantom losses" based on "cause-and-effect relationships whose very existence is unproven and perhaps unprovable."[58]

By contrast, the alternative loss causation rule endorsed by the Government, petitioners, and four other courts of appeals would avoid all of these problems while ensuring full recovery of real losses. Requiring plaintiffs to plead facts showing loss causation enables judges to separate investor losses stemming from actual fraud from those caused by mere market downturns. Allowing the theory of "fraud-on-the-market" to satisfy the plaintiffs' entire burden on causation risks overcompensating investors for stock losses unrelated to any specific action by a defendant. Where an alternative cause (such as the marketwide drop in Internet, technology, and telecommunications securities in early 2000) results in comparable losses across similarly situated investors, plaintiffs must logically allege some facts that tend to show that their particular losses were caused by the defendants' alleged wrongdoings. Only by requiring a specific causal nexus can courts achieve optimal deterrence against fraud without transforming the federal securities laws into a system of national investor insurance.

2. Mandate Separate Fee Funds

The practice of paying plaintiffs' attorneys' fees from the settlement fund creates a powerful incentive to "structure a settlement such that the plaintiffs' attorneys' fees are disproportionate to any relief obtained for the corporation,"[59] and insulates the fee request from adversarial scrutiny. Paying fees out of the common settlement fund reduces the recovery available to consumers, and shifts the burden of paying the class counsels' fees to class members. In contrast, a regime that requires fee requests to be made separately from, and outside of, the class settlement fraud would help reintroduce the possibility that defendants might have some incentive to scrutinize fee requests and more closely monitor a regime that currently doles out 25% to 30% of every settlement to securities class action attorneys – many of whom do little or nothing to prosecute their cases and simply "free ride" on SEC or Justice Department investigations.

3. Revive the Lodestar Method for Calculating Fees

While the trend in federal courts has been toward using percentage of recovery methodology to determine fee awards, the lodestar method can provide a useful cross-check. The purpose behind any fee award from a common fund settlement is to compensate attorneys for the fair market value of their time in successfully prosecuting the class claims. While the lodestar method has been criticized as burdensome and fact intensive (it is both), strict adherence to the percent of recovery standard can also overlook inequitable fee awards. For instance, when Bank of America paid $490 million to settle a securities fraud class action in 2002, plaintiffs' lawyers pocketed $28.1 million dollars in fees. Although at first glance the fee award appears reasonable as a percentage of recovery, the plaintiffs' lawyers actually earned $2,007 per hour.[60] In such cases, the lodestar method can provide an important safeguard against attorney over-billing through a closer review of counsels' hours, rates, and other charges.

4. Employ Competitive Bidding to Select Class Counsel

A bidding process to determine class counsel would employ market forces to constrain the supra-competitive prices often charged by plaintiffs' attorneys. This concept was first employed by Judge Vaughn R. Walker of the Northern District of California.[61] There, the district court solicited sealed bids from law firms seeking to represent the lead plaintiff, accompanied by a description of the firm's experience and qualifications in such actions. The court then selected the lead plaintiffs' lawyer from these submissions, and determined the attorneys' fees based on the firm's own bid.[62] In another approach to competitive bidding, the district court might interview each of the prospective class attorneys, and select the lead plaintiffs' counsel based on the judge's independent analysis of the attorneys' ability to monitor and represent the interests of the class. Although Judge Walker's innovative approach was initially rejected by the Ninth Circuit,[63] recent amendments to Rule 23 appear to have vindicated Judge Walker's experiment, allowing judges to conduct competitive auctions based in part on the fees class counsel will receive.[64]

reviewing and commenting on proposed settlements could also help expose and prevent collusive deals. In recent years, the FTC has launched an aggressive and admirable effort in this area.[65] For example, in In re First Databank the FTC successfully challenged the fees sought in a consumer class suit that largely relied on an earlier enforcement action brought by the Commission.[66] In Databank, the FTC obtained agreement on $16 million in consumer redress as part of an antitrust enforcement action. Soon after, a private class action settlement added $8 million to the consumer fund, for a total of $24 million. Despite this marginal increase, class counsel sought fees of 30% of the entire $24 million fund, or more than 90% of the additional value added by the private action. Based largely on the FTC's objection, the district court reduced the fee award to 30% of the $8 million dollar additional recovery noting that the settlement was reached after the FTC "had already expended substantial efforts to establish" liability.[67]

Other agencies – including the Justice Department, the SEC, and the state attorneys' general – should be encouraged to follow the instructive example of the FTC and begin their own oversight of class action settlements purporting to piggy-back on their own investigations. Indeed, the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005 imposes just such a reporting requirement for class action settlements not involving securities fraud. Under the Act, each settling defendant must notify both the Attorney General of the United States and the appropriate state officials no later than 10 days after any proposed class action settlement.[68] The Act further states that final approval of a settlement may not issue earlier than 90 days after notice to the governmental officials. It is unclear why securities class actions should be exempted from these requirements — especially given the federal government's strong and historic interest in the regulation of the securities industry.

The FTC previously sought to address the notice problem in 2002 in a way that would have helped in the securities context when it proposed an amendment to Rule 23 under which parties to any class action would be required to notify the court of any related actions by government agencies, and to notify the government agencies involved in those actions of the related private class action.[69] The advisory committee, however, somewhat astonishingly declined to adopt these suggestions. Until the committee or Congress recognizes the value of a hard, independent look at securities class action settlements and reverses course, no procedure exists to ensure the timely participation of interested governmental enforcement agencies.

6. Don't Duplicate Governmental Efforts

While agency oversight may help prevent collusive settlements, one well-intentioned feature of the Sarbanes-Oxley bill actually risks double recoveries. It is well known that actions by a federal regulatory agency frequently trigger parallel private class actions. Indeed, since the passage of the PSLRA in 1995, over 20% of all securities fraud actions have followed an SEC litigation release or administrative proceeding.[70] And more than half of recent SEC enforcement actions have produced parallel private civil actions.[71] The prevalence of these follow-on private actions is significant because Congress has recently granted the SEC the power to redress consumer harms directly. Section 308 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act[72] allows the SEC to reimburse investors by depositing civil penalties for securities or accounting violations into a victim's compensation fund. And in the last couple years the SEC has exercised this authority with zeal, collecting hundreds of millions of dollars in compensation for affected shareholders.[73]

Where the SEC exercises this authority, therefore, a parallel shareholder class action may be simply unnecessary to deter the alleged wrongdoing and adequately compensate the investors.

To date, however, the SEC, Congress, and the courts have not given this question the attention it deserves and parallel class actions continue even in cases where the SEC has already acted to compensate victims. Permitting plaintiffs to receive damages through private civil suits in addition to disgorgement awards risks overcompensating both class investors and plaintiffs' attorneys who fail to account for the government's efforts in their fee requests. At a minimum, courts should insist that disgorgement awards be treated separately from any class action settlement to prevent plaintiffs' lawyers from "free riding" on the good will achieved by the government's enforcement actions.

7. Encourage Meaningful Oversight by Litigants

In the PSLRA, Congress sought to reign in non-meritorious suits by expressing a strong preference for having institutional investors appointed as class representatives.[74] Congress, not unreasonably, believed that (noting that as of 2004 the SEC had "brought 51 enforcement cases related to the mutual fund scandals and levied $900 million in disgorgement penalties").

[74]The PSLRA requires courts to appoint as "lead plaintiff" the class member "that the court determines to be most capable of adequately representing the interests of class members." 15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(a)(3)(B)(i), and creates a rebuttable presumption that the most adequate plaintiff is the party with the "largest financial interest in the relief sought by the class." Id. § 78u-4(a)(3)(B)(iii)(I)(bb).

"increasing the role of institutional investors in class actions will ultimately benefit shareholders and assist courts by improving the quality of representation in securities class actions," rather than leaving the responsibility to small individual holders, many of which were often repeat players closely aligned with specific plaintiff law firms.[75] Congress may have failed, however, to consider the magnitude of the task it asked institutional investors to assume. Although some are suitable candidates to lead class action litigation, many lack the staff, resources, funding, and experience to monitor independently the suits brought on their behalf.

For example, the trustees of the Louisiana Teachers' Retirement System recently brought a derivative suit against the majority shareholders of Regal Entertainment to stop the issuance of a $750 million dividend, despite holding only a $30,000 investment in the company. The court denied the Louisiana Teachers' application for a preliminary injunction, finding "'not a shred of evidence' that minority shareholder would be hurt," and the Teachers subsequently dropped their claims.[76] Notably, the court found the claims so doubtful, that it asked plaintiffs' counsel "[t]o what extent has the plaintiff thought about the claims they're asserting and have they really studied them?"[77] As it turned out, the Louisiana Teachers' Retirement System has been involved in 60 class action lawsuits in the last eight years.[78] Citing this substantial docket, one district court judge in the Eastern District of Tennessee declined to allow the Teachers to serve as a lead plaintiff in one of these class actions, concluding that "the Court cannot help but conclude the Louisiana Funds' resources are being spread too thin."[79]

To help institutional investors from becoming spread too thin, and the concomitant loss of meaningful oversight promised by the PSLRA, courts might consider greater enforcement of the PSLRA's "professional plaintiff" rule to bar actions repeating allegations already considered and rejected in a prior suit. The PSLRA prohibits a party from serving as lead plaintiff in more than five securities class actions brought during a three-year period.[80] Some courts have disregarded this rule with respect to institutional investors, relying on commentary contained in the Conference Report accompanying the PSLRA.[81] As other courts have properly noted, however, the PSLRA's plain language "contains no express blanket exception for institutional investors" and automatically excusing institutional investors from the rule would undermine rather than further the PSLRA's purposes.[82] Institutional investors themselves might also consider the creation of neutral litigation oversight committees to help them review solicitations made by plaintiffs' lawyers to ensure that the cases brought are meritorious, that fee agreements are fair and reasonable, and that any settlement benefits shareholders overall and does not, for example, simply result in a transfer of assets from current shareholders (very often including institutional investors themselves) to former shareholders.

CONCLUSION

Congress intended the PSLRA to reform the abuses that dominated securities fraud litigation in the early 1990s. Despite the best of legislative intentions, virtually all securities fraud claims that survive initial motions practice will be settled. With little prospect that their claims will be fully tested by the adversarial process, plaintiffs' attorneys have a strong economic incentive to bring ever-more securities fraud class actions without regard to the underlying merit of the suit, or the ultimate recovery to the class. Faced with such daunting prospects, businesses are frequently forced to comply with all but the most outrageous of settlement demands. As a result, new corporate investments are deterred, the efficiency of the capital markets is reduced, and the competitiveness of the American economy declines. And class members, who often have absolutely no interest in the suit from filing to final judgment, literally wind up paying the bills.

The reforms attempted so far are steps in the right direction. But none directly addresses the underlying economic incentives that drive the filing of frivolous securities fraud class actions in the first instance. Meaningful reforms must move beyond procedure to address these incentives directly. Enforcing the PSLRA's loss causation requirement will empower judges to dismiss securities fraud suits stemming from mere market downturns. Utilizing a competitive bidding process for the selection of class counsel will help address the de facto cartel responsible for the vast majority of securities class suits. Requiring attorneys' fees to be paid from a separate fee fund will increase adversarial challenges to exorbitant requests, and reviving the loadstar method will provide a tool to guard against overbilling. And no fees should be awarded for suits that do not provide meaningful benefits to investors after an opportunity for review by the appropriate regulatory agency. While no single reform can guarantee that securities fraud class action settlements will always be fair and reasonable, these proposals are just a few possible steps in the direction of helping to secure the full promise of the securities class action mechanism as the vehicle for consumer protection envisioned by Kalven and Rosenfield nearly six decades ago.

Terrorism News:

McCain Threatens To Attach Detainee Rules Amendment To Defense Bill. The Hill (9/14, Tiron, Allen) reports, "Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is threatening to attach an amendment to the defense appropriations bill defining acceptable treatment of military detainees if the defense authorization bill, to which it is currently attached, is not voted on this fall. 'I hate to do this,' said McCain, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee's Airland Subcommittee." The Hill notes, "The dispute between the White House and McCain is their first high-profile disagreement since the November election. Meanwhile, Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, remains 'very supportive' of McCain's amendment, according to a committee spokesperson. And Warner also is committed to bringing the authorization bill to the floor this fall."

128 Gitmo Prisoners Are On Hunger Strike. The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Serrano) reports, "A hunger strike at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has grown to 128 prisoners who are demanding that they be immediately released or granted access to a legal process to defend themselves against blanket allegations that they are terrorists. The strike, begun more than five weeks ago, has forced military authorities to hospitalize 18 of the prisoners and to take extraordinary measures to force-feed them. Some detainees have vowed to die if necessary, but the Pentagon insists that it will not let anyone starve to death. ... Along with demanding that they be freed or put on trial, some detainees also are complaining of assaults by guards and continuing to allege that there has been desecration of Muslim religious items."

Investigation Finds Gitmo MPs Distrusted Interrogators. The AP (9/14, Fox) reports, "A U.S. inquiry into alleged abuse at Guantanamo uncovered a climate of deep distrust between military police and interrogators, who were accused during the probe of giving terror suspects personal information about their guards. The MPs suspected interrogators gave their names and Social Security numbers to prisoners in exchange for intelligence, according to the investigation, which recommended that a senior interrogator be relieved of duty for 'failure to know his enemy.' The interrogator 'sees himself as a hero for the detainees, and against the MPs, on a crusade in the battle of the MPs against the detainees,' one investigator wrote in the report on the inquiry that The Associated Press obtained under a Freedom of Information lawsuit." The AP adds, "The investigation began in March 2004, when the same interrogator claimed military police had abused detainees. ... The interrogator claimed that guards mistreated a suspected al-Qaida member by not allowing him to use the bathroom immediately after a five-hour interrogation and that at other times withheld food and turned the temperature down on a cell to 52 degrees as punishment."

In Courtroom Outburst, Al Arian Lawyer Bumps Prosecutor, Challenges FBI Agent. The Tampa Tribune (9/14, Fechter) reports Sami al Arian attorney William Moffitt "bumped a federal prosecutor and challenged an FBI agent during a break Tuesday morning, saying the government was cheating in prosecuting the terror- support case that could send the defendants to prison for life." Moffitt said that

"prosecutors should have provided translations" for Israeli documents about al Arian's alleged support for suicide bombers, "throwing the documents onto the defense table. He then bumped" Assistant US Attorney Cherie Krigsman "and hollered 'This is business. You're trying to put a guy in jail for life. You cheat all the time.'" FBI Agent Kerry Myers "got in between Moffitt and Krigsman, telling Moffitt to leave Krigsman alone because 'she's a female.' Moffitt challenged the agent. 'Get in my face one more time,' he said."

Hayat Attorneys Secure $1.2 Million In Property For New Bail Request. The Lodi News Sentinel (9/14, Bohm) reports Umer and Hamid Hayat "have secured more than $1.2 million worth of property and hope it's enough to be released from jail while they await trial." The News Sentinel adds that the Hayats "have been held in the Sacramento County Jail for three months, charged with lying to FBI agents about their knowledge of terror training camps. ... Both have pleaded not guilty to the charges and through their attorneys have denied the allegations. Additionally, defense attorneys wrote in the motions, the charges have not been corroborated by others and are based on statements made 'during stressful, protracted and confusing interview sessions with FBI agents.'"

The Stockton Record (9/13, Hood) notes, "According to Monday's filing, the homes are: The Hayats' home at 302 E. Acacia St., which FBI agents searched June 6. ... A home belonging to Umer Hayat's brother," and two homes owned by "distant relatives." Defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi said, "We feel good about it because they're not a danger to the community. The judge told us if we came up with more property, he would consider that a new fact to reopen."

Brooklyn Illegal Money Transfer Trial Begins. The AP (9/14, Weissenstein) reports, "A Yemeni immigrant ice cream shop owner accused of illegally funneling $21.9 million overseas successfully fought to keep prosecutors from introducing evidence allegedly linking him to terrorist groups as his trial began Tuesday." Abad Elfgeeh "stands accused of transmitting money around the world without a license from a dozen bank accounts linked to his tiny storefront in Park Slope, Brooklyn. ... But prosecutors cannot raise the topic of terrorism at Elfgeeh's trial unless the defense does first because they did not have enough evidence to charge Elfgeeh with a terrorism-related crime." The AP notes, "Elfgeeh first came to the attention of FBI anti-terrorist agents as they investigated Sheik Mohammed Ali Hassan Al-Moayad, whom they eventually accused of funneling money...to al-Qaida and Hamas."

British Intelligence Monitoring Hundreds Of Potential Terrorists. The New York Times (9/14, Lyall) reports, "Hundreds of potential terrorists in Britain are being 'closely surveyed' by the security services, part of a battle with no obvious end in sight," said home secretary Charles Clarke. Clarke "was testifying before a special parliamentary committee investigating the government's handling of the July 7 suicide bombings " The Washington Times (9/14, Martin) reports Clarke said, "There are certainly hundreds of individuals we continue to watch very closely, who we believe need to be very closely surveilled because of the threat they offer." Clarke "explained that, although these suspects posed a 'threat,' they were not necessarily actively plotting more terrorist attacks."

Patriot Act:

Not All FBI Powers Covered Under Patriot Act. In the third of a three-part series on the Patriot Act, the Hayward (CA) Daily Review (9/14, Farooq) reports, "Poet Amir Sulaiman was on a professional high after his taped performance aired across the country on HBO's 'Def Poetry Jam' in February 2004. He had performed a piece titled 'Dangerous,' a poem he describes as passionate and intense. ... But just six days after his performance first aired, the 26-year-old African-American father of three had FBI agents waiting to question him at his mother-in-law's house in San Francisco. ... 'I'm not sure,' he said about the FBI knocking on his in-law's door soon after his HBO performance. 'The reason the two (events) are connected is six days after the show aired, they knocked on my mother-in-law's door. ... It was a bizarre, almost surreal, phone call that the FBI was waiting for me.'" The Review continues, "While they waited, FBI agents asked Sulaiman's brother-in-law why his poetry was 'anti-American.' That's a charge he denies, saying his ancestors help build America and he never once mentions America on his album, but instead tackles issues such as poverty, oppression and tyranny. ... The day after the FBI visited Sulaiman, he also found out, while trying to board an airplane, that his name had been added to the 'no-fly list,' subjecting him to extra security before he could board. He was never charged with a crime or given a reason why his name was added to the list or why he was visited by the FBI." The Review adds, "Contrary to popular belief, both of Sulaiman's experiences had nothing to do with the controversial USA PATRIOT Act, passed by Congress days after the Sept. 11 attacks to give law enforcement more power to investigate potential terrorists. ... Since its passage, there have been a lot of myths attached with the Patriot Act's supposed power, from immigrant roundups post 9/11 to the creation of the 'no-fly' list. Some of the powers associated with the act are more of a general sense of heightened security by law enforcement agencies than any single bill. ... The 'no-fly' list, for example, was initiated before the Patriot Act was passed in 2001 —created by a Federal Aviation Administration-issued security directive in 1996. But, still the origin of the no-fly list is mired in secrecy and some confusion. Some security experts have been left scratching their heads when asked when or where exactly the list originated, who is on it and what rights innocent passengers have if their names are similar to those on the list. ... Another issue thought by some to be associated with the Patriot Act are FBI interviews and roundups. Both again are not tied to any legislation but instead to a heightened sense of security, according to Dorothy Ehrlich, the executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California."

Homeland Response:

FAA Was Told In '98 That Al Qaeda Might Hijack Planes, Destroy Landmarks. The New York Times (9/14, Lichtblau) reports, "American aviation officials were warned as early as 1998 that Al Qaeda could 'seek to hijack a commercial jet and slam it into a U.S. landmark,' according to previously secret portions of a report prepared last year by the Sept. 11 commission. ... The White House and many members of the commission, which has completed its official work, have been battling for more than a year over the release of the commission's report on aviation failures, which was completed in August 2004." The Times notes, "While the new version still blacks out numerous references to particular shortcomings in aviation security, it restores dozens of other portions of the report that the administration had been considered too sensitive for public release. The newly disclosed material follows the basic outline of what was already known about aviation failings, namely that the F.A.A. had ample reason to suspect that Al Qaeda might try to hijack a plane yet did little to deter it. But it also adds significant details about the nature and specificity of aviation warnings over the years, security lapses by the government and the airlines, and turf battles between federal agencies." USA Today (9/14) reports, "The new version provides fresh details on repeated warnings about al-Qaeda and its desire to attack airlines in the months before Sept. 11."

The AP (9/14, Miller) reports, "A new version of the Sept. 11 commission's report...was released Tuesday with recently declassified information about terrorist threats and holes in airport security before the attacks." The AP notes, "The new version provides fresh details on the repeated warnings about al-Qaida and its desire to attack airlines in the months before" 9/11. "For example...the Federal Aviation Administration's intelligence unit received 'nearly 200 pieces of threat-related information daily from U.S. intelligence agencies, particularly the FBI, CIA, and State Department.' Also unclassified was the conclusion that the domestic aviation system had, since 1996, 'operated at a security level that was, in effect, a permanent code orange.'"

King And Weldon Look To Secure Votes For Homeland Committee Chair. The Hill (9/14, Kaplan) reports Rep. Peter King, "the leading candidate to take the helm of the Homeland Security Committee, expressed confidence late yesterday that his candidacy will prevail when the GOP Steering Committee meets today to decide the race." Rep. Curt Weldon "who is the current vice chairman of the panel, has campaigned hard for the gavel and continued to search for votes yesterday. He argued that he is the better choice because he has developed expertise and credibility on homeland-security issues. ... Other candidates for the post include Reps. John Linder (Ga.), Dan Lungren (Calif.) and Don Young (Alaska). Rep. Mac Thornberry (Texas) has been mentioned as a candidate, but he has not returned calls to confirm his candidacy."

DHS Begins Review Of Nuclear Plant Safety. The New York Times (9/14, Foderaro) reports, "The United States Department of Homeland Security on Tuesday began a top-to-bottom review of emergency preparedness and security at the Indian Point nuclear plant in Westchester County. The review is part of a sweeping initiative by the federal government to assess the vulnerability of the nation's infrastructure. A dozen experts from several federal agencies, including the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the F.B.I. and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, converged on Indian Point's two reactors, in Buchanan, N.Y., to conduct a three-day inspection."

Diplomatic Bags Bypass Airport Screeners. The Christian Science Monitor (9/14, Marks) reports, "Despite the intense scrutiny of airline passengers and their bags since 9/11, potentially explosive gaps still exist. Top among them, for some analysts, are diplomatic bags - the privileged cargo that is given special immunity. Security experts worry that terrorists could exploit the status of diplomatic pouches, which are protected from being opened or detained in any way by the Vienna Convention of 1961. In the past, rogue countries and individuals have used such bags to transport drugs, arms, and cash - and even to smuggle people. That's because a diplomatic pouch can be a crate big enough to carry a large desk."

Capitol's Improved Security Measures Noted. The Hill (9/14, Kucinich) reports, "For the second time this week, outside mail was halted yesterday because of a power outage at the House off-site mail facility, but recent improvements to mail security allowed interoffice mail and newspapers to continue to circulate. This is just one small example of the numerous security upgrades that have occurred on Capitol Hill since the Sept. 11 attacks. ... The Alternate Computing Facility, designed to handle some of the House and Senate data and communications in the event of a catastrophe, is just one of the security centers built after Sept. 11."

Congress And The Administration Accused Of Ignoring Threat To DC. The Washington Post (9/14) editorializes, "The Bush administration, pertinent congressional committees and the D.C. government are all aware of a study showing that an attack on a single railroad tank car of chlorine traveling through a crowded nation's capital could: Kill or seriously harm 100,000 people within an hour. Set off a toxic plume that could extend over 40 miles.· Leave deadly a core area of about 4 miles by 14 1/2 miles. It is also true that while the D.C. government has enacted a law to deal with the issue, the federal government has taken no serious steps to prevent chemicals that are toxic if inhaled from being shipped through the District. What's more, the Justice Department and CSX Transportation Inc., rather than supporting D.C. legislation that sought to regulate the transport of ultra-hazardous materials through the city, instead obtained a court order to stop the District from enforcing its law."

War News:

Bush Calls On Assad To Stop Flow Of Insurgents Into Iraq. USA Today/AP (9/14) reports President Bush "warned Syria to stop foreign fighters who train there and then cross the border into Iraq." The Washington Times (9/14, Sammon) reports President Bush 'threatened to further isolate Syria if it does not stanch the flow of killers streaming into Iraq and vowed to press his case at the United Nations today. 'The Syrian leader must understand we take his lack of action seriously,' Mr. Bush said of Syrian President Bashar Assad. 'The government is going to become more and more isolated.' ... 'The Syrian government can do a lot more to prevent the flow of foreign fighters into Iraq,' Mr. Bush said. 'These people are coming from Syria into Iraq and killing a lot of innocent people. They're trying to kill our folks, as well.'"

The CBS Evening News (9/13, story 11, 0:30, Schieffer) reported President Bush yesterday "met with the visiting prime minister of Iraq. Both men said this is not the time to set a deadline for pulling American troops out of Iraq. The President also accused Syria of failing to stop the flow of Islamic militants across the border into Iraq."

NBC Nightly News (9/13, lead story, 3:25, Gregory) reported, "At the White House today, Mr. Bush welcomed Iraqi president Jalal Talibani. But the war has, for now, been overshadowed by crisis at home."

Bush Pledges To Keep US Forces Fighting In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Richter) reports President Bush "promised his Iraqi counterpart Tuesday that the United States would persevere in the joint fight against insurgents." Bush "pledged that U.S. forces would 'stay on the offensive alongside Iraqi security forces.'"

Talabani Says Timetable For US Withdrawal Would Be Counter-Productive. USA Today/AP (9/14) reports Iraqi President Jalal Talabani "said Tuesday in Washington that Iraq will not set a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. troops. He said that to do so would send a signal to insurgents that they can weaken the alliance between Iraq and America. Speaking at a White House news conference with President Bush, Talabani held out the option of significant U.S. troop withdrawals by the end of 2006 if Iraqi forces are ready to assume more responsibility for the nation's security. However, he said that would take place only if the United States agreed." Talabani said, "We don't want to do anything without the agreement with the Americans because we don't want to give any signal to the terrorists that our will to defeat them is weakened."

Iraqi Assembly Urges US "Occupation Forces" To Withdraw. Knight Ridder (9/14, Youssef) reports, "In an attempt to lay the legal groundwork for asking the United States to withdraw its troops, an Iraqi National Assembly committee released a report Tuesday that said the presence of the American military prevents Iraq from becoming fully sovereign. The 18-member National Sovereignty Committee, made up of legislators chosen in national elections in January, said the only way Iraq could achieve sovereignty was for multinational forces to leave. The report called for setting a timetable for the troops to go home and referred to them as 'occupation forces,' a first." According to Knight Ridder, "The report also asks the United Nations to issue a resolution declaring Iraq a sovereign country and the government to repeal an order enacted by the U.S. Coalition Provisional Authority that gives foreign nationals here immunity from prosecution in Iraqi courts. It also called for the government to have control over its intelligence operations, palaces and prisons. American forces so far have refused to grant Iraqis access to many intelligence operations, to allow them to occupy several palaces that Saddam built and to let them operate several prisons."

Final Draft Of Iraqi Constitution Unlikely To Satisfy Sunnis. The New York Times (9/14, Worth) reports, "On Tuesday, the leaders in the Shiite-dominated National Assembly said they approved a final, modified version of the proposed new constitution. But the charter still does not come close to mollifying Sunni leaders who had hoped to win far broader changes in the document before the Oct. 15 national referendum. The approval came more than two weeks after the draft was formally presented to Parliament over the objections of some lawmakers." The Times goes on to report, "The leaders of the constitutional drafting committee said they had signed off on a final version, as did Hussein al-Shahristani, the acting speaker of the National Assembly and a leader of its Shiite majority. Mr. Shahristani said that he would announce the document's completion at a news conference on Wednesday, and that it would then be given to United Nations officials, who are responsible for printing and distributing it."

Biden Says Bush Should Postpone Constitutional Referendum. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (9/14) Sen. Joseph Biden writes, "The Bush administration's mishandling of Iraq has brought us to the brink of a national security debacle. To salvage the situation, the administration must fundamentally change course inside Iraq, in the region and at the international level. ... The administration is taking a huge gamble by going forward with a referendum for a constitution that is more likely to divide Iraq than to unite it." Biden continues, "The Bush administration's hope seems to be that Sunnis and Iraqi women will 'get over it.' But hope and stubbornness do not constitute a strategy. ... If negotiators don't reach reasonable compromises that bring moderate Sunnis on board, the Bush administration should support postponing the constitutional referendum until after elections for a new National Assembly are held in December, which would allow a new committee with elected Sunni members to reconsider the draft."

Baghdad Bomber Kills At Least 82 Seeking Jobs. Reuters (9/14) reports, "A suicide bomber blew up his minibus after luring a crowd of men to the vehicle with promises of work in Baghdad on Wednesday, killing at least 82 people and wounding 163, police and officials said. ... Bodies lay in the street beside burned-out cars, witnesses said. Some used wooden carts to haul away the dead." USA Today/AP (9/14) reports, "At least 73 people were killed early today when a terrorist drove an explosives-filled vehicle into a crowd of laborers waiting for construction work. ... Lt. Col. Moayad Zubair said 73 people died and 162 were injured. He said the death toll would probably go up because some of the wounded were unlikely to survive."

The New York Times (9/14, Worth) reports, "The attack appeared to be the latest sectarian strike directed against Shiites in Baghdad, who have been repeatedly targeted by Sunni Arab insurgents and terrorists bent on exploiting Sunni-Shiite divisions across Iraq." The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Sanders) reports, "t was the deadliest bombing in Iraq since a suicide attacker ignited a fuel tanker July 16 near a Shiite mosque in the central town of Musayyib, killing almost 100 people."

US And Iraqi Forces Cut Down Frequency Of Attacks On Airport Road. USA Today (9/14, For) reports, "Attacks on and around the 7-mile highway linking Baghdad to its international airport have dropped 41% since May, the result of increased U.S. and Iraqi troop presence and new tactics to battle insurgents along one of the world's most dangerous roads. There hasn't been a suicide car bombing on the road since April, according to U.S. military statistics through August. U.S. officers attribute the decline to an influx of Iraqi troops who have been stationed at key points. ... In May, insurgents staged 49 attacks on the road and in surrounding neighborhoods, including assaults with deadly roadside bombs and rocket-propelled grenades. ... The number of attacks fell to 29 in August, mostly small-arms fire."

US Warplanes Bomb Haditha In Northern Iraq. The AP (9/14, El-Tablawy) reports, "U.S. forces widened their operations against insurgents in northern Iraq on Tuesday, launching an attack on the Euphrates River stronghold of Haditha only days after evicting militants from Tal Afar. Residents also reported American air strikes in the same region near Qaim. The Americans called in bombing raids in Haditha, 140 miles northwest of the capital. They captured one militant with ties to al-Qaida in Iraq and killed four others. In the volatile city of Qaim, about 80 miles northwest of Haditha, residents said clashes broke out between insurgents and coalition forces. The U.S. military did not confirm the air strike. ... After the raid Tuesday on Haditha, Associated Press Television News videotape showed at least three houses that residents said were demolished in the U.S. air strike."

Army Colonel Alleges Insurgents In Tal Afar Have Committed Atrocities. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution/AP (9/14, Burns) reports Col. H.R. McMaster, commander of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, "asserted Tuesday that extremist fighters in northern Iraq committed atrocities against civilians, including beheadings, torture and the booby-trapping of a murdered child's body. The accusations...included some of the most graphic and specific charges by an American military officer during the ongoing battle for control of Tal Afar, a city about 50 miles from the Syrian border that has been an insurgent stronghold." McMaster "said Tal Afar is not yet under the control of the 5,000 Iraqi government forces and 3,500 to 3,800 U.S. troops that have been fighting together there for the past two weeks. He predicted eventual victory but said it was impossible to know how long it would take before the Iraqis can control Tal Afar by themselves." The Washington Post (9/14, A27, Finer) reports, "During the incursion into Tall Afar...more than 550 suspected insurgents have been killed or captured this month, commanders said. Much of the fighting was carried out with airstrikes or by the Iraqi army, which led the assault."

Jaafari Receives Warm Welcome From Iraqi Expatriates In Michigan. The New York Times (9/14, Hakim, Peters) reports Dearborn, Michigan's Iraqi-American population "embraced" Iraqi prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari. But "they also had plenty of questions in a town hall meeting that was at times contentious. Attendees asked Mr. Jaafari about the future of Kirkuk, whether the rights of Chaldeans would be respected, whether there were still Iraqi prisoners of war in Iran and whether Iraqi embassies throughout the world and government agencies in the country were still stocked with former Baathists. And they wanted to know when justice and the rule of law would return to their native land." The Times notes, "Nisrin Kadum, 49, a banking specialist at Comerica Bank who fled Iraq in 1979, was almost shouted down when she asked about the role of women in the country."

Iraqi Legislature Considers Expanding Application Of Capital Punishment. The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Levey) reports, "Struggling to fight back against insurgents roiling the country, Iraqi lawmakers have begun to debate sweeping anti-terrorism legislation that could significantly expand use of the death penalty." Iraq's leaders "are contemplating expanding the list of crimes punishable by death to include offenses such as attacking government buildings, using explosives to kill people and advocating sectarian violence. ... Although many Iraqis have been calling for more executions since the insurgency began, some Sunni Arabs fear that they will be unfairly targeted by the death penalty because the rebellion is centered in Sunni regions of the country. And human rights groups are expressing concern that an expanded use of the death penalty may push Iraq back toward a time when the government wantonly executed its opponents."

Iraqi Economy And Currency Said To Be Performing Above Expectations. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (9/14) Amir Taheri, author of "L'Irak: Le Dessous Des Cartes," writes, "In the Tehran moneychangers' bazaar" there is an increasing demand for the Iraqi dinar. Taheri adds, "With the world media depicting Iraq as a ship sinking in a sea of blood, and self-styled experts predicting civil war or disintegration, it is hard to imagine why anyone would want to abandon such all-time favorites as the U.S. dollar and the euro, not to mention the oil currencies of the region, in favor of the world's newest money.

One reason, of course, is the sharp rise in the supply of dollars, a result of the dramatic increase in the price of oil. (Iran is earning something like $200 million each day from its oil exports.) ... Some Americans might think that Iraq owes its robust economic performance to a flood of dollars provided by the U.S. taxpayers. The IMF report shows that this is not the case. Iraq is paying 90% of its own expenditures, including the cost of economic reconstruction."

US Considers Pulling 20 Percent Of Troops From Afghanistan Next Year. The Washington Post (9/14, A26, Graham) reports, "U.S. military commanders have drafted plans to lower the number of American troops in Afghanistan by roughly 20 percent next year if NATO-led troops from Europe continue to widen their role in securing the country, according to senior officers here. A reduction of as many as 4,000 of the nearly 20,000 American troops in Afghanistan would be the largest drop in a force that generally has grown since the U.S.-led invasion in late 2001. ... 'It makes sense that as NATO forces go in, and they're more in number, that we could drop some of the U.S. requirement somewhat,' Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the senior U.S. commander in the region, said in an interview here. He stressed that no decision had been made to shrink the U.S. military presence." The Post notes, "The planning comes as intensified fighting in Afghanistan this year has killed more than 50 Americans, the highest death toll in any year since the troops arrived."

Rumsfeld Seeks More NATO Forces For Afghanistan. The Wall Street Journal (9/14. A19, Jaffe) reports, "Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld urged NATO nations to continue efforts to expand their presence in Afghanistan -- a move that eventually could enable the U.S. to draw down its own troops in the country. ... U.S. officials say they believe NATO troops will take over security in the country's once-restive south. The increased NATO presence and the development of Afghan security forces eventually should allow the U.S. to begin reducing its presence, Mr. Rumsfeld said." The New York Times (9/14, Schmitt, Cloud) reports, "Germany, supported by Britain, France and other European allies, said Tuesday at a meeting of defense ministers in Berlin that it strongly opposed any American-backed restructuring of the NATO command structure that could lead to having alliance troops become involved in counterinsurgency. Because those operations represent a large part of American troop activity in the south, it is not clear whether the reductions can go forward. In the past few months, violence has surged in the south, with Taliban forces conducting a campaign of assassinations and intimidation ahead of elections on Sunday."

The AP (9/14, Baldor) reports that at the two-day NATO meeting, Rumsfeld "aid NATO's move to take on a larger role in Afghanistan, including drug interdiction, will be a key topic of discussion throughout the meeting. 'Over time it would be nice if NATO would develop counterterrorist capabilities which don't exist at the current time,' he said. ... Rumsfeld said he is also urging his defense counterparts to find ways to increase the military flexibility of NATO's forces and the financing for the alliance. Several countries put limits on the military activity their forces can engage in as part of NATO, such as limiting where they can go or what type of combat force they can use."

Three US Soldiers Face Charges Relating To Afghans' Deaths. The New York Times/AP (9/14, Press) reports, "An Army officer and two more of his soldiers from a Reserve unit have been charged in a prisoner abuse investigation in Afghanistan, the Army announced Tuesday. The officer, Capt. Christopher M. Beiring, who led the 377th Military Police Company based in Cincinnati, was charged with dereliction of duty and making a false official statement. He is the first officer to be charged in the investigation. The abuse case primarily involves two detainees who died at the Bagram Air Base detention center, where Captain Beiring's unit worked. The first, Mullah Habibullah, was found dead in his cell at the detention center just days after being taken into American custody in December 2002. A second detainee, Dilawar, arrived at Bagram the day after Mr. Habibullah died. Mr. Dilawar died about a week later."

US To Fund Military Prison In Afghanistan To House Gitmo Detainees. The Washington Times (9/14, Scarborough) reports, "The Pentagon will help finance construction of a locally run military prison in Afghanistan as part of a plan to send to their home countries scores of terror detainees at the prison at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay" Matthew C. Waxman, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, "said the United States will help Afghanistan build a military prison to detain enemy combatants and to accept transfers from Guantanamo. A defense official could not supply details on the new prison, saying talks were in the early stages."

Safdar Hussain, "A top Pakistani military commander...said Tuesday that his forces had arrested 21 militants along the border, found a remotely piloted spy plane and seized a cache of arms and communications equipment believed to be used in insurgent operations in Afghanistan." Hussain "also said his forces had detected a recruitment office that was bringing in new fighters for the war against the Afghan government and the American-led forces there."

Spagnoletti, the city government's chief lawyer, is one of three candidates for an opening on the bench of D.C. Superior Court." The Post continues, "Spagnoletti, 42, has had his eye on a judgeship for at least a few years, but when he took on his current job in May 2003, he indicated to Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) that he was committed to staying through the mayor's current term. The new opportunity comes more than a year before the mayor's race, and Williams has yet to declare whether he will seek reelection." The Post adds, "A prosecutor for 13 years before joining the mayor's Cabinet, Spagnoletti was on the short list for the Superior Court bench once before, in 2000, while he was working at the U.S. attorney's office. His current job has given him a much higher public profile. ... In addition to Spagnoletti, the D.C. Judicial Nomination Commission chose Andrew Fois, a former assistant attorney general at the Justice Department, and Carol A. Dalton, a D.C. Superior Court magistrate judge, for consideration by President Bush. The opening was created by the appointment of Judge Noel A. Kramer to the D.C. Court of Appeals."

Judge Splits Enron Broadband Case Into Three Separate Retrials. The AP (9/14, Hays) reports, "Five former executives from Enron Corp.'s defunct broadband unit whose trial ended with jurors unable to reach verdicts on most charges will be retried in three separate cases next year." The AP continues, "Nearly two months ago a jury returned acquittals on some charges after a three-month trial but was deadlocked on dozens more. U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore declared a mistrial on those charges and set retrial dates Monday." The AP adds, "At least one of the trials, involving conspiracy and fraud counts against the broadband unit's former finance chief and a former in-house accountant, was scheduled for May 1. It is likely to overlap with the conspiracy and fraud trial of Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling, set to begin in January in a courtroom next door to Gilmore's. The other two cases were scheduled for June 5 and Sept. 5. ... All five broadband defendants, as well as Lay and Skilling, have pleaded innocent. ... Barry Pollack, who represents former in-house Enron broadband accountant Michael Krautz, questioned whether a a fair jury could be found in the middle of the publicity of the ongoing Lay and Skilling trial."

to trial. ... 'That would have probably tripled the cost,' said Bill Bowen, part of a team of at least nine lawyers who defended Rudolph." The AP adds, "Rudolph is serving four life terms after pleading guilty in the Birmingham clinic bombing, which killed a police officer in 1998, and the Olympics bombing, in which a woman died in 1996. He also pleaded guilty in two other bombings that occurred in Atlanta in 1997. ... U.S. Attorney Alice Martin said the government had not computed the total cost of prosecuting Rudolph, who was the subject of an intense manhunt following the Birmingham bombing in 1998 until May 2003, when he was captured in Murphy, N.C." The AP notes, "The cost of defending Rudolph was disclosed in an order filed last week by U.S. District Judge Lynwood Smith. Attorneys in the Alabama case were paid $2.02 million for representing Rudolph, who declared himself broke and received court-appointed legal representation following his arrest in 2003."

Massachusetts Teen Pleads Guilty To Hacking Paris Hilton's Cell Phone. The Washington Post (9/14, Krebs) reports, "A Massachusetts teenager has pleaded guilty to hacking into the cell-phone account of hotel heiress and Hollywood celebrity Paris Hilton, a high-profile stunt by the youngest member of the same hacking group federal investigators say was responsible for a series of electronic break-ins at data giant LexisNexis." The Post continues, "The 17-year-old boy was sentenced to 11 months' detention at a juvenile facility for a string of crimes that include the online posting of revealing photos and celebrity contact numbers from Hilton's phone. As an adult, he will then undergo two years of supervised release in which he will be barred from possessing or using any computer, cell phone or other electronic equipment capable of accessing the Internet." The Post adds, "The U.S. Attorney's Office for Massachusetts and the state district court declined to identify the teen, noting that federal juvenile proceedings and the identity of juvenile defendants are under seal. But a law enforcement official close to the case confirmed that the crimes admitted to by the teen included the hacking of Hilton's account. ... The teen also pleaded guilty to making bomb threats at two high schools and for breaking into a telephone company's computer system to set up free wireless-phone accounts for friends. He also participated in an attack on data-collection firm LexisNexis Group that exposed personal records of more than 300,000 consumers. Prosecutors said victims of the teen's actions have suffered about $1 million in damages."

The Tribune adds, "Spilmon, 44, pleaded guilty to 12 counts of health care fraud and one count of money laundering. ... The Tribune notes, "At the time of his guilty plea, Spilmon admitted to submitting billings and claims for reimbursement to Medicaid for treatments and diagnostic procedures that were never done or were not necessary. ... Spilmon was accused of falsely billing the heath care benefits program for the needy for more than $2.4 million from 2001 to 2003. ... He took his mobile dental units to areas where he could serve needy youths between 12 and 18, purporting to provide adequate dental care for them, when he was just engaging in a massive billing fraud, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Donald Schmid. ... The U.S. Marshals Service may take the two mobile dental units to the Gulf Coast to assist in Hurricane Katrina relief efforts, Schmid said."

Novak was taken into custody after he allegedly deposited money in a Brockton bank, federal authorities said." The AP adds, "Gov. Mitt Romney called for Novak to step down while the investigation continues. ... 'The charges against Larry Novak are very troubling and Gov. Romney believes that it's appropriate while these charges are pending for Mr. Novak to step aside as vice chairman of the state party,' said Romney's spokesman, Eric Fehrnstrom." The AP notes, "Republican Party Executive Director Tim O'Brien said the charges are unrelated to Novak's GOP role. Novak served as the party's treasurer in the late 1990s. ... Novak made an initial appearance in U.S. District Court late Tuesday and was released on $25,000 non-surety bond. Neither he nor his attorney would comment on the charges. ... Woman Faces Death Penalty In Texas Killing. The Washington Times (9/14, Aynesworth) reports, "Texas stands ready today to execute the first black woman, and only the third female, to be put to death since the state resumed capital punishment in 1982. Frances Newton, 40, was convicted of murdering her husband and two children in 1987. She always has maintained her innocence, though prosecutors convinced a Harris County jury that she killed her family for $100,000 in insurance money." The paper adds, "Only a last minute stay of execution by Gov. Rick Perry or intervention by the Supreme Court can halt the execution. Newton's lawyers wrote a letter to Mr. Perry Monday, asking for a 30-day stay in their efforts to show that prosecutors erred in linking her to a presumed murder weapon. Unlike the days preceding the executions of Karla Faye Tucker in 1998 and Betty Lou Beets in 2002, Newton's plight has not elicited much interest from outside the state, although the president of the American Bar Association has asked the governor to intercede, citing 'compelling new evidence' that 'has not been evaluated by Texas courts.'"

The children, "who range in age from one to 14, are all adopted and all severely disabled. They were locked up, their parents say, for their own good."

DeLay Associates To Face Additional Felony Charges. The Dallas Morning News (9/14, Slater) reports, "Two political associates of U.S. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay were indicted Tuesday on additional felony charges of illegally using corporate money to elect Republicans in 2002. John Colyandro and Jim Ellis were charged with using $190,000 in corporate money to make campaign contributions to GOP candidates for the Texas House in what prosecutors say was an illegal money-laundering scheme." Colyandro, "former executive director of the Texans for a Republican Majority Political Action Committee, and Mr. Ellis, who heads Mr. DeLay's Washington-based Americans for a Republican Majority, were indicted earlier on money-laundering charges. Tuesday's charges focus on the campaign contributions. Both defendants deny wrongdoing." DeLay, "who created both political action committees, is not charged in the three-year grand jury investigation into allegations of illegal corporate cash in Texas political races."

2nd Circuit Approves Allocation Formula For Holocaust Settlement. The New York Law Journal (9/14, Hamblett) reports, "An Eastern District of New York judge's allocation of settlement funds to the most needy, elderly victims in the Holocaust Victims Assets litigation has been upheld by a federal appeals court." The Journal continues, "In a decision issued Friday written by Judge Jose Cabranes, the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the formula used by Judge Edward Korman that placed special emphasis on compensating Holocaust victims who live in the former Soviet Union." The Journal adds, "The principal issues in the appeals were settled by the circuit in In Re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation cases 04-1898-cv and 04-1899-cv. The appeals challenged Korman's geography-based allocation of a $1.25 billion settlement with Swiss banks and other organizations designed to aid victims of the Holocaust. ... The proceeds of the settlement are to be divided among five classes -- the Deposited Assets Class (those whose assets were stolen from Swiss banks); the Looted Assets Class (those whose possessions were stolen by the Nazis and then disposed of through Swiss banks), two classes of those forced into slave labor by the Nazis, and a fifth Refugee Class."

USA Today Says Bush Should "Pick A Fight" Over Base Closures. An editorial in USA Today (9/14) says President Bush must decide by the end of next week "what to do with a list of military base closings and realignments he received Thursday from a special commission. The president has two choices: approve the list, or kick it back to the commission for further review. Because the panel gave the Pentagon most of what it sought, and because Bush is occupied with Hurricane Katrina and other issues, he's not expected to pick a fight. But this is a fight worth picking. ... The president has a full plate right now, but he shouldn't pass up a chance to save money and improve defense — even if it means putting the commission back to work."

With Ellsworth Open, Thune Can Expand Nationally. Roll Call (9/14, Preston) reports, "A few days before a federal commission was scheduled to decide the fate of Ellsworth Air Force Base, South Dakota's two Senators," John Thune (R) and Tim Johnson (D), "preemptively released a lengthy statement pledging to work together on issues of importance to the state." Soon afterwards, the commission voted to keep it open. "The Ellsworth victory now allows Thune to spend part of his time helping the national Republican Party." Ellsworth's closing "would have been so damaging" because "it would have forced Thune to shore up support in his home state rather than advancing his national ambitions."

DOJ Probing Florida Prisons. The St. Petersburg (FL) Times (9/14) reports, "The FBI confirmed Tuesday it is investigating the Florida Department of Corrections, though the nature of the probe is unclear." The Times continues, "FBI agents are working with the Florida Department of Law Enforcement, said FBI spokesman Jeff Westcott in Jacksonville. He declined to provide details. ... 'I can confirm that the FBI, along with FDLE, are involved in an investigation that concerns the Department of Corrections,' Westcott said." The Times adds, "A high-ranking state prison official, Region I director Allen "A.C." Clark, quit last week without explanation. Clark rose through the ranks under Corrections Secretary James Crosby, who also has declined to discuss why he quit, other than citing 'personal reasons.' ... Gov. Jeb Bush suggested Monday that he knew details but could discuss them. ... Four current or former Corrections Department employees were charged in February with illegal distribution of steroids. The case involved the Justice Department, FDLE, Clay County Sheriff's Office and federal postal inspectors."

Report Finds Blacks, Hispanics, Pay Higher Mortgage Interest Rates. Knight Ridder (9/14, Appelbaum) reports, "In a national report issued Tuesday, the Federal Reserve Board said blacks and Hispanics disproportionately receive high interest rates on mortgage loans, that it does not know why and it intends to find out." Knight Ridder continues, "Regulators will examine lending by about 200 selected companies to see if discrimination affected pricing decisions, the report said. The Fed declined to name the firms. ... The Fed also said it will examine whether blacks and Hispanics are sometimes steered to high-rate lenders when they could qualify for a market-rate loan." Knight Ridder adds, "The report is the federal government's opening statement in an accelerating public debate about the role of race in loan pricing. ... For the first time, lenders must disclose which of their loans carry a high rate. ... The Charlotte Observer reported in August that blacks were four times as likely as whites last year to receive high rates on home purchase loans, based on the newspaper's analysis of about half of all loans. Hispanics were twice as likely."

NYTimes Opposes Pennsylvania Bill Limiting Parolee Voting Rights. The New York Times (9/14) opposes a bill passed by the House that "could potentially deprive tens of thousands of parolees and probationers of the right to vote." The bill "represents an odious attempt by lawmakers to undo a state court ruling overturning a law that required newly released prisoners to wait five years before getting the right to vote. ... Legislators are also trying to direct public attention away from a hugely unpopular pay raise that they voted for themselves earlier this year. That makes the attack on voting rights all the more reprehensible."

Microsoft, Google Claim Victory In Hiring Lawsuit. The Washington Post (9/14, D5, Vise) reports that a Washington state judge yesterday ruled "that a former Microsoft executive hired by Google can begin doing some, but not all, work for the search engine company in China, the latest twist in a battle that will play out into next year." The paper says, "In a written opinion, King County Superior Court Judge Steven C. Gonzalez ruled that Kai-Fu Lee can start recruiting employees for Google, meeting with government and university officials, and establishing a headquarters for Google's new research center. But, pending a trial in January, the judge barred Lee from hiring anyone away from Microsoft, using confidential information he learned during his employment there, or working in computer search and other specified fields for Google." The Post adds, "Tom Burt, Microsoft's deputy general counsel for litigation, said the Redmond, Wash.-based software giant had succeeded in severely restricting Lee's activities and use of corporate secrets. He said Google was paying Lee $10 million to head its China operations even though he could actually do very little of substance in light of the ruling. ... Nicole Wong, associate general counsel for Google, said Lee would immediately get rolling, hiring employees in China and establishing a new research center there."

The AP (9/14, Johnson) reports, "Lee cannot set budget or compensation levels or define the research that Google will do in China, but he can hire people to work there, the judge said. ... Lee, who has worked at Microsoft since 2000 and oversaw development of its MSN Internet search technology, including desktop search software rivaling Google's, left in July to lead Google's expansion into China. ... Microsoft sued Lee and Google, contending that Lee's job at Google would violate the terms of a noncompete agreement, which prohibits him from doing similar work for a rival for a year. Microsoft also accused Lee of using insider information to get his job at Mountain View, Calif.-based Google. ... Google has responded with its own lawsuit against Microsoft in U.S. District Court in San Jose, Calif."

Gates Discusses Microsoft's Competition With Google, Others. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (9/14, Bishop) reports, "Microsoft Corp. is grappling with 'a lot of smart competitors,' including Google and Apple, who are ahead of the Redmond company in some key markets, Bill Gates acknowledges. … But the Microsoft chairman on Tuesday said his company remains the overall industry leader, and he compared the current rivalries to legendary ones with Lotus, Novell and WordPerfect -- situations in which the Redmond company ultimately overcame steep odds to prevail. … 'At any point in our history, we've had competitors who were better at doing something,' Gates said in an interview with the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, underscoring the fact that it wouldn't be unprecedented to come from behind now." The P-I continues, "That was one of the subjects addressed by Gates during the interview at the company's Professional Developers Conference, where Microsoft is seeking to rally support for Windows Vista and Office 12, the next versions of its dominant PC software programs. Among other things, the company showed plans to shift away from traditional drop-down menus to a new "ribbon" of commands across the top of the widely used Office programs. … Gates answered questions on a wide range of topics, including Microsoft's growth prospects in the Seattle region, its ambitions in China, and efforts to shore up the security of its software."

Whirlpool Makes Intent To Acquire Maytag Official. The AP (9/13, Prichard) reports, "Whirlpool Corp. has officially notified the Federal Trade Commission and the U.S. Department of Justice of its intent to purchase rival appliance maker Maytag Corp. in a cash-and-stock deal valued at more than $1.7 billion." The AP continues, "Whirlpool sent notification letters last week to both agencies because it is unclear at this point whether it will be the FTC or the Justice Department that will investigate possible antitrust concerns, Whirlpool spokesman Steve Duthie said Tuesday. … 'Neither Justice nor the FTC has considered or ruled on a merger in the U.S. appliance industry for a long time – 15 to 20 years, I think,' Duthie said." The AP adds, "Once the regulators figure out which of them has jurisdiction, Benton Harbor-based Whirlpool will provide the investigating agency with more details about its planned acquisition of Maytag, he said. … Probably by the end of this month, Whirlpool will notify the Securities and Exchange Commission that it plans to issue new shares of stock to be given to Maytag shareholders as part of the proposed transaction." The AP notes, "Shareholders of Newton, Iowa-based Maytag must approve the acquisition and will vote on the proposal before the end of the year, the company said last month. The agreement does not need the approval of Whirlpool's shareholders."

US Cellular To Acquire Alltel's Kansas, Nebraska Operations. The AP (9/13) reports, "Wireless carrier U.S. Cellular Corp. said Tuesday it is acquiring Cellular One's operations in Nebraska and Kansas in a move to expand its presence in the Midwest. … In exchange, U.S. Cellular will transfer its Idaho networks to an Alltel Corp. unit and pay $50 million." The AP continues, "U.S. Cellular said the deal will give it about 125,000 retail customers, 193 cell sites, 15 company-owned stores and 89 agent locations in an area containing about 1.4 million people. The company currently operates in 25 counties in southeastern Nebraska and 80 counties in northeastern and southeastern Kansas." The AP adds, "Little Rock, Ark.-based Alltel will receive about 91,000 customers, 84 cell sites, six company stores and 32 agent locations in a region containing about 500,000 people. … The companies predicted that the deal will close in the fourth quarter, pending approval by communications regulators and the Justice Department. After the agreement is complete, both companies will continue operating their stores under the old brand names until they are remodeled."

PECO Submits Proposed Settlement To Resolve Exelon-PSEG Merger Concerns. Dow Jones Newswires (9/13) reports, "Exelon Corp.'s Peco Energy unit filed with Pennsylvania utility regulators a settlement that the company expects will resolve state regulatory concerns related to Exelon's planned merger with New Jersey utility Public Service Enterprise Group Inc." Dow Jones continues, "Exelon and PSEG agreed in December to merge. The deal has received regulatory approval from New York, Connecticut and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, but still requires the go-ahead from Pennsylvania, New Jersey and the Justice Department." Dow Jones adds, "In a press release Tuesday, PECO said its settlement offer to the Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission would cap rates for five years and give rate discounts of $120 million over the next four years. … Peco said a judge with the Pennsylvania regulator will review the proposed settlement, which also includes funding for investment in 'alternative' energy and environmental projects. … The judge is expected to make a recommendation before the settlement goes before the regulator for a full vote, which Peco said may happen before the end of the year."

America West Shareholders OK Merger With US Airways. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Urbanowicz) reports that America West Holdings Corp. said Tuesday its shareholders have voted in favor of the company's merger with US Airways Group Inc., "clearing the way for the deal to close this month." The Journal adds, "The parent company of low-fare carrier America West Airlines said 95.5% of total voting shares were voted in favor of the deal. Class A shareholders voted 100% in favor of the deal, while class B shareholders voted 85.2% in favor. Out of the class B shareholders, 4.4% opposed the deal and 10.4% abstained from voting." America West President and Chief Executive Doug Parker said in a prepared statement, "With US Airways final bankruptcy court hearing scheduled for later this week, we anticipate closing our merger with US Airways at the end of September as previously scheduled." The Journal notes that US Airways' bankruptcy turnaround plan relies on the merger with America West. The US Bankruptcy Court of Alexandria, Va., has a hearing scheduled for Thursday to consider final court approval of the air carrier's Chapter 11 turnaround plan. Under the deal, America West will become a wholly owned unit of US Airways, and existing America West shareholders will receive about 37% of the merged airline's shares.

The Washington Times (9/14, Glanz) reports, "US Airways Group Inc. yesterday took a big step toward emerging from bankruptcy when shareholders at America West approved combining the two airlines." The paper adds, "The combination of US Airways and America West would create the nation's sixth-largest airline and a low-cost carrier with a broad geographic reach. Perhaps more important for US Airways, yesterday's vote made it more likely that US Bankruptcy Court Judge Stephen Mitchell would approve its reorganization plan, analysts said. ... Judge Mitchell's hearing on US Airways' reorganization plan, scheduled for tomorrow, is the last hurdle the company must clear before a merger can take effect and its second trip into bankruptcy can end." Ray Neidl, an airline industry analyst for Calyon Securities Inc., in New York, said, "I expect [the court's] approval."

Lawsuit Charges Wal-Mart Ignores Overseas Labor Abuses. The New York Times (9/14, Greenhouse) reports, "A labor rights group filed a class-action lawsuit yesterday against Wal-Mart Stores in which apparel workers in Bangladesh, China and other countries assert that Wal-Mart violated its contractual obligations by not enforcing its code of conduct for overseas contractors. The lawsuit, filed in state court in Los Angeles, makes the novel argument that Wal-Mart's code of conduct created contractual obligations between it and thousands of workers employed by contractors who were supposed to comply with the code." The Times adds, "In the lawsuit brought by the International Labor Rights Fund, workers from Bangladesh, China, Indonesia, Nicaragua and Swaziland assert that the codes of conduct were violated in dozens of ways. They said they were often paid less than the minimum wage and did not receive time-and-a-half for overtime, and some said they were beaten by managers and were locked in their factories." The suit says, "Based on its vast economic power, Wal-Mart, based on its code of conduct, can and does control the working conditions of its supplier factories. It could use its power and position to prevent its producers from profiting from the inhumane treatment of plaintiffs." The paper notes "Wal-Mart executives say that they have the world's largest overseas monitoring program, with more than 5,000 factories inspected by 200 full-time inspectors who visit 30 factories a day."

The Washington Post (9/14, D6, Barbaro) reports, "An American labor rights group filed a class-action lawsuit yesterday against Wal-Mart Stores Inc., alleging that suppliers in five countries violated workers' rights, including denying a minimum wage, requiring overtime and punishing union activity." The Post adds, "The suit, which must be certified by a judge before achieving class-action status, is the latest legal salvo against the discount retailer, which faces class-action suits claiming that it discriminated against black truck drivers and female store employees. If certified, the suit could represent 200,000 to 400,000 people, said lawyer Terry Collingsworth of the International Labor Rights Fund." The paper notes The International Labor Rights Fund, a District-based advocacy group, filed the suit on behalf of 15 foreign workers who claimed they were subjected to illegal working conditions, and four California grocery employees who claimed that Wal-Mart's cost-cutting measures resulted in lower wages and benefits.

Patent Litigation Threatens Corporations. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Bulkeley, A1) reports, "In one of Douglas Fougnies's early business ventures, he provided phony new-vehicle titles for stolen cars. His partner, Larry Day, is a onetime blackjack dealer in Las Vegas. Together, the two men have found a more lucrative line of work: suing cellphone companies for patent infringement. Earlier this year their company -- which consists of four employees and six patents -- won $128 million in damages from Boston Communications Group Inc. and four other companies over alleged misuse of a 1998 patent." The paper adds that Fougnies and Day "are successful practitioners of a growing trade." The Journal notes, "Lured by the potential returns, hedge funds and other institutional investors now are bankrolling businesses that buy up patent portfolios. More law firms, including some branching out from product-liability and malpractice work, are taking patent cases on a contingency basis. That means the law firms are paid a percentage of any damages awarded but little or nothing if the patent-holder loses. Critics call the small litigants 'patent trolls' and say they are parasites on successful businesses."

Oracle's Purchase Of Siebel Raises Creativity Concerns. United Press International (9/14, Goto) reports, "Software group Oracle's bid for Siebel Systems for a cool $5.85 billion Monday was greeted by many Wall Street analysts as a signal of the return of mega-mergers and better still -- renewed confidence in the information technology sector. ... After all, earlier in the day online auction house eBay announced it will be acquiring Internet telecommunications group Skype for $2.6 billion." UPI continues, "As the world's biggest database-software company, the Silicon Valley-based Oracle would be acquiring a group that is one of the biggest players in customer relation management software, tracking marketing data, client information and other data that helps companies be more efficient in their sales strategies. The deal is still subject to U.S. government regulations under the auspices of the Department of Justice, but while some industry analysts have high hopes for Oracle making the most of the acquisition, others are not so certain." UPI adds, "One thing, however, is certain. For Thomas Siebel himself, founder and chief executive of the company and once himself an Oracle executive, the deal is a very good one as Siebel Systems was faced with a growing number of rivals, while not many companies expressed interest in taking it over. Meanwhile, for Lawrence Ellison, Oracle's chief executive, it could well be that he finally would feel vanquished after years of bitter and public animosity with Siebel following his departure from Oracle. ... 'The combination of Siebel applications with the development capacity of Oracle to enhance our (client relation management) product set ... is a very beneficial business combination that will allow us to be even more effective in delivering high quality, leading edge solutions,' Thomas Siebel said in a news release. ... Ellison too was equally ebullient about the deal, stating that 'in a single step, Oracle becomes the number one CRM applications company in the world. Siebel's 4,000 applications customers and 3,400,000 CRM users strengthen our number one position in applications in North America and move us closer to the number one position in applications globally.' ... Analysts, however, were less effusive about the planned buyout, even when they agreed it could be a mutually beneficial deal."

Realtors Under Renewed Fire From DOJ Suit. CNN/Money (9/14) reports, "Are home buyers any closer to actually saving money on commissions? ... The Department of Justice last week sued the National Association of Realtors over its "opt-out" policy -- the latest shot in an ongoing war to force competition in the real-estate industry, and one that could just maybe lead to a lowering of the standard 6 percent commission." CNN/Money continues, "The opt-out policy allows NAR members to keep their real-estate listings from being broadly disseminated over the Internet. ... Real-estate brokers regularly share information about listings. That enables them to put together buyers and sellers more efficiently. But if an agent opts out, it means that none of his listings can be displayed on other agents' Web sites. And he cannot list other agents' properties on his. ... If a buyer begins his home search on the Web, he may never see some of the properties available. That, to the Justice Department, does a disservice to consumers. Buyers would have fewer homes to choose from. Sellers would have fewer buyers bidding for their properties." CNN/Money adds, "Why would a broker want to opt out? After all, it's in the agent's best interest to have as many buyers as possible see (and bid on) a property, and the agent has a fiduciary responsibility to get the seller as high a price as the home can command. ... NAR spokesman Peter Cook said that the opt-out policy is simply a way to provide good service -- many clients don't want their properties widely displayed on the Internet. Some of the wealthy and the famous wish to avoid publicity and some sellers have safety or security issues. ... But critics, such as Bruce MacDonald, deputy attorney general in the antitrust division of the Justice Department, said this opt-out system is designed to 'elbow out' Web-based competitors. ... This is not the first effort by the Justice Department to shake up the real-estate industry. ... Previous victories for the government agency came in Kentucky, on July 13, when the state real-estate commission agreed to allow real-estate brokers to offer rebates, discounts and other inducements to consumers to win their business. ... A similar agreement was reached in South Dakota this August. The Kentucky and South Dakota cases established the policy that brokers are allowed to lower their fees to drum up business."

WSJ Calls DOJ Suit Against Realtors "Right Target, Wrong Weapon." The Wall Street Journal (9/14) editorializes, "We've been pounding the National Association of Realtors over its anti-competitive behavior, and last week the U.S. Justice Department filed its own antitrust suit charging the Realtors with illegally squeezing low-cost Internet companies out of the market. So why aren't we thrilled? Because this is a case of right target, wrong weapon." The Journal continues, "At issue is the Realtor practice of preventing Internet competitors from having access to the properties for sale on the local 'Multiple Listing Service,' or MLS. The antitrust suit maintains that Realtor 'policy prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting.'" The Journal adds, "The Realtors have acknowledged in internal memos that many of their practices are meant to limit competition and preserve their lofty commissions -- typically 5% to 6% on the sale price. As such, the Realtor response to Justice that denying Internet firms access to MLS listings is 'pro-consumer, pro-competitive, and pro-innovation' fails to pass the laugh test. ... At the very least, these practices violate the ethical and fiduciary duty of real-estate agents to help find the best home at the best price for their clients. ... And yet we have to admit the Realtors have a legitimate claim that they created and own the local MLS database of homes for sale. They are thus within their rights to use their private property as they wish, even if that includes denying access to competitors. As an economic matter, there are no natural barriers to entry here; anyone can start a competing listing service if he desires. The Justice Department's lawsuit would require that all homes be listed on the MLS even if home sellers don't want them to be. ... A federal lawsuit seems to be an inferior way to crack the real-estate cartel, especially since it may well lose on the legal merits. Far preferable would be for the states to repeal their laws that sustain the Realtor racket to the detriment of their own citizens and the cause of homeownership."

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Senate Rejects Challenge To EPA Mercury Rules. The AP (9/14) reports that in a 51-47 vote, the Senate has "turned back a challenge to the Bush administration's strategy on mercury pollution, leaving intact federal rules that give power plants flexibility in how they reduce emissions of the dangerous toxin." Senators "defeated a resolution to void Environmental Protection Agency rules finalized last March. The Democrats and nine Republicans who supported the repeal contended the EPA approach was too slow and too weak in dealing with a pollutant that can cause serious neurological damage to newborn and young children. The White House insisted that its market-based approach to curtailing mercury pollution is effective and founded on sound science, and warned that the president would veto any legislation that overturned the EPA rules."

USA Today (9/14) reports, "Sen. Jim Jeffords, I-Vt., said the rules violate the Clean Air Act and are unwise. 'It is definitely unhealthy for Americans living downwind of coal-fired power plants, especially mothers and their soon-to-be-born children,' he said."

The New York Times (9/14, Janofsky) adds, "The resolution was brought up for a vote through a rarely used and rarely successful procedure, the Congressional Review Act. It allows lawmakers to challenge regulatory decisions. Even if the Senate had passed the resolution, it had little chance to go further. Such challenges require approval of the House, which was unlikely to act, as well as the president's signature. On Monday, the Office of Management and Budget said President Bush's senior advisers would recommend that he veto the effort."

Northeast Nuke Plants Could Impact Greenhouse Gas Pact. The New York Times (9/14, Wald) reports, "A proposed agreement among nine Northeast states to cap greenhouse gas emissions from power plants casts a new light on arguments in New Jersey and Vermont about whether the licenses of two aging nuclear plants should be extended. Community groups in both states are opposing the extensions of the licenses beyond their 40-year terms, but environmentalists are generally supportive of the proposed agreement among the governors to reduce these greenhouse gases, which contribute to global climate change. Shutting down the two reactors would mean immediate, substantial increases in the emissions, because it would increase reliance on fossil fuel plants, probably tripling emissions in Vermont and doubling them in New Jersey."

Senator Shows Concern Over Rising Heating Costs. The Hill (9/14) reports, "Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.), chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee's Energy Subcommittee, yesterday asked the administration to estimate home heating prices this winter in light of the damage done by Hurricane Katrina" and "asked Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman yesterday to estimate how much Congress should provide in so-called weatherization assistance to help low-income families deal with higher prices." Energy experts told the Energy and Natural Resources Committee "that home-heating prices could be 31 percent higher than they were a year ago because of damage done to the Gulf Coast by Katrina."

European Court Rules EU Can Prosecute Polluters. The AP (9/14, Wielaard) reports, "European governments can bring criminal prosecutions against any company that violates the European Union's environmental legislation, the bloc's high court ruled on Tuesday." The AP continues, "The ruling boosts the powers of the European Commission, the executive body that drafts EU legislation which the bloc's 25 member states must incorporate into domestic law." The AP adds, "The Commission filed a lawsuit against all EU governments in 2001 for failing to include a reference to criminal prosecution of industrial violators in an anti-pollution bill it had drafted. ... The governments, keen not to be seen to be yielding more powers to the EU, argued that criminal prosecutions shouuld be left to national authorities. ... But the court said the Commission was entitled to ensure the laws it drafts are as effective as possible. ... It said the fight against pollution was a cross-border issue and 'one of the essential objectives' of the EU."

WSJournal Says CAFE Standards Pose Safety Risk. The Wall Street Journal (9/14) opposes Corporate Average Fuel Economy (CAFE) standards imposed on automakers that would raise the standard to 40 mpg by 2010 from 27.5 mpg today. While this measure would save gas, it also trades "blood for oil" because the primary way automakers meet the standards is to reduce the weight of their cars, and "research has consistently confirmed that the lighter the vehicle the more dangerous it is in a crash because there is less survival space and less physical structure to absorb impact."

LATimes Argues Against Power Grid Overhaul. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/14) says that Monday afternoon's blackout in Los Angeles "reminded Angelenos that their seemingly sturdy, self-contained municipal power system can still be brought to its knees in seconds by a single human error. That's not a comforting thought in the post-9/11 era, when we have to worry about misdeeds as well as mishaps." The Times notes that by Tuesday, Ron Deaton, the California Department of Water and Power chief, "was already promising the City Council that he would hire independent engineers to design a new system that would do a better job of isolating problems, rather than triggering broad shutdowns," but "such an overhaul won't be cheap. What's more, it would be prohibitively expensive to build an electrical grid with so many backups and safeguards that it would resist any and all human errors."

FBI Probes SC Firms' Ties To Tribe. The (SC) State (9/14, LeBlanc) reports, "The Justice Department is investigating allegations of election fraud involving federal campaign contributions raised through organizations tied to the Catawba Indian Nation." The State continues, "The FBI last month searched the offices of three Columbia companies, one of which is owned primarily by the York County tribe, according to investigative documents obtained by The State newspaper. ... The inquiry is being run out of Washington and the Justice Department's Public Integrity section, court records show." The State adds, "The Aug. 31 raid of New River Management & Development, SPM (formerly South Property Management) and Kapp Investment Management yielded 24 boxes of financial records, evidence of political contributions, computers, and business and tax documents, according to an inventory of the seized items. ... In seeking the search warrant, FBI agent Amylynn Miller told a federal magistrate judge the government believes evidence was being concealed in the offices. ... Jay Bender, a longtime attorney for the Catawbas, said Tuesday the tribe is not a target of the probe."

DEA Says Cheaper Heroin Coming To Boston Via Cocaine Trafficking Routes. The Boston Herald (9/14, Crimaldi, Johnson) reports that a

"cheaper, purer heroin," once "shuttled into New England from Burma," is now coming to the Boston area "via established cocaine trafficking routes, drug enforcement agents say. 'They had routes they used for cocaine and just like any other organization, if it was successful, why not use it for another drug,' said Tony Pettigrew, a spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration's New England Field Division. While drug enforcement agents say there is no single heroin trafficking route, smack typically makes its way to Massachusetts through Florida and then New York City." According to state police Lt. Dennis Brooks, the "number of Massachusetts residents being treated for heroin addiction has climbed from 44,000 to 56,000 in recent years, he said, attributing the spike to the OxyContin craze, which is addicting people to opiates at a younger age. Heroin hits the street in a rock form that is broken down into a powder and sold for as little as $4 to $6 per bag. The DEA classifies heroin into four categories depending on where it comes from: South American, Mexican, Southeast Asian and Southwest Asian."

Ninth Circuit Court Of Appeals Cancels Oral Arguments In Medical Marijuana Case. Oregon Public Broadcasting (9/13, Fogarty) reports, "The Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals cancelled oral arguments Tuesday in an Oregon medical marijuana case. The lawsuit was filed by LeRoy Stubblefield of Sweet Home. In 2002, federal drug agents seized marijuana plants that he was growing under Oregon's 1998 medical marijuana law. In a separate case, the US Supreme Court in June sided with the federal government's efforts to crack down on medical marijuana in California." Paul Stanford of theHemp and Cannabis Foundation "says the California decision may be why the appeals court cancelled oral arguments in the Oregon case." In the California case, the "U.S. Supreme Court said the Drug Enforcement Agency has the authority to prosecute marijuana users under federal law, even if states allow the use of pot to treat medical ailments."

The California Recorder (9/14, Scheck) reports, "It was unclear why there was no drum circle on the third floor of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Tuesday morning. ... The dozen or so people assembled outside Courtroom One were certainly loud enough -- despite repeated exhortations by security guards to keep the noise level down -- and the top thing on their minds was smoking pot. ... And these are people who take their weed seriously: pot lawyers, pot lobbyists, pot activists, pot smokers, a pot reporter and the requisite pot publicists -- a middle-aged assembly that ranged from besuited to bedraggled." The Recorder continues, "As the group waited for a 9th Circuit panel to finish hearing more conventional arguments -- a qui tam case, for example -- they had lots to say about marijuana. ... 'If you smoke pot, you have less of a chance of getting cancer than if you don't,' explained Ed Rosenthal, the focal point of the group." The Recorder adds, "Rosenthal is a pot celebrity, as well as an author and publisher of pot books. ('"The Big Book of Buds," volume one and volume two, are probably our best-sellers,' said the primly suited Jane Klein, Rosenthal's business partner and wife. 'They treat marijuana like you would roses,' she said, referring to pictures and descriptions of growing conditions.)" The Recorder notes, "In 2003, Rosenthal's celebrity moved beyond the pot community when he was convicted in San Francisco federal court of growing marijuana, despite the fact that the city of Oakland had licensed him to do so. ... Rosenthal appealed that verdict -- even though U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer sentenced him to just one day in jail -- because Breyer refused to let the jury hear that the pot was grown for locally sanctioned medicinal use. ... After the arguments, which ran nearly a half-hour longer than scheduled, the judges didn't seem swayed by either side. The same could not be said for the pro-pot contingent, which stood outside the courtroom expounding on the need to legalize marijuana -- though that was not the issue before the 9th Circuit."

FBI Nabs Eight In New York, New Jersey On Drug Conspiracy Charges. Long Island Newsday (9/14) reports, "FBI agents arrested eight men in New York and New Jersey on Tuesday on racketeering, money laundering and other charges stemming from an alleged conspiracy to distribute large quantities of marijuana and cocaine. The eight were named in an indictment returned by a grand jury in Florida that also seeks forfeiture of $75 million in profits from the alleged illegal drug sales, some of which involved truckloads of marijuana shipped from the U.S.-Mexican border to New York, New Jersey, Florida, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kansas and other states." Among those charged was John Leto, "also known as 'Johnny Balls' and allegedly a member of an organized crime family in New Jersey. Leto, 39, allegedly used his connections as a 'La Cosa Nostra associate' and his construction business to protect the marijuana business and help distribute the drugs, according to the indictment."

Alleged Gang Members May Face Death Penalty For Murder, Drug Charges. The Valencia County (CA) News-Bulletin (9/14, Sandlin) reports that a California grand jury "is scheduled to take up potential death penalty charges against three alleged members of a Valencia County drug gang this month. The target notice sent to the three men shifts the focus away from a pending drug prosecution in U.S. District Court." Ben Gallegos, Frankie Gallegos, and Juan Calles, "alleged members of the East Side Locos, are being investigated for seven slayings, including shootings and strangulations. Investigators believe the shootings are either gang- or drug-related. ... The three men, along with eight others, were indicted by a federal grand jury in March for methamphetamine distribution. The indictment also seeks forfeiture of $63,900 in cash seized during a series of raids March 10. A superseding indictment was handed up in July charging Ben Gallegos with operating a continuing criminal enterprise, conspiracy and distribution of methamphetamine. Attorneys for the three in the federal case want to postpone pretrial matters because of the potential death penalty charges in state court."

Mississippi Teen Goes On Trial For Trying To Sell Bomb. The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (9/14, Gates) reports, "A Brandon (MS) teenager built a bomb designed to kill and injure, a prosecutor told a federal jury Monday." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "James Rankin, 19, of 3175 U.S. 80 East is charged with possession of an unregistered firearm, transfer of an unregistered firearm and the manufacture of an unregistered firearm. ... If convicted, Rankin faces up to 30 years in prison. The case continues today in U.S. District Court in Jackson. ... 'The defendant made a bomb, not a firework,' U.S. Assistant Attorney David Fulcher said in his opening statement. 'It's simple. The defendant made a bomb that was designed to kill and with the intent for it to kill.'" The Clarion-Ledger adds, "Rankin's attorney, U.S. Public Defender Dennis Joiner, told the jury he would delay his opening statement until after the prosecution concludes its case. ... Rankin was arrested Nov. 9, 2004, after he allegedly tried to sell a bomb to an undercover agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. ... 'He asked if I wanted a large pipe bomb, a small pipe bomb or a hand-held grenade,' ATF special agent Connie Wilson testified. ... Wilson said she posed as someone wanting to harm an ex-husband in Texas after a confidential informant told her Rankin could make a bomb."

Former Deputy US Marshal Sentenced To 15 Years For Maryland Killing. The Washington Post (9/14, B3, Kunkle) reports, "A former deputy U.S. marshal who killed a young Navy seaman in a road rage incident last year at a Rockville shopping plaza was sentenced yesterday to 15 years in prison." The Post continues, "Arthur L. Lloyd, 54, who was convicted in June of voluntary manslaughter in the Oct. 29 shooting of Ryan T. Stowers, probably will serve about 11 years before he is eligible for parole, prosecutors said." The Post adds, "Calling the shooting 'an enormous tragedy' for both families, Montgomery County Circuit Court Judge Ann S. Harrington tailored a sentence that satisfied neither side completely. She went beyond state guidelines calling for a five- to 10-year sentence, but she declined to impose the maximum 35-year term requested by prosecutors."

The AP (9/13, Adelman) reports, "During their testimony, members of Lloyd's family portrayed the 54-year-old as a peaceful man distraught over his actions in the Oct. 28 shooting and asked the judge to be lenient. ... Lloyd's family members were followed by those of (Stowers, who) offered teary testimony and asked for the judge to issue the harshest punishment she could. ... When Lloyd was offered the chance to speak on his own behalf, he sought to explain his actions in the Rockville shopping center parking lot. He said law enforcement officers like him are skittish since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and that he was incensed by a barrage of profanities and racial epithets that Stowers subjected him to. He also said he feared that Stowers might be someone he helped put in jail as a marshal, who was now seeking revenge."

USMS Gives $10,000 To Kentucky Cabbie Who Turned In Fugitives. The AP (9/14) reports from Covington, KY, "Cab driver Mike Wagers, credited with the tip that led to the capture of two Tennessee fugitives wanted in the killing of a corrections officer, was rewarded Tuesday with $10,000." The AP continues, "John Clark, acting director of the U.S. Marshals Service, presented the check for information leading to the arrest of George and Jennifer Hyatte, charging in the fatal shooting of a guard during George Hyatte's escape outside a courthouse in Kingston, Tenn. ... 'I'm just overwhelmed,' said Wagers, 33, who said he plans to split the money with a friend whose wife recently died, and will take a vacation."

The Cincinnati Enquirer (9/14, Hannah) reports,

DOJ_NMG_0142209

"Wagers gave authorities a tip that helped lead to the Aug. 10 capture of George 'Shorty' Hyatte and his wife Jennifer Hyatte. ... The couple went on the run after George Hyatte made a daring Aug. 9 jail escape from Tennessee. He was being taken back to jail after a court hearing when his wife allegedly shot and killed corrections officer Wayne Morgan. During the shootout, Jennifer Hyatte received a bullet wound in the leg but was able to escape with her husband. The couple made their way north to Erlanger, where they stayed overnight at an EconoLodge and then hailed Wagers' cab to Columbus the following morning." The Enquirer adds, "Wagers called authorities after realizing the fugitives' description matched his two passengers. His tip led police to the hotel room in Columbus where the couple was staying. ... The couple had told Wagers that they were Amway salespeople who needed to get to Columbus for a convention. Wagers said he never suspected the two were fugitives, but he became suspicious of their Amway claim when they didn't try to sell him anything."

Immigration:

Lawmakers Seek To Avoid "Amnesty" Label On Immigration Plans. The Washington Times (9/14, Dinan) reports, "As the immigration debate warms up over the next few months, President Bush and congressional lawmakers will try to prevent their legislation from being tagged with the 'amnesty' label. ... The president demonstrated the power of the word during last year's campaign when he leveled the charge against his Democratic challenger, Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts: 'Here is where my opponent and I differ. In September 2003, he supported amnesty for illegal aliens.' Some Republicans, however, say the president's guest-worker plan is an amnesty that he doesn't want to call an amnesty."

Tax:

Jury Selection Delayed In Nevada Trial Of Anti-Tax Advocate. The Las Vegas Sun (9/14, Kihara) reports, "Jury selection in the tax fraud case of anti-tax advocate Irwin Schiff was stalled Monday after potential jurors who were waiting outside the courtroom said a man tried to talk to them about the case." The Sun continues, "A potential juror told U.S. District Judge Kent Dawson that John Anthony Malan told prospective jurors outside an elevator on the sixth floor of the George Federal Building to 'just remember to listen to the facts' and not to listen to opinions. At least seven more potential jurors also heard comments from Malan and were called into a private sidebar individually with the attorneys from both sides and Dawson." The Sun adds, "The interruption came during jury selection in the criminal case against Schiff, a local author and businessman, and two other defendants, Cynthia Neun and Lawrence Cohen. ... All three were indicted in federal court in March of attempting to evade paying taxes, aiding and assisting in filing false tax returns and conspiring to defraud the government, among other charges. ... The outspoken Schiff is defending himself while Neun and Cohen have attorneys." The Sun notes, "Malan was brought before the judge and initially denied speaking to the jurors. ... After Dawson further inquired as to whether Malan attempted to communicate with prospective jurors about the case and asked if he was attempting to influence the potential jurors, Malan replied, 'I object to this entire proceeding.' ... Dawson, after calling for a hearing for Malan on Wednesday, ordered U.S. marshals to eject Malan from the federal courthouse."

Congress-Administration:

Roberts Remains Unruffled By Tough Questions During Questioning By Senate Panel. Judge John Roberts faced questions from the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday in a performance lauded by most observers as polished and temperate. While he was quizzed on a number of issues, abortion and the precedential value of Roe Vs. Wade were the topics that drew most media attention. Most observers agreed Roberts acquitted himself favorably in the hearing.

ABC World News Tonight (9/13, story 6, 3:50, Douglass) reported Roberts "was cool and polished." Roberts "paid tribute to the principle of stare decisis, not overturning previous Supreme Court decisions. And he agreed there is a right to privacy." But he "would not say if Roe versus Wade is protected by the right to privacy. And he refused to answer questions about his views on abortion and on most subjects, insisting they might come before the court someday." Democrats "hammered him about things he wrote as a young government lawyer 25 years ago, when the Reagan Administration fought against expanding civil rights laws."

The CBS Evening News (9/13, story 6, 2:35, Borger) reported, "The first flash point, abortion rights -- the key question: Is the precedent of 'Roe v. Wade' so strong that Roberts would not vote to overturn it?" Judge Roberts: "I do think that it is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent." The "only woman on the panel grilled Roberts on his old legal memos which appeared to disparage women, and their complaints about unequal pay." Judge Roberts: "I have always supported and support today equal rights for women."

NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 5, 2:20, P. Williams) reported, "Democrats asked if the war on terror allows the government to cut back on freedoms at home." Sen. Patrick Leahy (D) Vermont: "Do you feel that you'd be able to interpret the Bill of Rights the same, whether we're at wartime or not?" Judge Roberts: "I do, Senator. And the obligation of the court to protect those basic liberties, in times of peace and in times of war, in times of stress and in times of calm, that doesn't change." Williams: "As for controversial memos that Roberts wrote as a lawyer in the Reagan Administration, including one referring to what he called the 'purported 'gender gap', Roberts said he never meant to suggest that women deserve less legal protection."

The New York Times (9/14, Stolberg, Liptak) reports that in "a day punctuated by flashes of hostility and humor, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. on Tuesday acknowledged a constitutional right to privacy and said overturning precedent was a 'jolt to the legal system.'" But he "artfully sidestepped the contentious question that has dogged him as a Supreme Court nominee, whether he opposes Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision that established a constitutional right to abortion." Democrats "kept a tally of the number of questions they said Judge Roberts refused to answer, putting the number at 60." Judge Roberts "told the senators that he did not have a specific legal philosophy, and he resisted comparisons to William H. Rehnquist, the late chief justice for whom he once clerked, telling senators that he would be 'my own man.'" He also "flatly rejected the idea that his Roman Catholic religion played a role in his court decisions, saying: 'I look to the law books and always have. I don't look to the Bible or any other religious source.'"

The Washington Post (9/14, A1, Goldstein, Babington) reports in a front page story that "testified yesterday that he believes that the Constitution protects the right to privacy, the legal underpinning of the nation's landmark abortion law, but he refused to say whether he would vote to uphold Roe v. Wade if he is confirmed as chief justice of the United States." In a "day of sometimes testy exchanges with senators, Roberts distanced himself repeatedly from his conservative writings as a young legal adviser to President Ronald Reagan, including a memo in which he had disparaged privacy as 'amorphous' and a 'so-called right' not spelled out in the Constitution." Democrats "pressed him aggressively, seeking to elicit his views on abortion and a range of other volatile civil rights issues by reminding him of stances he had advocated in the past. But time and again throughout the first full day of questioning at his Senate confirmation hearing, Roberts refused to divulge the way he would rule on matters of voting rights, gender equity, fair housing and the role of religion in public life." Democrats "suggested that Roberts might be a stealth nominee who would shift the court more sharply rightward than his careful testimony suggests."

The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Reynolds, Schmitt) reports Roberts "indicated Tuesday that it would be hard for the Supreme Court to overturn the Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion, but he refused to say whether he would support efforts to do so." Roe and "the legal arguments behind it -- especially privacy rights and the rule of precedent -- came to the fore repeatedly during more than 10 hours of questioning." Democrats "used the opportunity to inquire into the nominee's views on issues central to their party's legacy over the last half-century -- abortion rights, civil rights and environmental regulation, among others." Roberts "kept his voice measured, his face placid and his manner deferential. A more deeply furrowed brow was his only sign of discomfort." As the "day wore on, Democrats at times seemed disarmed by the nominee's genial and sometimes self-effacing testimony," but they "also expressed frustration at what they viewed as his lack of responsiveness. Aides to committee Democrats said they counted 21 occasions in which Roberts declined to answer questions, including his views of cases that already had been decided."

USA Today (9/14, Kiely, Biskupic) reports the hearing was "sometimes testy" and was "marked by tart exchanges with Democrats," and that Roberts "would not say Tuesday if he'd vote to overturn the 1973 ruling that legalized abortion nationwide." But Roberts "did say he believes there is a constitutional right to privacy, and he said the Roe v. Wade ruling is 'settled as precedent' that must be viewed with respect by judges." Sen. Lindsey Graham "said the nomination may mark the end of an era in which most Supreme Court nominees won strong bipartisan approval. He noted that liberal Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg was confirmed in 1993 with 96 of the 100 votes in the Senate. Graham said Republicans, who hold 55 Senate seats, will retaliate 'if the Democratic Party votes against him (Roberts) en masse because of his (conservative) philosophy.'"

The AP (9/14, Benac) reports that from "the first question of the day — on abortion — right through the alphabet to the Zimmer case on voting rights, Roberts held his own as senators tried to goad him into revealing more of his thoughts than he wanted on the controversial issues of the day. The artful dodger employed a mix of humor, history and humility as he found 50 ways to defend his views and politely demur when he didn't want to discuss them." When Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., "complained that Roberts was filibustering, the judge lightly scolded, 'That's a bad word, senator.'"

The Washington Times (9/14, Dinan) reports Republicans and conservatives "said John G. Roberts Jr. acquitted himself perfectly," but "Democrats and liberal activists said he ducked questions and probably lost support for his nomination to be chief justice of the United States." Conservatives "from Leonard Leo, the executive vice president on leave from the Federalist Society, to the Family Research Council and Concerned Women for America said Judge Roberts expertly handled questions on abortion, in particular. But Democratic senators said he was being evasive." Ralph G. Neas, president of People for the American Way, said, "Yesterday he spoke about baseball and today he played dodgeball all day. He gave the illusion of candor and the appearance of openness, but he spent the entire day responding to direct questions with evasive answers."

The Hill (9/14, Allen) reports, "Despite a few testy early exchanges with Democratic Sens. Edward Kennedy (Mass.) and Joseph Biden (Del.) over his views on voting rights and sex discrimination, Roberts demonstrated a level of composure rare among high-profile nominees facing adversarial senators." In contrast to "some past nomination proceedings, senators limited themselves mostly to questions about jurisprudence, rather than Roberts's character or personal qualifications — perhaps yet another indication that Democrats do not intend to use all means necessary to defeat his nomination."

The Legal Times (9/14, Goldman, Mauro) reports, "Again and again, Roberts returned to familiar themes throughout the full day of hearings: that courts should judge, not legislate; that the right to be left alone is a fundamental American right, even though it is not specifically mentioned in the Constitution; that he would not answer specifics about any particular cases; and that his religious beliefs would not play any role in his decision-making. … 'I do know this, that my faith and religious beliefs don't play a role in my judging,' Roberts said in response to questions from Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., about his impartiality. 'When it comes to judging, I look to the law ... I don't look to the Bible.' … Roberts also sidestepped a question from Feinstein about whether the federal courts should become involved in end-of-life decisions. His response: 'An abstract opinion [on that subject] that would pre-judge that case is inappropriate.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (9/13, Johns) reported that the hearings have gone "just about the way you would expect. John Roberts in the hot seat taking questions from Democrats and Republicans. Quite predictably he has said that he supports the notion of stare decisions, or that is settled precedence in the law. He's also said, importantly, to some folks that he does believe there is a constitutionally protected right to privacy. Of course, that's come up again and again here on Capitol Hill, in part, because, back in 1981, he wrote a memo while working over at the White House, questioning the right to privacy, some said. He's, clearly, in his view there is. … And one of the key questions, of course, has been whether the right to privacy means there's a right necessarily to an abortion. Of course, people taking different views."

Fox News' Special Report (9/13, Hume) reported that Roberts "remained calm and cordial throughout a day of tough questions as members of the Senate Judiciary Committee tried to pin him down on matters that could come before the court that he could lead." Fox (Angle) added, "Roberts managed to get out of political quick sand of abortion without committing one way or the other. On that and other issues, he may not have won over senator Kennedy and other critics, but he wasn't likely to get their votes anyway."

Jeff Greenfield said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/13), "There's been some concern from folks on the conservative side of things that some of Roberts' critics or questioners might probe too deeply into this question of Catholic faith, and I think Roberts -- not only did Roberts answer that quickly and effectively, but he raised that where Dianne Feinstein didn't."

Abortion A Constant Subtext Of Hearing. A number of print stories focused specifically on Judge Roberts' responses to questions about Roe Vs. Wade and abortion. But there was no consensus on where, at the end of the day, Judge Roberts' ultimately stood on the question, with different outlets emphasizing different interpretations of his remarks, which raised concerns among conservatives as well as pro-choice advocates.

The New York Times (9/14, Toner) reports that on no issue were Roberts' "words framed more carefully - or listened to more closely - than on the subject of abortion." Roberts "paid full tribute to the weight of 32 years of precedent behind Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision establishing abortion rights." But he "stopped short, again and again, of endorsing Roe itself." Abortion rights advocates, "who were overwhelmingly opposed to the Roberts nomination before the hearing began, said his testimony Tuesday affirmed their fears." Abortion opponents "and social conservatives were praising Judge Roberts's testimony as appropriate and - by implication - politically acceptable." The AP (9/14, Espo) reports Roberts "repeatedly refused to answer questions about abortion and other contentious issues at his confirmation hearing Tuesday, telling frustrated Democrats he would not discuss matters that could come before the Supreme Court."

The San Jose Mercury News (9/14) ran a Chicago Tribune story by Jill Zuckman, who reports, "More than civil rights, more than property rights, more than environmental rights, the issue of abortion has insinuated itself into every aspect of the Supreme Court confirmation process. And Tuesday, it seemed to be frustrating nearly everyone." Not surprisingly, Roberts' answers "did not entirely satisfy advocates on either side." His "answers to questions about Roe v. Wade gave no comfort to liberals, who wanted - though they could hardly have expected - an explicit promise of support for high court ruling that legalized abortion nationwide. But neither did it give comfort to social conservatives who hoped Roberts would vote to overturn the decision."

The Washington Post (9/14, Becker) reports that "nearly a quarter of a century ago," Judge Roberts "wrote skeptically about the legal concept that underpins a woman's right to an abortion, calling it 'the so-called right to privacy.' Yesterday, when pressed by a Republican senator about his writing, the Supreme Court nominee said he believes that the Constitution contains such a right, but he refused to say whether it covers the termination of a pregnancy." Kate Michelman, former president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, said, "We still do not have clarity on his views."

But the Washington Times (9/14, Hurt) reported the story under the headline, "Roberts Defends Roe As 'A Precedent.'" Knight Ridder (9/14, Henderson, Kuhnhenn) headlined its story, "Abortion A `settled Precedent,' Roberts Says." Knight Ridder reports Roberts "gave strong indications Tuesday that he'd be reluctant to overturn court precedents such as Roe v. Wade, and he voiced support for a right to privacy - which underpins court rulings on gay rights and other individual liberties - that's much broader than his previously known stance."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Cummings, Bravin) reports Roberts "raised concerns among conservatives by telling senators that he recognized a constitutional right to privacy, and backed the 1965 Supreme Court opinion that was later invoked to justify abortion rights -- a central battleground in the current ideological debate over the direction of the judiciary." But Roberts "left open the fate of the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision on abortion rights -- often linked to the privacy case -- which he suggested rested on different reasoning." Judge Roberts's "embrace of the privacy right underlying Roe rejected the arguments of some prominent conservative legal scholars, and unsettled some religious activists who have made overturning the landmark abortion ruling a centerpiece of their political agenda."

The AP (9/14, Werner) reports Sen. Dianne Feinstein "said she was disappointed John Roberts wasn't more forthcoming in discussing abortion, women's rights and other issues during the first day of questioning Tuesday in his Supreme Court nomination hearings." Sen. Feinstein said, "I actually felt he made up his mind not to answer my questions, knowing what I might ask. What I was trying to do today is to get a sense of who Judge Roberts is. I'm disappointed that Judge Roberts was not more forthcoming."

The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Savage) reports that since Judge Robert Bork, "Republican nominees have responded to the senators' questions without directly answering whether they would uphold or reverse Roe vs. Wade. On Tuesday, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. followed that script, assuring pro-choice senators that the court's precedents were the building blocks of the law and should not be knocked down without good reason. It is a jolt to the legal system to overturn a precedent, he said."

Roberts Remains Enigmatic. The Washington Post (9/14, A1, Milbank) reports in a front page story that Judge Roberts, "star litigator, adviser to presidents and top-flight jurist, showed that he could be something else: the very model of an enigmatic nominee. The Roberts who answered questions for eight hours yesterday was very much the Roberts who emerged in his writings released over the summer. He maddened the committee's Democrats, delighted its Republicans and charmed most of both." Roberts was "sharptongued," was "quick on his feet," and "showed flashes of wit. Asked about an old memo he wrote supporting judicial term limits, he admitted: 'You know, that would be one of those memos that I no longer agree with, senator. I didn't fully appreciate what was involved in the confirmation process when I wrote that.'" What Roberts "did best -- or, at least, most -- was deflect questions on charged issues." The "most inflammatory subject -- abortion -- was essentially off-limits."

The New York Times (9/14, Purdum) reports Roberts' "face never scowled. His level tone seldom varied. He answered questions he found useful to his cause and avoided those he did not. Above all, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. explained his views and defended his honor with the force and fluidity of an advocate who has argued often before tougher judges than those he faced on the Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday." In short, Roberts "was Delphic, and his supporters and critics each ended the day saying his performance had hardened their enthusiasm or their doubts."

The New York Times (9/14, Greenhouse) reports Judge Roberts "invoked the memory of a man who more than 60 years ago made a similar journey between two branches of government and who shed some of his earlier views in the process." Robert H. Jackson was attorney general "when President Franklin D. Roosevelt named him to the Supreme Court in 1941. As Judge Roberts pointed out in a colloquy with Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the committee's senior Democrat, Justice Jackson then changed from 'someone whose job it was to promote and defend an expansive view of executive powers' to someone who 'took an entirely different view of a lot of issues,' including the scope of presidential power." The nominee's "message was oblique, but clear: Do not judge me by the hundreds of memorandums I wrote as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration."

Roberts Willing To Discuss Some Past Supreme Court Rulings. The New York Times (9/14, Liptak) reports that during the first day of questioning in his confirmation hearings yesterday, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. "was generally careful not to comment on the correctness of specific Supreme Court cases," but "not always. Judge Roberts was willing to discuss decisions concerning school desegregation, the privacy of the marital relationship, the internment of Japanese-Americans and the limits of presidential power. His willingness to comment on cases seemed to increase in direct proportion to his assessment of the extent to which they have become fundamental to an understanding of American constitutional law."

The Washington Times (9/14, Lakely) says Roberts "rebuked a recent high-court decision that relied on foreign law, calling it a 'misuse of precedent' that substitutes a judge's 'personal preferences' for the Constitution. Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, asked Judge Roberts what, 'if anything, is the proper role of foreign law in U.S. Supreme Court decisions?' The question was a reference to the Roper v. Simmons decision by the Supreme Court in March, in which the majority cited foreign law to overturn a death-penalty sentence for a 17-year-old murderer. That 5-4 decision is cited by conservative legal scholars as one reason it is important for President Bush to appoint a reliable conservative to the Supreme Court. ... Judge Roberts maintained that he didn't want to comment on any particular case decided by the court. 'I would say, as a general matter, that there are a couple of things that cause concern on my part about the use of foreign law as precedent,' said Judge Roberts, beginning his critique by noting that while U.S. judges are not held directly accountable by the people, the politicians who appoint them are."

Specter Probes Roberts On Stare Decisis. The Washington Times (9/14, Taylor) reports that Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter was quick to probe Roberts' view on "'stare decisis,' the Latin phrase meaning to let stand what has already been decided." Specifically, "Specter asked how stare decisis applies to Roe v. Wade, which legalized abortion in 1973, and a subsequent case which upheld it in 1992. Judge Roberts said he wished not to discuss abortion since it is likely to come before the Supreme Court again, but asserted that past rulings may indeed warrant reconsideration under special circumstances."

Roberts Downplays Pro-Bono Work For Gay Rights Group. The Washington Times (9/14, Hurt) says Roberts "downplayed his pro-bono legal work to help a homosexual rights group win one of the most significant Supreme Court cases regarding such rights. 'I was asked frequently by other partners to help out, particularly in my area of expertise,' he told Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican. 'And I never turned down a request.'" The Times adds, "While Judge Roberts did not write briefs or become deeply involved in preparing the case, he did review files and help prepare oral arguments for Lambda Legal without charge. He also played the role of conservative Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia in the mock trial."

Liberal Groups Seeking To Flip Liberal Republicans. The Hill (9/14, Bolton) reports liberal interest groups "are focusing on flipping three centrist Republican senators from the Northeast as the key to their strategy at least to tarnish the confirmation of Supreme Court nominee John Roberts." Many Democratic Senate aides, strategists and journalists "believe that Roberts's confirmation is a foregone conclusion. But liberal activists such as Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, insist the battle is not over and the committee and floor votes will be close." Liberal leaders "are frustrated that the press has in some cases already called the fight a win for Republicans." Liberal strategists say "that if they can turn a Republican against Roberts it would embolden Democrats to follow suit. Accordingly, they are focusing their lobbying efforts on Sens. Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island."

Blackmun Had Intended Roe To Be Narrow Reform Of Abortion Laws. The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Savage) reports that on "the fifth anniversary of" Justice Blackmun's "death, the Library of Congress opened his papers to the public. His thick files on the abortion cases tell the little-known story of how Roe vs. Wade came to be. It is the story of a rookie justice, unsure of himself and his abilities, who set out to write a narrow ruling that would reform abortion laws, not repeal them."

Specter's Independence Noted. NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 6, 4:00, Williams) profiled Sen. Arlen Specter, who "has been unafraid to act independently. It is a virtue he believes will serve him well throughout these hearings." That independence "got him into deep trouble in his own party when he said publicly that he doubted the Senate would confirm a nominee who would overturn Roe v. Wade."

Other Commentary. In a Washington Post news analysis (9/14, A9), Charles Lane says Roberts "appeared to sound a less conservative note on abortion-related issues than he had in the memos and briefs he wrote as a lawyer in the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations. He offered a surprisingly emphatic endorsement of a constitutional right to privacy -- the basis of the Roe v. Wade decision recognizing a right to abortion, which he seemed to disparage as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration. And, as if repeating a carefully formulated phrase, he referred time and again to a 1992 Supreme Court ruling upholding Roe as "a precedent entitled to respect.'" Yet, "ever the careful lawyer, Roberts committed himself to nothing more tangible than a promise to think hard before voting either to uphold or overturn the abortion precedents about which so much controversy revolves." The "overall impression was of a talented nominee who used his skills to avoid twin perils: revealing nothing of his views or revealing too much."

On the CBS Evening News (9/13, story 7, 1:30, Schieffer), Chicago Tribune reporter Jan Crawford Greenburg said Roberts said Roe "was settled law, subject to the legal principle that allows courts to rethink their decisions if there are compelling reasons to do so. He did not say he would not overturn Roe, despite question after question from senator after senator, trying to pin him down on those views." Today, "very much what we saw was the John Roberts that we've seen much of the summer, the John Roberts that the justices have seen when he argued before them before the Supreme Court. He's a man who is prepared, we saw his humor, we didn't really see him go off his points that he's made before."

On the CBS Evening News (9/13, story 7, 1:30, Schieffer), Gloria Borger said, "Privately, the Democrats I speak with are telling me we understand that John Roberts is going to get confirmed, and lots of them are starting now to focus on just who the second nominee for the Supreme Court is going to be. There's lots of thought that that nominee could be more conservative and more controversial and they ought to start thinking about that one."

In a USA Today news analysis (9/14), Joan Biskupic and Toni Locy say, "Roberts was a deft witness Tuesday, showing himself to be a smart, articulate, by-the-book jurist while offering only minimal answers to senators' questions." When Democrats "tried to put him on the defensive about his past positions as a Reagan administration lawyer or his current reluctance to explain his views, the conservative federal judge countered their assertions without losing his cool. It was senators such as Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Joseph Biden, D-Del., who became visibly frustrated."

In his Los Angeles Times column, (9/14), Ron Brownstein says Roberts "exuded the quiet confidence of a man who knew that he was ahead in the game during a lengthy but mostly sedate confirmation hearing Tuesday. He left the long first day of questioning before the Senate Judiciary Committee the same way he entered it: a clear favorite for confirmation as the youngest Supreme Court Chief Justice in two centuries. By firmly refusing to answer questions on specific cases he might face on the bench — including the 1973 Supreme Court decision guaranteeing the right to abortion — Roberts may have provided Democrats already inclined to reject him more grounds to do so. But most analysts agree that he said little likely to enlarge the circle of senators opposed to him."

The AP (9/14, Fournier) reports Roberts "cast himself Tuesday as a humble, fair-minded jurist with views just nimble enough to please anybody - from the abortion-rights 'soccer Mom' to the staunchest red-state conservative. But there should be no mistake about his ideology. Roberts is deeply conservative. Period."

USA Today (9/14) sys in an editorial, "John Roberts more than lived up to his billing Tuesday as a knowledgeable, superbly prepared, genial and highly articulate legal mind — and as a nominee determined not to answer any question that could cause him trouble. But all-day testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee nevertheless offered some new impressions of the prospective chief justice." The first is "that he is more likely to be a cautious, establishment jurist than a firebrand in the mold of Antonin Scalia or Clarence Thomas — or at least that is the impression he sought to convey. Most notably, Roberts distanced himself from some of his most troubling past writings, attributing them to youth (many were written when he was in his 20s), the need to reflect the views of his employer (the Reagan administration) or to misinterpretation (a comment about not wanting homemakers to become attorneys was just a lawyer joke)."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/14) discusses the first day of John Roberts' judicial confirmation hearings. The Times says that Roberts' reaffirmation of "his commitment to the principle of stare decisis, which Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) helpfully defined for viewers who didn't go to law school as the importance of adhering to judicial precedents," surely "made opponents of a woman's right to choose an abortion a bit anxious (although its genius was that it was sufficiently opaque to worry supporters of abortion rights, too)."

Bush Accepts Responsibility For Slow Federal Response To Katrina. At a news conference yesterday, President Bush said he, ultimately, was responsible for the Federal government's slow response to the Hurricane Katrina disaster. The move was seen as a significant concession by the White House, which has in the past been reluctant to admit error. The networks featured the President's news conference prominently in their lead stories, but largely neglected the President's meeting with Iraqi President Jalal Talibani.

ABC World News Tonight (9/13, lead story, 2:45, Vargas) reported Bush "for the first time" took "ultimate responsibility for the Federal Government's failures in the wake of Katrina. Mr. Bush also admitted what people all over the country have been saying for the last two weeks -- namely that there are serious problems with the way the government responds to disasters." ABC (Moran) added it was "an extraordinary moment in this Presidency. George W. Bush has never said anything like this before. He's a man who does not like to look back or admit mistakes. He did both today." In "what seemed to be a difficult moment for him," Bush "acknowledged his Administration's failures and accepted a share of the blame." President Bush: "Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability at all levels of government. And to the extent that the Federal Government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility." Moran: "And then, when asked directly if given the failures during Katrina, the US government is prepared to respond today to a major terrorist attack or disaster, Mr. Bush could not say yes." The President's "rare expression of contrition comes as his public support is hemorrhaging badly, even among his base. 57% of Americans now disapprove of his performance as President, according to the latest ABC News poll."

NBC Nightly News (9/13, lead story, 3:25, Williams) reported, "Today the President said Federal responsibility is his, and he'll say it again to the nation later this week." NBC (Gregory) added Bush "took the rare step of admitting a mistake, saying the storm exposed serious problems in the government's response capability." Aides said Bush "wanted to clear the air, remind the public he knows the buck stops with him. Mr. Bush also conceded the Katrina response raises grave questions about how the government would respond to another terror strike." White House officials "say the President will once again accept responsibility when he addresses the nation from Louisiana. We are told during that address the President will also update the country on what will be done for all of these victims left homeless by Katrina and over the long term." It was "a huge shift, for an Administration and particularly for a President who is loath to admit mistakes."

The CBS Evening News (9/13, lead story , 1:10, Schieffer) reported, "The death toll in New Orleans rose sharply today, and for the first time President Bush took responsibility for what the Federal Government did wrong." Bush "went on to say it is now in the national interest to find out if we are, quote, capable of dealing with a severe attack or another severe storm."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/13, Dobbs) reported Bush, "facing escalating criticism over the hurricane disaster, today declared he takes full responsibility for the federal government's slow response. President Bush acknowledged the disaster exposed serious problems in the government's response to catastrophes. President Bush's declaration comes one day after he insisted it is too early to assign blame in the disaster." CNN (Bash) added that Bush's comments are "a dramatic change in tone, a contrite president uncharacteristically admitting a major failure. ... The new admission is striking for a president who prides himself on no regrets leadership and even more stunning because of his combative tone when asked a similar question just a day earlier. ... What worries Bush aides is the steady decline of an asset they thought was sealed after 9/11, leadership."

On MSNBC's Hardball (9/13), Chris Matthews called Bush's comments "a dramatic display of accountability so rare in public life."

The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Riccardi, Powers, Meyer) says "Bush spoke plainly when asked whether the government was prepared for another natural disaster or a terrorist attack." He "appeared to try to shift the debate away from finger-pointing to the reconstruction of New Orleans, a formidable task that could repair his frayed image as a leader if it succeeded. Widespread public dismay with federal efforts has translated to Bush's lowest polling numbers in his five years as president."

In a second article the Los Angeles Times (9/14, Gerstenzang, Muskal) says "It was the strongest statement of responsibility from the White House since the hurricane crisis began and initial relief efforts were sharply criticized." And in an article on the latest progress in the region USA Today (9/14) adds, "President Bush shouldered blame for mistakes in the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina."

Nationally, the aftermath of Katrina was once again the subject of widespread local TV coverage. A significant number of stations decided instead to concentrate on President Bush's acceptance of some blame on behalf of the Federal government for its part in what went wrong with Katrina. WBBM-TV Chicago (9/13, 10:01 p.m.) offered up the best example of this when it reported that Bush acknowledged "his Administration and local officials bundled the response to Hurricane Katrina."

Meanwhile, the majority of local TV stations nationwide seemed to focus on the number of lives taken by the hurricane. For example, KCAL-TV Los Angeles (9/13, 9:57 p.m.) reported, "Hurricane Katrina's death toll climbing quickly." KXAS-TV Dallas (9/13, 10:02 p.m.) added that "659 people died in the storms. That's up nearly 150 from yesterday, as recovery workers focus on gathering and counting corpses. Most of those killed were in New Orleans."

Local TV along the Gulf Coast was mixed in its coverage of the recovery from Hurricane Katrina yesterday. Though many stations focused on positive developments in the area, an equal number focused on President Bush's acceptance of responsibility for any failures in the Federal response, or on the rising number of storm-related deaths. For example, WCFT-TV Birmingham (9/13, 5:58 pm) reported, "Signs of recovery are showing up today in New Orleans. The port is open, and for the first time since Katrina, a commercial flight has touched down at the city's airport." WCFT added that "in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans shows signs of returning to normal, but there's still plenty to be done in the Crescent City."

Meanwhile, WBRC-TV Birmingham (9/13, 9:30 pm) reported, "President Bush is taking some of the blame for what some are calling a slow government response, as the number of dead in Louisiana continues to climb." WBRC noted that "state health officials say the number of people who lost their lives in Katrina is now up to 423. That is up from 279 just yesterday." Likewise, WVTM-TV Birmingham (9/13, 5:00 pm) reported, "Facing continued criticism and the lowest approval ratings of his administration, President Bush acknowledged for the first time serious problems in the government's response to Hurricane Katrina. The admission comes one day after the head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency called it quits and the Bush administration tapped David Paulison, head of the US Fire Administration, to serve as interim director. Paulison has three decades of firefighting and emergency management experience.

A number of stations separated their reports, noting both the recovery in the area and the continued political fallout. WTTO-TV Birmingham (9/13, 9:12 pm) reported that "the water is finally subsiding, but what isn't subsiding are the serious political questions that surround the government's obvious slow response to Hurricane Katrina."

Bush To Outline Comprehensive Strategy That Dovetails With Governing Philosophy. Fox News' Special Report (9/13, Goler) reported that Bush "said of the response to Hurricane Katrina at least part of the buck stops here. ... Mr. Bush said there were problems at all levels of government, but not with the rescuers." Aides say "privately by accepting part of the responsibility today, the president will be able to focus Thursday on the way forward instead of what he calls the blame game." CNN's Paula Zahn Now (9/13, Bash) reported that the Bush team is "still searching for the right strategy to erase intense criticism the president did not help Katrina victims fast enough."

The Washington Post (9/14, A1, Vandehei, Weisman) in a front page story reports that with the White House concerned "the federal government's stumbling response…will shadow the balance of Bush's second term" Bush has "dispatched his top strategist, Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, and other aides to assemble ideas from agencies, conservative think tanks, GOP lawmakers and state officials to guide the rebuilding of New Orleans and relocation of flood victims. The idea, aides said, is twofold: provide a quick federal response that comports with Bush's governing philosophy, and prevent Katrina from swamping his second-term ambitions on Social Security, taxes and Middle East democracy-building." In his speech Thursday night Bush "is to outline his vision more comprehensively than he has to date. A top aide said he will stress that New Orleans officials will dictate how the city will be rebuilt, but will also make plain the reconstruction should reflect his vision of government -- including reducing regulatory obstacles and emphasizing entrepreneurship over big government, the aide said. He will discuss plans to provide health care, education, jobs and housing assistance to flood victims, another aide said."

The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Chen) adds Bush's "comments signaled a new White House strategy as Bush and his top aides continued to work to stem the political damage to his leadership after Hurricane Katrina." His "statement contrasted with recent White House comments. For days, he and top aides have denigrated most questions about accountability for the hurricane response as part of a partisan 'blame game.'"

Poll Numbers Suggest Public Trust In Government Rebounding. In contrast to most coverage describing how the Federal government response to Katrina has resulted in low poll ratings for President Bush, the Christian Science Monitor (9/14, Feldmann) reports that "there are inklings that negative reviews of the government response to Katrina have bottomed out and may be on the upswing." For example, the latest Gallup poll "shows that a majority of Americans are feeling better about the role of government in dealing with the hurricane than they did initially. And despite the sense that the president has suffered grave damage to his public image over Katrina, Gallup and other polls show the effect has been minimal." Gallup poll managing editor David Moore in a Sept 13 report said, "Despite initial criticism of the federal government's slow response to Katrina, Bush's overall job approval rating remains essentially where it was at the end of August."

Most Of Bush Agenda Delayed Until 2006. The New York Times (9/14, Bumiller, Stevenson) reports, "A Republican ally of Mr. Bush who has been briefed on the administration's thinking said the White House's hope for the rest of this year was to deal with the hurricane and to win confirmation for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice of the United States and for a second nominee, not yet selected, to the Supreme Court seat being vacated by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Next year, the ally said, Mr. Bush would return to issues like overhauling the tax code and the immigration laws that he had hoped to get a start on this year."

Administration To Continue To Make Changes At FEMA. The Kansas City Star/Knight Ridder (9/14, Borenstein, Bailey, Dodd) reports that as Bush took responsibility "Homeland security officials pledged a house cleaning of political appointees in top jobs who have little experience in disaster management." Knight Ridder adds, "As part of the administration's effort to rebound from the growing criticism, changes at FEMA won't stop with Monday's resignation of beleaguered director Michael Brown." DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said "that he's going to put more emphasis on disaster and management experience in the agency, and will be bringing in a new deputy with more appropriate expertise."

Katrina Response Impact On US Budget Examined. The Christian Science Monitor (9/14, Trumbull) reports, "Think of it as the financial equivalent of another Iraq war. Relief efforts for the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast throw a huge fiscal burden onto a US Treasury that is already deep in the red." Comparing the fiscal cost of Katrina with spending for the war in Iraq, the Monitor notes, "Spending tied to hurricane Katrina has hit as much as $2 billion per day, or about 10 times the amount the United States is spending on military operations in Iraq. The pace will slow, but the recovery effort could easily cost the federal government $150 billion, experts say. Spread over a couple of years, that would roughly match the $6 billion a month being spent in Iraq." Now "the question is not whether America can absorb this shock but whether it will alter the mind-sets of policymakers and financiers on other budget matters."

Cochran Holds Key For Securing Relief

DOJ_NMG_0142218

Funding. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Rogers) reports, "Bigger names in Mississippi politics have long obscured Thad Cochran's steady rise in Congress. But in Hurricane Katrina's wake, no lawmaker is more important to the Gulf Coast, or a more calming force amid the chaos engendered by the storm." He "has been instrumental in securing $62 billion for the disaster recovery. A greater test will come in the months ahead as questions mount about paying for and managing the federal reconstruction effort." He "must protect the credibility of the process by controlling his committee's appetite -- and his own -- for pork-barrel spending. Katrina's costs will complicate his task of completing the regular spending bills for the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1. The Senate has borrowed heavily from defense funds to fill gaps in the president's domestic budget, and as chairman, Mr. Cochran is vulnerable to conservative criticism for being a big spender.

Use Of Medicaid For Relief Becomes Contentious Issue. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Lueck, Rogers) reports that Medicaid "has emerged as the main way to provide medical coverage for many evacuees. But as the relief effort continues and costs mount, federal and state officials are in a tug of war over how much the federal government will reimburse states for their Medicaid spending and whether benefits should be extended to those not ordinarily eligible for the program." The White House "has signaled that it wants to help states taking on Katrina evacuees, both financially and by easing red tape. In Congress, some relief for states seems certain. 'I think it is likely that the federal government is going to have to step up more,' said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.)." The key issue "is a proposed expansion of Medicaid for Katrina survivors. Democrats have proposed that all displaced families from the storm be made eligible for the next six months, simply to ensure coverage. Even conservative lawmakers from the affected states are sympathetic." Yet "the White House appears cool to any expansion, and Mr. Frist said he was 'not convinced' it was needed."

NYTimes Warns GOP Spending Cuts Will Hurt Evacuees. The New York Times (9/14) editorializes, "President Bush's vow to speed welfare assistance to the victims of Hurricane Katrina overlooks the gruesome determination of many Republican Congressional leaders to make $13 billion in cuts to Medicaid and food stamps. They quietly plan this even as they throw short-term emergency money at the crisis." Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour "personifies his party leaders' contradiction in begging for emergency aid now after having championed painful cuts in the social safety net. Earlier this year, Mr. Barbour was in the spotlight as his state's unapologetic Medicaid antagonist. Rejecting the alternative of a tax increase, he severely cut drug benefits and sought to drop 65,000 poor, elderly and disabled people from the program before the courts intervened." Barbour "can spare his president and party a shameful episode by urging that the pending cuts for some of the storm's neediest be deep-sixed."

House GOP Gives White House Mixed Response On Katrina Cooperation. Roll Call (9/14, Pershing) reports, "As Congress and the Bush administration work aggressively to tackle the recovery from Hurricane Katrina, House Republicans are giving the White House mixed reviews on its communication effort with the Hill, on both the political and the policy fronts." Some "Congressional sources said that the flow of information from the administration has improved since the first week of the Katrina crisis. But with legislative proposals moving quickly through the system and a steady drumbeat of negative media coverage weakening the GOP's standing with the public, House Republicans are pushing for the White House to provide more substantive policy details as well as a more cohesive message."

Landrieu Praises Bush, Other Democrats Unsatisfied. The AP (9/14, Jordan) reports, "Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., welcomed Bush's conciliatory remarks. 'Accountability at every level is critical, and leadership begins at the top,' she said." But Sen. Robert Byrd and other Democrats "were less charitable." Byrd said, "The season has come for Americans to look homeward...instead of continuing to spend billions of dollars in Iraq."

And the Washington Times (9/14, Curl) notes that "Democrats continued to blame Mr. Bush for inadequate recovery efforts in the immediate aftermath of the hurricane, which left thousands of New Orleans' residents stranded and thousands more without food and water." Sen. John Kerry said, "This administration still hasn't figured out the difference between spin and leadership." Reuters (9/14) and Bloomberg (9/14) also reported on the details of Bush's acceptance of responsibility.

Laura Bush Takes Lead In Defending President. The AP (9/14, Pickler) reports, "Laura Bush is reprising her role as her husband's first defender, making several trips to the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast as President Bush's approval ratings sink to their lowest level yet." She "is highlighting the positive that has come out of the storm, telling the stories of strangers helping one another in a time of tragedy."

She "said Tuesday that much more human good than bad has come from the disaster, despite what people see on TV. She said the evacuees she has met in her three trips to the Gulf Coast are hopeful and thankful that they don't have to start from rock bottom because of the donations and the kindness of strangers."

Bush Witnesses Generosity Among New Orleans, NYC Rescue Workers. John McCaslin writes in his Inside the Beltway column in the Washington Times (9/14) about President Bush's visit to New Orleans, where he greeted rescue workers including some New York City firefighters "who were standing before a not-so-ordinary New York City firetruck. White House spokesman Scott McClellan revealed that this same fire engine was donated by the city of New Orleans to New York City in the days after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. And now New York has returned the gift, the report said."

Columnist Questions Need For "Big Government" Response. Anne Applebaum in her column in the Washington Post (9/14, A31) cites the US public's generous charitable response to Katrina and writes, "it is important not to draw hasty conclusions about the ultimate political impact of this tragedy. More specifically, it's important to ignore the hasty conclusions that have already been drawn, both here and abroad, about the victory of 'big government' and the death of a certain kind of American individualism." Applebaum "certainly" believes "there's a role for government in disaster and evacuation planning. But it is true that the worst failures of the past two weeks have been big government failures. The biggest successes, by contrast, have come out of this country's incredibly vibrant, amazingly diverse and fantastically generous civil society. Sooner or later, it will be impossible not to draw political lessons from that paradox."

Columnist Blames Bush For Delayed Response. Maureen Dowd in her column in the New York Times (9/14) writes, "President Bush continued to try to spin his own inaction yesterday, but he may finally have reached a patch of reality beyond spin. Now he's the one drowning, unable to rescue himself by patting small black children on the head during photo-ops and making scripted attempts to appear engaged. He can keep going back down there, as he will again on Thursday when he gives a televised speech to the nation, but he can never compensate for his tragic inattention during days when so many lives could have been saved."

WSJ Applauds Montana Community For Returning Pork. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, A20), in an editorial, notes a bipartisan movement in Bozeman, Montana "to give the feds back a $4 million earmark to pay for a parking garage in the just-passed $286 billion highway bill" in order to use the money for Katrina relief. The Journal adds that there are already ideas to, "Cancel the Bush tax cuts, raise the gasoline tax by $1 a gallon, increase deficit spending, and sharply cut spending on national defense and the war in Iraq. In Washington, it seems, everything is expendable except for the slabs of bacon that are carved out of the federal fisc to ensure re-election. The glory of what is happening in Bozeman is that taxpayers are proving to be wiser about priorities than their politicians."

US Pledges Crackdown On Katrina-Related Scams.

NBC News (9/14, Myers) reports, "As weather forecasters tracked the approach of Hurricane Katrina, Alan Paller, a computer security expert with the Sans Institute, tracked another gathering storm — the rush to register Internet sites containing the name 'Katrina.' ... 'Most of them,' says Paller, 'appear to be just plain thieves.'" NBC continues, "Tuesday, the U.S. Justice Department warned that many of some 4,000 Katrina Web sites could be fake. Sixty percent come from overseas, officials said, a warning sign the sites may be bogus. ... U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales promised swift punishment for those who victimize generous Americans. ... 'Federal, state and local law enforcement officials are watching carefully,' Gonzales warned at a news conference Tuesday. '[We] will have zero tolerance for these kinds of crimes.'" NBC notes, "Missouri Attorney General Jay Nixon already has moved against 10 Web sites, tied to a group of white supremacists. ... 'It's totally outrageous,' Nixon said, 'for someone to take these domain names and then solicit funds, run them through what looks like a legitimate charity using pictures and other hurricane victims, when in reality that money was running to his hate sites.'"

Reuters (9/14) reports, "Senior FBI and Justice Department officials warned Americans who want to donate money to the relief effort to be cautious to avoid fraudulent charities, including those that pretend to be major organizations like the Red Cross. ... 'Just like these natural disasters bring out the best in people, they also bring out some of the worst elements of the criminal element out there who are willing to take advantage of those who are willing to give and those who so desperately need the relief,' said Chris Swecker, chief of the FBI's criminal investigative division." Reuters adds, "Swecker said the FBI is investigating sites of fraudulent charities. He said there are about 4,000 sites advertising Katrina relief services, and about 60 percent of them are coming from overseas. ... 'That is not a reason unto itself to conclude that that's a scam Web site, but it is a reason to be cautious,' he said." Reuters notes, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said some of the bogus sites had been shut down but would not give details on the number or how many investigations had been launched. ... 'We must ensure that those offering a helping hand do not become victims themselves and that those found preying on the compassion of our citizens are punished,' he said."

The AP (9/14) reports, "The number of Katrina-related sites has more than quadrupled in the past week, according to FBI officials. ... 'A devious few have sought to take advantage of our collective generosity,' Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a news conference to highlight the government's efforts to combat fraud." The AP adds, "Swecker said the number of probes has grown a lot in recent days, but he declined to be specific. The Justice Department has a Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force looking especially at phony charities, identity theft, insurance scams and government benefit fraud. ... The American Red Cross, the relief group most frequently copied in Internet scams, also is working with authorities." The AP notes, "Officials again urged donors not to respond to unsolicited e-mails and to give only to well-known charities. ... 'If it doesn't look right, chances are it's not,' assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said."

CNN.com (9/14, Frieden) reports, "Swecker said investigators have reviewed 2,100 sites and about 60 percent of them originate outside the United States. 'That's not a reason unto itself to conclude that that's a scam Web site, but it is a reason to be cautious,' Swecker said." CNN continues, "Swecker said no arrests have been made. But the number of criminal cyber probes has increased substantially since last Thursday, when the FBI acknowledged it was investigating eight instances of potential Web site fraud. ... 'I can't give you the exact number, but it's a lot more than eight,' he said." CNN adds, "Red Cross General Counsel Mary Elcano told reporters the organization is prepared to file civil lawsuits against operators of Web sites who do not promptly shut down when ordered to do so by the FBI. ... Some of the suspect activities are sophisticated endeavors that are created to look like authentic Red Cross sites. ... Many of the apparently fraudulent Web sites trying to tap into Katrina relief donations feature pop-ups, spam through provided links and other unsolicited e-mails."

Local Television. WRLH-TV Richmond (9/13, 10:23 p.m.) reported, "US attorney, general, Alberto Gonzales has a warning for people who may try to take advantage of the public's generosity in the wake of this storm. Gonzales says criminals have attempted to profit from this disaster by setting up fraudulent internet websites. Speaking today at a press conference in Washington, Gonzales said those offenders can expect to be prosecuted."

WEYI-TV Flint (9/13, 5:59 p.m.) reported, "US attorney general Alberto Gonzales says the federal government is keeping an eye on these fraudulent internet websites."

WPXI-TV Pittsburgh (9/13, 5:25 p.m.) also covered this story.

Chertoff Said To Have Been Confused About Position In Federal Response. Knight Ridder (9/14, Landay, Young, McCaffrey) reports, "The federal official with the power to mobilize a massive federal response to Hurricane Katrina was Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, not the former FEMA chief who was relieved of his duties and resigned earlier this week, federal documents reviewed by Knight Ridder show. Even before the storm struck the Gulf Coast, Chertoff could have ordered federal agencies into action without any request from state or local officials. Federal Emergency Management Agency chief Michael Brown had only limited authority to do so until about 36 hours after the storm hit, when Chertoff designated him as the 'principal federal official' in charge of the storm." Though Chertoff "was in charge of managing the national response to a catastrophic disaster, according to the National Response Plan," a memo obtained by Knight Ridder "suggests that Chertoff may have been confused about his lead role in disaster response and that of his department." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke, meanwhile, "disputed that the bureaucracy got in the way of launching the federal response. 'There was a tremendous sense of urgency,' Knocke said. 'We were mobilizing the greatest response to a disaster in the nation's history.'"

Paulison Says He Will Focus On Victims, Not Failures. Interim FEMA Director David Paulison held a press conference yesterday with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, where he said that FEMA is "going to deal with" the devastation Katrina has caused. NBC Nightly News (9/13, lead story, 3:25, Gregory) noted, "Across the board today, the Administration wanted to look forward. Assuming the helm at FEMA today, David Paulison, who brings years of emergency response experience."

Fox News' Special Report (9/13, Hume) reported Paulison "said today the first priority of his organization will be to get Hurricane Katrina evacuees out of temporary shelters and into more permanent housing.:

The Washington Times (9/14, Hudson) reports, "Paulison yesterday began work as acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency with a clean slate and the full backing of President Bush to help rebuild the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast." In a press briefing with Chertoff, Paulison said, "I can't deal with what happened in the last two weeks, but I can tell you from this point forward, we are going to be focusing on the victims of this hurricane." Chertoff said at the press conference that when naming FEMA directors in the future, disaster emergency management experience will be "a significant consideration."

Most local TV stations along the Gulf Coast noted interim FEMA Director David Paulison's news conference with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. Typical of coverage was a report from WBRC-TV Birmingham (9/13, 5:30 pm), that Paulison "says he will work hard to get Katrina evacuees out of shelters as soon as possible." Paulison, who "was formally introduced this morning in Washington" by Chertoff, "says he will focus on helping storm victims, not on what went wrong."

The CBS Evening News (9/13, story 5, 2:15, Schieffer) noted, "The unprecedented task of housing the thousands of New Orleans residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina" is the "task new FEMA Director David Paulison called his top priority." Director Paulison: "I know it's a focus of mine, it's a focus of the President, that we get these people out of the shelters into some type of either semi-permanent or permanent housing."

Meanwhile, CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/13, Meserve) reported that "some wonder if Paulison, a firefighter, can mesh with other disciplines like police and public health and if he is equipped to run FEMA programs like housing and financial aid, the bulk of its work." CNN added, "Administration officials won't speculate on whether Paulison will be asked to take the FEMA position permanently. They do say no changes in leadership are likely until the hurricane season is over and done."

Ridicule Of Brown Continues After Resignation. Mark Leibovich, in a special report for the Washington Post (9/14, C1) writes that former FEMA Director Michael Brown "had come to personify the rule that once you become a joke in Washington, there is no rehab. He had became the subject of hundreds of punch lines amid the tragically unfunny spectacle of Katrina -- too many to recover from."

After an especially lengthy barrage of jokes directed at Michael Brown Monday night by Jay Leno on NBC, last night it was David Letterman, on CBS, who focused his attention on the former FEMA director. "Well, former FEMA director Michael Brown resigned. He says that he wants to spend more time not responding to his family," said Letterman. "Yeah, he resigned.
